Mrs. Rappold, who sang here for the first time, made a favorable impression by her singing of this music, and this impression was strengthened by her interpretation of the songs. Her voice is a pure and agreeable soprano, and she uses it for the most part skilfully. Her intonation was good, she did not force tone, and although now and then an upper tone was not so full as it might have been, the voice was effective, both lyrically and dramatically. In the songs Mrs. Rappold occasionally accented in succession first beats of measures without reference to the true rhetorical emphasis. She should guard herself against this, for it easily becomes a habit which is pernicious and distressing..

[82]

BOSTON GLOBE, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1908.

DRAMA, AU NATUREL.

Greet Gives Shakspere in Symphony Hall.

Midsummer Night's Dream as the Bard Wrote It Appears.

"A Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's incidental music, was given by Ben Greet's players, assisted by 50 musicians of the symphony orchestra, Gustav Strube conductor, at Symphony hall last night. The cast was: Theseus, Eugene Cleves; Lysander, Hylton Allen; Demetrius, J. Sayre Crowley; Philostrate, Henry Willis; Quince, Frank MacEntee; Snug, Percival Seymour; Bottom, Ben Greet; Flute, Le Gai Robinson; Snout, John Macfarlane; Starveling, Earl Q. Snider; Hippolyta, Grace Halsey Mills; Hermia, Violet Vivian; Helena, Irene Rooke; Oberon, Milton Rosmer; Titania, Ruth Vivian; Puck, George Vivian. There were dances by Lou Wall Moore, songs by Mrs John Warren and Mrs Kenny.

There have been those, since Mr Greet first came to Boston with "Everyman" and a theory that a company should have no star, that plays of olden time should so far as possible be produced without the modern aids of scenery and "effects," who laughed at the English player's "four props" and the delivery of lines by his company. But Mr Greet certainly had a quiet smile of his own last night, for Symphony hall was filled to see his production of Shakspere's most delicate comedy.

A few tubbed palms and the four conventionalized mossy banks were all the stage properties. Mr Greet, of course, played Bottom, and played it as broadly as the character would bear. The play before the duke in the last act was really excruciatingly funny. The women of the company were very well cast indeed; Helena and Hermia, Miss Vivian and Miss Rooke, were all that could be desired, and the rather difficult lines of Titania were made smooth by a very interesting Miss Ruth Vivian.

A new addition is Miss Grace Halsey Mills, who was the Hippolyta. She had but a short part, but in it was entirely in the spirit of the play. Her enjoyment of the tinkers' play was as genuine, as sincere, as that of the other audience below. She made a graceful, sturdy, pleasant queen of the Amazons. Milton Rosmer was a handsome Oberon and George Vivian an elastic Puck, whose wicked chuckle was irresistible. The fairies were the children of the Dorothea Dix home and were simply incredible, down to the tiny sentry set to watch Titania's slumbers, but maliciously swept up and off by Puck.

POST, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1908

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"

A Unique Presentation of Shakspere's Comedy Given in Symphony Hall by Ben Greet's Players

Last evening at Symphony Hall Ben Greet and his players gave an Elizabethan performance of Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with practically the full score of Mendelssohn's incidental music played by selected members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Gustav Strube. It is now some years, over a quarter of a century in fact, that any attempt has been made in this city to give a production of this comedy with its musical accessories.

A number of seasons ago Nat Goodwin in the role of Nick Bottom gave a production of the play at the Hollis, wherein some of the fairy dances were introduced and much of the score presented, but more attention was paid to the scenic effects and the acting than to the musical accessories.

Mr. Greet, following his usual custom, gave the performance without scenery or properties. A "back drop" representing a wooded hill was all the adornment that was given the stage and the players came and went without any attempt at scenic effect. He opened the play with Mendelssohn's overture and then the second scene of Act 1, when Bottom and his fellow players began their rehearsal.

Then came Titania and her fairies, Oberon and Puck. The acting version was then adhered to more or less closely, the play ending with the marriage of the lovers.

But it was the music which furnished the greatest charm. The dance of the fairies, the quaint movements allotted to Puck, the exquisite theme when the lovers were united, the familiar "Spring Song" and the wedding march, all played as few of those present had ever heard them.

The acting was not by any means up to the standard, but it was, in this instance merely an incident. The whole effect was beautifully picturesque and quite out of the ordinary. That it was a unique entertainment was proved by the large audience that filled nearly every seat in the vast auditorium. The success of the performance was so marked that it may be repeated.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER, NOVEMBER 19, 1908

BEN GREET AND PLAYERS SEEN IN SYMPHONY HALL

"A MIDSUMMERS' NIGHT DREAM" PRESENTED

Tolerable Performance, With Ample Musical Setting and a Great Audience.

"Shakespeare, with whom quick nature died," held the stage of Symphony Hall, last night. The Ben Greet Players gave a performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and an orchestra of 50 Symphony men under the direction of Gustav Strube played Mendelssohn's music based upon the play.

This comedy is not Shakespeare at his best. With other efforts in comedy vein he comes to closer grip with reality and makes more prodigal display of his amazing wealth of vocabulary and idiom. It appeals, however, by his zest in life, the vivid pictorial quality of his imagination and sensitive appreciation of the shifting pageant of Nature. Allusions to philosophy may well be brief. Aside from the sporting of a master humorist he has in mind illustration, through the capricious play of fairies, of Youthful Love, the doctrine set forth by Helena,—

> Things base and vile, holding no quantity,
> Love can transpose to form and dignity.

In appraisal of the performance we cannot overlook the fact that Symphony Hall is too large for effective performance of a play. Sympathetic feeling between actors and a majority of the audience cannot be established. Last night, however, the Greet Players had an unusual advantage in music which was a powerful atmospheric aid and a strong prop in declamatory passages.

It was a performance tolerable at all times, occasionally excellent, but never brilliant. It might be further described as square-toed. Mr. Greet's players are well drilled, but the best of training will not take the place of talent. A majority of his company are persons of little ability.

Mr. Greet himself took the role of Bottom and by ludicrous by-play amused his audience. It is not, however, one of his best parts. He is not sufficiently stolid. His Bottom the Ass is deficient in the brutish bewilderment Nat Goodwin so perfectly suggested. Mr. George Vivian's Puck was not very Puckish. Ability to turn cartwheels does not sum up requirements for the role. Ruth Vivian was an alluring Titania and some of her dances with attendant fairies were at once graceful and picturesque.

As usual, the "tedious brief scene" of Pyramus and Thisbe was the most applauded feature of the evening. A sign of Shakespeare's recollection of primitive drama which enlivened rustic festivals in Elizabethan England, and has survived, in the rustic play of St. George, to the present day, liberty it allows is almost always interpreted in terms of license. It becomes a smear of vaudeville. Mr. Greet takes as many liberties as the rest, but his original business is in better taste.

Whether Mr. Greet's popularity, or the presence of Symphony players, or the fact that it was the first Shakespearian performance of the present season, explains an audience testing the hall's capacity we do not know. But the fact stands. Every seat was taken and there was a fringe of standees. An agreeable surprise.

POST, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21,

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon, at the sixth public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Willy Hess, concertmeister, appeared as soloist, playing Max Bruch's little known third concerto for violin and orchestra. The concert opened with two orchestral pieces, "A Song of Spring" and "Finland," by Jean Sibelius, given for the first time in Boston, and came to an end with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The music of Sibelius is superb in its spontaneity, elementality, force and sincerity. The "Song of Spring" develops with ever increasing passion a rather mournful melody of a decidedly Finnish character in its curve and rhythm. The instrumentation—probably with intention on the part of the composer—has little variety of color. The theme is given almost entirely to the strings in a low register, and is accompanied by clash harmonies in the brass and wood. A marvellously imaginative touch comes at the end, with the "strange peal of bells" mentioned in the programme book. "Imaginative of what?" might be asked. We leave the question to the officious interpreter. It is enough that, as with any truly creative artist, the unexpected innovation which he introduces has its own law of being; that it appears as an absolutely logical expression, and stirs one strangely. And let us thank the composer on bended knees that he omitted explanation in his title or in his score.

What a magnificently virile outpouring is the second piece, "Finlandia"! It has a greater emotional than artistic value, for the passionate reiteration of themes and sections does not conduce to a sense of contrast that we would desire to a greater degree in a work of a purely musical and formal character. But by its deep feeling and unbounded energy the music grips irresistibly. You cannot help sharing these feelings, or avoid being swept away by the stormy, swirling measures. Small wonder that there were days when the Russian government saw fit to prohibit the performance of "Finlandia."

The Bruch concerto has been heard but once in Boston, at a Symphony concert in 1892, when Camilla Urso was the violinist and Nikisch the conductor. Mr. Hess, we hear, considers that the composition has been unduly neglected. He gave the concerto a finished and entirely admirable performance. It is doubtful, indeed, whether the concertmeister has ever played more beautifully in Boston; but, after a single hearing, we believe such energies could have been spent in more worthy material. The whole work is too long. The first movement appeared strongest, though it, too, suffers from too extended development. The slow movement is inclined to drowsy platitudes. The finale is brilliant in substance, but falls short when the inevitable comparison with the G minor concerto is made. The orchestra is employed effectively. Mr. Hess was warmly applauded and recalled.

NATION. NOV 12

Edward MacDowell had a premonition that he should not live after his forty-fifth birthday. He was always distrustful of his powers, and severely critical toward his own music; some time before his mind began to fail he destroyed all the manuscripts he did not wish to leave behind. He spared, however, "Lamia," his third symphonic poem, and his widow, a few months ago, placed it in the hands of Arthur P. Schmidt of Boston, who published it. As soon as it had left the press, it was produced at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the same orchestra played it in this city last Saturday afternoon, and on the previous evening it was performed at one of the People's Symphony Concerts in Carnegie Hall. The impression made at the first hearing was that the piece was well worth producing, and this impression was deepened at the second hearing, when the superior membership and training of the Boston orchestra enabled the conductor to reveal the youthful MacDowell's astonishing instinct for rich, varied, and appropriate coloring. The composition is an embodiment in tones of the moods inspired by the story of Lamia. MacDowell was not a believer in the Berlioz-Strauss style of programme music which attempts to follow such a story step by step; his symphonic poem is therefore simply an attempt to produce in the hearer's mind a succession of moods or emotions such as are aroused by reading Keats's poem; and in this endeavor he has succeeded admirably. The melodies and harmonies are not so individual as those in his last sonatas and songs; but they are, nevertheless, fascinating, and it is likely that "Lamia" will be heard hereafter quite as often as his other orchestral works.

From EVENING MAIL, New York City.
Address
Date NOV 21 1908

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the Liszt piano concerto in A major. The programme will also probably include Tschaikowsky's Sixth symphony. The soloist of Saturday afternoon will be Emil Sauer.

THE BOSTON HERALD—THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1908.

BEN GREET PLAYS PART OF BOTTOM

"Midsummer Night's Dream" Is Given—Music Performed by Symphony Orchestra.

HALL CROWDED WITH ATTENTIVE AUDIENCE

Poetry of Some of Lines Felt, and Mendelssohn's Work Greatly Enjoyed.

By PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Ben Greet's Players gave a performance of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" last night in Symphony Hall. Mendelssohn's music to the play was performed by 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestera, led by Mr. Gustav Strube. The audience filled the hall completely.

Many were pleased at the opportunity of hearing Mendelssohn's music in connection with the play, not read, but performed on a stage. The play has before been given here with music, but not with an orchestra of so great reputation. And to some the music was ample compensation for sitting through the performance of the version used.

There are two ways of enjoying "A Midsummer Night's Dream." One is to read the play and see the characters in the mind's eye; to be with Duke Theseus in his palace; to watch the cross-purposes of the lovers and the play of the hard-handed men of Athens; to side alternately with Oberon and Titania. The very opening, "Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour draws on apace," takes the reader away from the city of too daily life. The other is to see the play performed with pomp and ceremony as a spectacle, with gorgeous scenery, ballet fairies and full orchestra, as at the Dresden Royal Opera House. It is all very well to say that as scenery was primitive, or non-existent, in the time of Shakespeare, it is not necessary now. Unfortunately, or fortunately, in 1908 we are not all Elizabethans and we cannot put ourselves in the mood of those first audiences.

Whether the scenery be elaborate or "in accordance with Elizabethan custom," "A Midsummer Night's Dream" as a play in the playhouse is stripped in great measure of its poetic charm. It has been likened under these conditions to a dull pantomime. Is it true, as Hazlitt said years ago, that the ideal has no place upon the stage? "Bottom's head in the play is a fantastic illusion, produced by magic spells; on the stage it is an ass' head and nothing more; certainly a very strange costume for a gentleman to appear in." Even the lightest fairy on the stage weighs a certain number of pounds. Titania is turned into a woman whose voice may be caressing or shrewish, it matters not; but she is certainly not the fairy queen that exists in the imagination, as real in the mind as any modern suffragite or president of a woman's club. On the stage the whole business of the four lovers is absurd and tedious.

It would have ben as well had there been no scenery at all in Symphony Hall last night. Titania and Noah's Ark trees! Puck and potted plants! Puck was singularly aggressive, by the way, with his somersaults, his cracking of heels together thrice in air, his rasping voice and staccata laugh that recalled Mr. Ralph Delmore in "The Span of Life." Let us not insist on this, however, for the part no doubt was played accordingto Elizabethan traditions. Only the imprudent would dispute with Mr. Greet on this point. Nor is it necessary to speak of the performance in detail. Mr. Greet's players are known here and so are their methods. Nor would it be worth while to discuss at length Mr. Greet's conception of Bottom. It amused many in the audience, but Bottom, though he was an ass without the head, was a wise ass; a man highly respected in his own walk of life. Not from sheer love of paradox did Maginn contrast him with Romeo the Unlucky.

It is enough to say that the poetry of some of Shakespeare's lines was felt; that many were reminded pleasantly of the play and promised themselves to read it again at their leisure; and that all enjoyed the music.

TIMES. NEW YORK CITY. NOV 17 1908

TO FORM A NEW ORCHESTRA.

It Will Take in the Philharmonic with Gustav Mahler as Leader.

It was learned yesterday that plans for the amalgamation of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra with a new permanent orchestra to be modeled on the plan of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are rapidly nearing completion. In all probability these plans will shortly be placed before the governing board of the Philharmonic, and if accepted, the new orchestra will be assured.

It is understood that the title, New York Philharmonic Orchestra, will be retained, and that Gustav Mahler will be the conductor. Mrs. George R. Sheldon is the leading spirit in the new orchestra, and it is understood that she has promises of ample financial backing. Richard Arnold, Vice President of the Philharmonic Orchestra, said last night regarding the plan:

"We have as yet come to no definite decision, but it looks now as if the plan would succeed."

BOSTON GLOBE—THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1908.

DRAMA, AU NATUREL.

Greet Gives Shakspere in Symphony Hall.

Midsummer Night's Dream as the Bard Wrote It Appears.

"A Midsummer Night's Dream," with Mendelssohn's incidental music, was given by Ben Greet's players, assisted by 50 musicians of the symphony orchestra, Gustav Strube conductor, at Symphony hall last night. The cast was: Theseus, Eugene Cleves; Lysander, Hylton Allen; Demetrius, J. Sayre Crawley; Philostrate, Henry Willis; Quince, Frank MacEntee; Snug, Percival Seymour; Bottom, Ben Greet; Flute, Le Gai Robinson; Snout, John Macfarlane; Starvling, Earl Q. Snider; Hippolyta, Grace Halsey Mills; Hermia, Violet Vivian; Helena, Irene Rooke; Oberon, Milton Rosmer; Titania, Ruth Vivian; Puck, George Vivian. There were dances by Lou Wall Moore, songs by Mrs John Warren and Mrs Kenny.

There have been those, since Mr Greet first came to Boston with "Everyman" and a theory that a company should have no star, that plays of olden time should so far as possible be produced without the modern aids of scenery and "effects," who laughed at the English player's "four props" and the delivery of lines by his company. But Mr Greet certainly had a quiet smile of his own last night, for Symphony hall was filled to see his production of Shakspere's most delicate comedy.

A few tubbed palms and the four conventionalized mossy banks were all the stage properties. Mr Greet, of course, played Bottom, and played it as broadly as the character would bear. The play before the duke in the last act was really excruciatingly funny. The women of the company were very well cast indeed; Helena and Hermia, Miss Vivian and Miss Rooke, were all that could be desired, and the rather difficult lines of Titania were made smooth by a very interesting Miss Ruth Vivian.

A new addition is Miss Grace Halsey Mills, who was the Hippolyta. She had but a short part, but in it was entirely in the spirit of the play. Her enjoyment of the tinkers' play was as genuine, as sincere, as that of the other audience below. She made a graceful, sturdy, pleasant queen of the Amazons. Milton Rosmer was a handsome Oberon and George Vivian, an elastic Puck, whose wicked chuckle was irresistible. The fairies were the children of the Dorothea Dix home and were simply incredible, down to the tiny sentry set to watch Titania's slumbers, but maliciously swept up and off by Puck.

POST, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1908

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"

A Unique Presentation of Shakspere's Comedy Given in Symphony Hall by Ben Greet's Players

Last evening at Symphony Hall Ben Greet and his players gave an Elizabethan performance of Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with practically the full score of Mendelssohn's incidental music played by selected members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Gustav Strube. It is now some years, over a quarter of a century in fact, that any attempt has been made in this city to give a production of this comedy with its musical accessories.

A number of seasons ago Nat Goodwin in the role of Nick Bottom gave a production of the play at the Hollis, wherein some of the fairy dances were introduced and much of the score presented, but more attention was paid to the scenic effects and the acting than to the musical accessories.

Mr. Greet, following his usual custom, gave the performance without scenery or properties. A "back drop" representing a wooded hill was all the adornment that was given the stage and the players came and went without any attempt at scenic effect. He opened the play with Mendelssohn's overture and then the second scene of Act 1, when Bottom and his fellow players began their rehearsal.

Then came Titania and her fairies, Oberon and Puck. The acting version was then adhered to more or less closely, the play ending with the marriage of the lovers.

But it was the music which furnished the greatest charm. The dance of the fairies, the quaint movements allotted to Puck, the exquisite theme when the lovers were united, the familiar "Spring Song" and the wedding march, all played as few of those present had ever heard them.

The acting was not by any means up to the standard, but it was, in this instance merely an incident. The whole effect was beautifully picturesque and quite out of the ordinary. That it was a unique entertainment was proved by the large audience that filled nearly every seat in the vast auditorium. The success of the performance was so marked that it may be repeated.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER, NOVEMBER 19, 1908

BEN GREET AND PLAYERS SEEN IN SYMPHONY HALL

"A MIDSUMMERS' NIGHT DREAM" PRESENTED

Tolerable Performance, With Ample Musical Setting and a Great Audience.

"Shakespeare, with whom quick nature died," held the stage of Symphony Hall, last night. The Ben Greet Players gave a performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and an orchestra of 50 Symphony men under the direction of Gustav Strube played Mendelssohn's music based upon the play.

This comedy is not Shakespeare at his best. With other efforts in comedy vein he comes to closer grip with reality and makes more prodigal display of his amazing wealth of vocabulary and idiom. It appeals, however, by his zest in life, the vivid pictorial quality of his imagination and sensitive appreciation of the shifting pageant of Nature. Allusions to philosophy may well be brief. Aside from the sporting of a master humorist he has in mind illustration, through the capricious play of fairies, of Youthful Love, the doctrine set forth by Helena,—

> Things base and vile, holding no quantity,
> Love can transpose to form and dignity.

In appraisal of the performance we cannot overlook the fact that Symphony Hall is too large for effective performance of a play. Sympathetic feeling between actors and a majority of the audience cannot be established. Last night, however, the Greet Players had an unusual advantage in music which was a powerful atmospheric aid and a strong prop in declamatory passages.

It was a performance tolerable at all times, occasionally excellent, but never brilliant. It might be further described as square-toed. Mr. Greet's players are well drilled, but the best of training will not take the place of talent. A majority of his company are persons of little ability.

Mr. Greet himself took the role of Bottom and by ludicrous by-play amused his audience. It is not, however, one of his best parts. He is not sufficiently stolid. His Bottom the Ass is deficient in the brutish bewilderment Nat Goodwin so perfectly suggested. Mr. George Vivian's Puck was not very Puckish. Ability to turn cartwheels does not sum up requirements for the role. Ruth Vivian was an alluring Titania and some of her dances with attendant fairies were at once graceful and picturesque.

As usual, the "tedious brief scene" of Pyramus and Thisbe was the most applauded feature of the evening. A sign of Shakespeare's recollection of primitive drama which enlivened rustic festivals in Elizabethan England, and has survived, in the rustic play of St. George, to the present day, liberty it allows is almost always interpreted in terms of license. It becomes a smear of vaudeville. Mr. Greet takes as many liberties as the rest, but his original business is in better taste.

Whether Mr. Greet's popularity, or the presence of Symphony players, or the fact that it was the first Shakespearian performance of the present season, explains an audience testing the hall's capacity we do not know. But the fact stands. Every seat was taken and there was a fringe of standees. An agreeable surprise.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21,

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon, at the sixth public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Willy Hess, concertmeister, appeared as soloist, playing Max Bruch's little known third concerto for violin and orchestra. The concert opened with two orchestral pieces, "A Song of Spring" and "Finland," by Jean Sibelius, given for the first time in Boston, and came to an end with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The music of Sibelius is superb in its spontaneity, elementality, force and sincerity. The "Song of Spring" develops with ever increasing passion a rather mournful melody of a decidedly Finnish character in its curve and rhythm. The instrumentation—probably with intention on the part of the composer—has little variety of color. The theme is given almost entirely to the strings in a low register, and is accompanied by clash harmonies in the brass and wood. A marvellously imaginative touch comes at the end, with the "strange peal of bells" mentioned in the programme book. "Imaginative of what?" might be asked. We leave the question to the officious interpreter. It is enough that, as with any truly creative artist, the unexpected innovation which he introduces has its own law of being; that it appears as an absolutely logical expression, and stirs one strangely. And let us thank the composer on bended knees that he omitted explanation in his title or in his score.

What a magnificently virile outpouring is the second piece, "Finlandia"! It has a greater emotional than artistic value, for the passionate reiteration of themes and sections does not conduce to a sense of contrast that we would desire to a greater degree in a work of a purely musical and formal character. But by its deep feeling and unbounded energy the music grips irresistibly. You cannot help sharing these feelings, or avoid being swept away by the stormy, swirling measures. Small wonder that there were days when the Russian government saw fit to prohibit the performance of "Finlandia."

The Bruch concerto has been heard but once in Boston, at a Symphony concert in 1892, when Camilla Urso was the violinist and Nikisch the conductor. Mr. Hess, we hear, considers that the composition has been unduly neglected. He gave the concerto a finished and entirely admirable performance. It is doubtful, indeed, whether the concertmeister has ever played more beautifully in Boston; but, after a single hearing, we believe such energies could have been spent in more worthy material. The whole work is too long. The first movement appeared strongest, though it, too, suffers from too extended development. The slow movement is inclined to drowsy platitudes. The finale is brilliant in substance, but falls short when the inevitable comparison with the G minor concerto is made. The orchestra is employed effectively. Mr. Hess was warmly applauded and recalled.

1 .....

ess .....

.....

Edward MacDowell had a premonition that he should not live after his forty-fifth birthday. He was always distrustful of his powers, and severely critical toward his own music; some time before his mind began to fail he destroyed all the manuscripts he did not wish to leave behind. He spared, however, "Lamia," his third symphonic poem, and his widow, a few months ago, placed it in the hands of Arthur P. Schmidt of Boston, who published it. As soon as it had left the press, it was produced at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the same orchestra played it in this city last Saturday afternoon, and on the previous evening it was performed at one of the People's Symphony Concerts in Carnegie Hall. The impression made at the first hearing was that the piece was well worth producing, and this impression was deepened at the second hearing, when the superior membership and training of the Boston orchestra enabled the conductor to reveal the youthful MacDowell's astonishing instinct for rich, varied, and appropriate coloring. The composition is an embodiment in tones of the moods inspired by the story of Lamia. MacDowell was not a believer in the Berlioz-Strauss style of programme music which attempts to follow such a story step by step; his symphonic poem is therefore simply an attempt to produce in the hearer's mind a succession of moods or emotions such as are aroused by reading Keats's poem; and in this endeavor he has succeeded admirably. The melodies and harmonies are not so individual as those in his last sonatas and songs; but they are, nevertheless, fascinating, and it is likely that "Lamia" will be heard hereafter quite as often as his other orchestral works.

EVENING MAIL,

From .....

New York City.

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the Liszt piano concerto in A major. The programme will also probably include Tschaikowsky's Sixth symphony. The soloist of Saturday afternoon will be Emil Sauer.

THE BOSTON HERALD—THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1908.

BEN GREET PLAYS PART OF BOTTOM

"Midsummer Night's Dream" Is Given—Music Performed by Symphony Orchestra.

HALL CROWDED WITH ATTENTIVE AUDIENCE

Poetry of Some of Lines Felt, and Mendelssohn's Work Greatly Enjoyed.

By PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Ben Greet's Players gave a performance of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" last night in Symphony Hall. Mendelssohn's music to the play was performed by 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestera, led by Mr. Gustav Strube. The audience filled the hall completely.

Many were pleased at the opportunity of hearing Mendelssohn's music in connection with the play, not read, but performed on a stage. The play has before been given here with music, but not with an orchestra of so great reputation. And to some the music was ample compensation for sitting through the performance of the version used.

There are two ways of enjoying "A Midsummer Night's Dream." One is to read the play and see the characters in the mind's eye; to be with Duke Theseus in his palace; to watch the cross-purposes of the lovers and the play of the hard-handed men of Athens; to side alternately with Oberon and Titania. The very opening, "Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour draws on apace," takes the reader away from the city of too daily life. The other is to see the play performed with pomp and ceremony as a spectacle, with gorgeous scenery, ballet fairies and full orchestra, as at the Dresden Royal Opera House. It is all very well to say that as scenery was primitive, or non-existent, in the time of Shakespeare, it is not necessary now. Unfortunately, or fortunately, in 1908 we are not all Elizabethans and we cannot put ourselves in the mood of those first audiences.

Whether the scenery be elaborate or "in accordance with Elizabethan custom," "A Midsummer Night's Dream" as a play in the playhouse is stripped in great measure of its poetic charm. It has been likened under these conditions to a dull pantomime. Is it true, as Hazlitt said years ago, that the ideal has no place upon the stage? "Bottom's head in the play is a fantastic illusion, produced by magic spells; on the stage it is an ass' head, and nothing more; certainly a very strange costume for a gentleman to appear in." Even the lightest fairy on the stage weighs a certain number of pounds. Titania is turned into a woman whose voice may be caressing or shrewish, it matters not; but she is certainly not the fairy queen that exists in the imagination, as real in the mind as any modern suffragite or president of a woman's club. On the stage the whole business of the four lovers is absurd and tedious.

It would have ben as well had there been no scenery at all in Symphony Hall last night. Titania and Noah's Ark trees! Puck and potted plants! Puck was singularly aggressive, by the way, with his somersaults, his cracking of heels together thrice in air, his rasping voice and staccata laugh that recalled Mr. Ralph Delmore in "The Span of Life." Let us not insist on this, however, for the part no doubt was played according to Elizabethan traditions. Only the imprudent would dispute with Mr. Greet on this point. Nor is it necessary to speak of the performance in detail. Mr. Greet's players are known here and so are their methods. Nor would it be worth while to discuss at length Mr. Greet's conception of Bottom. It amused many in the audience, but Bottom, though he was an ass without the head, was a wise ass; a man highly respected in his own walk of life. Not from sheer love of paradox did Maginn contrast him with Romeo the Unlucky.

It is enough to say that the poetry of some of Shakespeare's lines was felt: that many were reminded pleasantly of the play and promised themselves to read it again at their leisure; and that all enjoyed the music.

TIMES.

NOV

TO FORM A NEW ORCHESTRA.

It Will Take in the Philharmonic with Gustav Mahler as Leader.

It was learned yesterday that plans for the amalgamation of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra with a new permanent orchestra to be modeled on the plan of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are rapidly nearing completion. In all probability these plans will shortly be placed before the governing board of the Philharmonic, and if accepted, the new orchestra will be assured.

It is understood that the title, New York Philharmonic Orchestra, will be retained, and that Gustav Mahler will be the conductor. Mrs. George R. Sheldon is the leading spirit in the new orchestra, and it is understood that she has promises of ample financial backing. Richard Arnold, Vice President of the Philharmonic Orchestra, said last night regarding the plan:

"We have as yet come to no definite decision, but it looks now as if the plan would proceed."

[83]

NEWS-DEMOCRAT, PROVIDENCE, R. I.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1908.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The first of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will give in Providence this winter, takes place in Infantry hall on next Tuesday night, Nov. 24th, at 8:15 o'clock.

Rarely does a symphony season in Providence open under such auspicious conditions. The success which Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, has had has excited a vast amount of interest among the music lovers of this city and the season sale which has just finished shows a considerable increase over that of last year.

The patronage of the orchestra has been steadily growing for the last two or three years until now Providence is one of the best cities it has on the list. The conductors of the orchestra are as careful in their selection of programs for Providence as they are for New York, and this unquestionably has had its share in the increased patronage that has been given to these concerts.

Mr. Fiedler seems to be particularly happy in his choice of programs and he has won high praise wherever he has appeared with the orchestra.

The program that he has chosen for the first Providence concert is one of the most attractive the orchestra has ever presented here. It opens with Rimsky-Korsakoff's extraordinarily brilliant symphonic suite, 'Scheherazade," which, although it has never been played here in Providence, has for a considerable time been one of the great "show-pieces" of the orchestra.

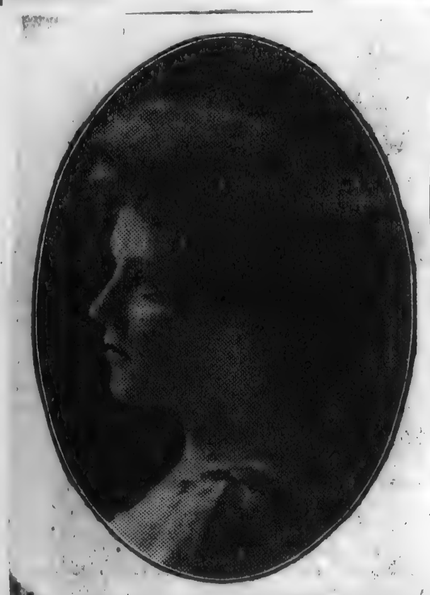
Rimsky-Korsakoff, after Tschaikowsky, the greatest of Russian composers, died last June, and while in matter perhaps, his music will never take the extraordinarily high rank given to Tschaikowsky's symphonies, in manner he is unsurpassed. In other words, he was one of the greatest masters of the art of orchestration the world has ever known and in addition to this, he had a gift for attractive melody.

The music is frankly programatic and gains not the least part of its charm from the high oriental colors that fill the score.

The second orchestral number will be three very charming dances which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl, from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procris." The first is "Tambourin;" the second, "Menuet," and the third, "Gigue."

The final orchestral, number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Miss Lilla Ormond, the soloist, comes to Providence with a reputation of being one of the finest mezzo-sopranos that this country has ever produced. Her career has been a short one because she is a very young woman, but its shortness has simply served to emphasize its brilliancy. Miss Ormond sang with the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time last season. This year she will sing with the orchestra several times. Moreover, she was one of the principal soloists at the last Worcester festival and has sung in New York with great success. Her first number will be a concert aria, entitled "The Complaint of Ariadne," by the French composer—Coquard. For her second number she will sing three songs with piano accompaniment, "Minnelied," "Mainacht" and "Staendchen," all by Brahms.



Lilla Ormond, Contralto Soloist, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening, Nov. 24

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN

MUSIC WITH YOUR POETRY.

To the Editor of The Republican:—

Your critic's clever comment upon the absorption of the Symphony audience in the text of "Lamia," the other day, suggests the discovery of a relation between poetry and music from quite another point of view than that taken in the interesting discussion in your columns concerning their relative interest. Arrange then, while you are reading to yourself some poetry for the first time, that good flowing music be played, and it will be found that, though the mind is fixed upon the words, the rhythm and harmony become subconsciously "married to" the verse, enrich and set it forever in tune in the memory. Perhaps some Symphony-goers to whom Keats's lovely poem was unknown may have found this out for themselves. The simple discovery was made by the writer quite accidentally when reading some new poetry while music was going on, and it has led to the formation of a habit which gives pleasure of the highest kind. Let the reader try this experiment with the next worthy poem upon which he ventures, and he will be always the grateful practitioner of this delicate art of enjoyment.

ERVING WINSLOW.

Boston, November 19, 1908.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 21, 1908

SIBELIUS, BRUCH AND BEETHOVEN THIS WEEK

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME BLENDS OLD AND NEW

Prof. Hess' Superb Playing Makes Bruch's Third Concerto Almost Successful.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius—Spring-song, for Orchestra.
Finlandia.
Bruch—Third Violin Concerto.
Beethoven—Seventh Symphony.
Soloist, Mr. Willy Hess.

A programme that blended the old and the new in good proportion, and, by a paradox, its beginning was its Finnish. Sibelius is a thorough nationalist in music, such as Smetana was. It is one of the healthiest signs in our art that the composers, Russian, Finnish, Bohemian, Norwegian, etc. have in recent times gone to the music of the people for their inspiration. Yet there is a peculiar exception to be noted in the case of Sibelius. He does not use actual folk-melodies any more than Chopin did, but, like that composer, he is so impregnated with the atmosphere of his national music that he evolves themes that are practically national and of the folk-song type. The melodies are, however, one and all, his own.

There were bold modulations in the work, but never ugly ones. This new school of the North is modern enough, but without crabbed prolixity. There was a great deal of use of the brass and wood-wind in the very deepest register, both in the Spring-song and in "Finlandia." The further North a composer lives the deeper he growls.

The reading of the Sibelius numbers showed Mr. Fiedler at his best, and both works were very cordially received.

The "Song of Spring" ought to appeal to New Englanders, for Spring in Finland, and Spring in New England, both have a touch of roughness (even to the pneumonia point) in their zephyrs. There is no national type of writing in this work, but the composer goes to Nature for his inspiration. But the darker moods of Nature in the North are reflected in the music and even in the sub-title, which reads,—"The Sadness of Spring." Yet there is a pealing of bells, and a passionate power in the Coda that suggests triumph at the end, much as Schumann hinted at final victory in some of his symphonic movements.

"Finlandia" was a glorious work, and celebrates a noble people. Our Russian ex-ambassador, Mr. Andrew D. White, has often told the present writer of the earnestness and honesty of the Finlanders whom he considers the best of the Northern races. Their deeply religious vein is well-reflected in the Symphonic Poem, which, after various episodes, including even dance rhythms, settles down to a simple hymn-tune which is worked up with great power to a final climax.

"Finlandia" is sincere and lofty music in every measure, and it lost nothing in the excellent interpretation of our new conductor. It deserves a second hearing soon again.

It was a great pleasure to welcome back Prof. Willy Hess as a soloist. Although a resident within our gates, he is the peer of any of the star violinists who are making world-tours. But we could have wished him some other work for his "rentree." Bruch has written too many violin concertos. Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, contented themselves with one work each in this difficult field, but Bruch, having achieved a masterpiece in his first essay in the form, forgot that one never draws the grand prize twice, and went on violin-concerto-izing. The ineffable beauty of the G minor concerto (No. 1) throws its sisters completely in the shade. Yet, had he not composed the first concerto, one could easily find beauties in the present work.

It is a work well-suited to display its soloist, but it is unequal and presents some "padding" in the last two movements. Its first movement is strong enough, and here both the emotional and the technical side of the instrument are in evidence. Bruch is always clear. He is a musical conservative, which has caused some of the radicals of the present to try to place him among the third-raters, but if one recalls "Frithjof," "Odysseus," the G minor concerto, "Fair Ellen," etc., one will not find many living composers with so many masterpieces to their credit.

Splendidly did Mr. Hess perform his task. The bowing was throughout free and broad, and the "spiccato" passages of the first movement were very incisive and fiery. The high positions and harmonics were impeccable. There was something heroic in this movement which reminded us of how much of a Tyrtaeus this old composer is and evidently inspired the performer thoroughly.

The adagio, finely performed by Mr. Hess, had yet very little to say for itself. It piled sweetness upon sweetness until it was like pouring molasses upon honey. We tired of it long before the end.

The finale gave plenty of technical embroideries, which were artistically presented. The virtuosity of the violin was more prominent in this than the soulful character of the king of instruments.

It is difficult to achieve a great success in the composition of violin concertos, because the tone-color of the chief instrument is already present in the orchestral part, while in a piano concerto the composer has an added tone-color in his score, and one which acts as an excellent foil and contrast to his orchestra, but the constant reiteration of cadenza work or of saccharine sighings might have been avoided. Nevertheless the great abilities of Mr. Hess carried the work to a good measure of success, and the recalls at the end were most hearty. Yet we hope that now that it has been presented at our concerts again (it has not been heard in a long time) we hope that it may be permitted to rest in peace.

The concert came to an end with a good classical work, and we feel grateful to Mr. Fiedler for not entirely deserting the highway of music in the necessary task of presenting novelties. There can be no question as to the sterling quality of Mr. Fiedler's readings of the standard classics thus far. He has studied and digested every detail of his Beethoven scores, and if he sometimes deviates from points of reading that former conductors have given he does so deliberately, after careful thought and test. We reiterate that this conductor is, in his nature and in his interpretations, much like Emil Paur, whose heartiness and broad, healthy readings were not always sufficiently appreciated by those who were too closely wedded to kid-gloved finesse.

Yet we preferred Mr. Fiedler in the Finnish compositions rather than in the seventh symphony. There was plenty of spirit and dash, but there was sometimes an excess of pianissimo, and there could have been more shading within the phrases. Too often each phrase was on a single dynamic level. Excellent, however, was the tempo of the second movement, the gem of the entire work, and there was a hearty swing to the Scherzo and to the finale.

It is a symphony of strong rhythms and of organ points. The beginning of the first movement (the end of the introduction) with its "E" 69 times repeated, the reiterated D, C sharp, B sharp, of the coda of the same, are among Beethoven's boldest touches of effective monotony. The simplicity of the fundamental ideas also is remarkable. The entire first movement is spun out of a dactyl, and the brooding Allegretto out of a dactyl and a spondee.

It is an apotheosis of the dance, and in these latter days Miss Isadora Duncan is actually dancing it. After all Dancing is the Mother of Music, and why should not the symphonic child return to its parent? There may, however, be still further devices added to Beethoven. In London a few years ago they gave the "Pastoral" symphony with especial scenes set back of the orchestra at each movement. Why not fill the hall with powder smoke during the battle of "Heldenleben," which we are to have next week?

THE SUNDAY HERALD
NOVEMBER 22.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON

Two New Pieces by Sibelius —Violinist Hess Plays Dull Concerto Finely.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its sixth concert last evening in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Mr. Willy Hess was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

"Song of Spring" and "Finland"..... Sibelius
Concerto No. 3 for violin and orchestra..... Bruch
Symphony, A major, No. 7..... Beethoven

The two pieces by Jean Sibelius were played for the first time in Boston. We had already heard two of the three symphonies by this composer and also his violin concerto, played admirably by Mme. Maud Powell. The first symphony, peculiarly rugged and melancholy music, made a profound impression. The second symphony, produced here at an earlier date, was considered at the time a good deal of a bore. It would be interesting to hear it again, to see if there might not be a change of opinion. While the violin concerto is not of a nature to be immediately popular, while it was probably not the composer's intention to delight the easy-going and "knowers of what they like," the work as played by Mme. Powell appealed to the imaginative as austerely poetic, a northern and bardic rhapsody. Enough had been heard of Sibelius' music before the performance of the two pieces last night to win respect for the composer. His music is certainly not commonplace. It does not belong to a school; it does not show evidences of a direct descent; it is by itself.

It has been said that this music is unintelligible to the hearer who has not some understanding of Finnish history, religion and temperament, and the hearer must also be versed in the racial origin and "the deeply influencing mythology" of the Finns. The hearer must know that these people are a mixture of Mongolian and western stock, "deriving from the west vigor and self-reliance, and from the east languor and mysticism." Above all, the hearer must know by heart the "Kalevala," the collection of runes and folk lore. All this, and no doubt more, if the hearer is to dilate with the proper emotion when music by Sibelius is playing. If Sibelius' music is thus narrowly national, it is parochial, music of the parish belfry as far as the great world is concerned. The praise, then, in reality is a serious censure. Music that appeals to humanity is emotional in spite of the composer's accidental nationality. It is not enough that the Finns should be moved or thrilled by the work of a Finn.

It is said that "Finland," or "Finlandia," although it was composed as far back as 1894, evokes such enthusiasm in the composer's native land that performance of it was forbidden recently by the oppressing Russian. The question is, Does "Finlandia" evoke enthusiasm in Madrid, Dresden, Boston? For after all it is something more than a national document.

"The Song of Spring" is a long, sustained, melodious song. Darkly colored at first, it is as though the Finnish composer had wished to say with Coleridge: "And the spring comes slowly up this way." Whether the bells introduced at the end have a peculiar significance is not important. The music is agreeably sonorous, and was in effective contrast with "Finlandia," which is picturesque, with suggestions of prayers and hymns, revolts and revolutions. It is stirring music and it was stirringly played.

Bruch's third concerto was produced here at a Symphony concert in 1892 by Camilla Urso. It has not been played here since then at a Symphony concert and it has been seldom played in Europe. The neglect of the concerto has been praiseworthy. Mr. Hess, however, in the course of last season played the concerto in two or three foreign cities, among them Berlin, at the express wish of the composer. He gave a fine performance of it last night. His tone was rich and full and brilliant. He played with breadth and authoritative fluency, but it was a pity that he chose this prolix, dull, bombastic empty concerto for the display of his indisputable talent. Hearty applause rewarded the violinist.

Mr. Fiedler gave a sane reading of the symphony. The music for the most part demands a strangely rhythmed performance, and the danger lies in over-emphasis and in undue prominence given to merely decorative passages. Mr. Fiedler avoided these pitfalls and the noble music spoke for itself.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union,
From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 16 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just made the first of its regular monthly trips, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In all of these cities, except New York, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, appeared for the first time. His success with his audiences was a notable feature of the trip, and it seems certain now that he will be one of the most popular conductors the great orchestra has ever had. It is an interesting fact in view of the many prophecies that have been made of a bad musical season that the gross receipts of the orchestra for the six concerts on this trip were within $50 of what they were on the corresponding trip of last year. On Monday night, Nov. 9, the orchestra gave a concert in Princeton, which was the first time it had ever played in that university town. The next novelty of great interest which Mr. Fiedler is to bring out is Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TWO NEW AND STRIKING PIECES BY SIBELIUS

A "Song of Spring" That Turns an Elegy, and a Strong and Trenchant "Song of Finland"—Mr. Hess's Playing Glorifies a Forgotten Violin Concerto of Bruch—Beethoven's Symphony of the Dance According to Mr. Fiedler and Not to Pleasure—Old Habits and New with the Audience

The audience of the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon is acquiring a new habit and lapsing into an old. The new is the removal of the obstructing hats; the old is the dribbling through the doors at each pause in a symphony when such music happens to end the concert, or at any interval in the closing items of the programme. The management of the orchestra has not pressed its objections to the hats, since its unexpected foray of three weeks ago. The placards asking that they be removed still remain, but there is no fresh distribution of warning cards to the careless or the obstinate. The results of the original descent upon the offending still abide. They offend no longer and the habit of offence is dwindling within them. Hat after hat came off yesterday afternoon as mechanically as they do in a well-governed theatre among spectators willing to be courteous to each other and to those who would give them pleasure from the stage. There is little lifting now of the voice of protest or petulance. A few fortunate reforms advance of themselves, once they are set in motion, and of such seems the removing of hats on Friday afternoons in Symphony Hall. The stern-faced dowagers, who as some have it set the agitation afoot, may look complaisantly now upon their work. The other habit is as old as the Symphony Concerts. Each succeeding conductor probably hears that it is the custom of a part of the audience on Friday afternoons to drift away in the final half hour of the concert, and for a few weeks each conductor believes no less that he is breaking the habit. Mr. Fiedler has been more fortunate than some of his predecessors. For a month at least he kept his audiences, perhaps by the interest that his novel ways stirred, perhaps by the brilliant overtures with which he oftenest ended his programmes. He has ceased to be a new sensation now; his hearers are becoming used to him. A week ago even so brilliant an overture as Beethoven's to "Egmont" would not hold the whole audience. Beethoven's symphony of the dance was no more potent yesterday. The exodus has begun; and each Friday it renews itself; Mr. Fiedler deigns not to notice it and thereby is he wise. "I never go out with Beethoven," snapped one of the dowagers, yesterday, in audible warning to her neighbors, but some of them went as of old.

Sibelius is brief and Sibelius is trenchant, and these are unusual distinctions among the younger composers. Two of his tone-poems, each new to Boston—his "Song of the Spring" ("Vårsång") and his "Song of Finland" ("Finlandia") began the concert Friday afternoon, and together they barely filled twenty-five minutes. Most of the younger writers of orchestral music would count themselves singularly concise and reticent did they spread the contents of a single tone-poem over the whole time that the two of Sibelius consumed. Surely, they would reason, he could not have had much to say. He might, indeed, have said more in these two orchestral songs; but either of them contains as much of musical idea and emotional mood as many a youngster puts upon double the number of sheets of music paper. Moreover, Sibelius makes his ideas and his moods tell, however meagre the one or unvaried the other, by concise and trenchant utterance. "The Song of the Spring" is comparatively simple of design, mood and utterance—a long melodic curve, beginning soberly, mounting, swelling, touching amplitude and almost climax, then declining again, but halting almost abruptly and a little roughly in the descent. Clearly, too, it is music of mood—no picture-music of the quick bursting of the northern spring, but music of the emotion it stirs in the composer as he looks out of his own heart. Melancholy is in his eyes—a bleak, dry melancholy. Comes the spring upon his gray rocks, his bare plains, his lustreless lakes, his silvery skies—comes to pour its light and warmth over them, and they obstinately mock it. Since earth was earth and man was man, it has so come upon them, and year upon year they have withstood it. A vain thing, after all, is this spring. Northern nature still resists it, and a melancholy watcher shall muse upon these things and make his song of spring its elegy. Yet, if nature seem not glad, the hearts of men rejoice; the bells peal in yonder village; life stirs eagerly, warmly again among the folk. The melancholy poet hears and struggles with his brooding. Yet it will not go. Vanity of vanities, said the Preacher, and the northern spring is of them. Of such, perhaps, is the mood of Sibelius's sad and sober song of the spring, and its mood is its virtue—perhaps a more sensitive and less monotonous mood than Mr. Fiedler gave to it.

"Finlandia" begins in grim, hard, iron-like music. As the spring song recalled a little the dreary and haunted vein of Sibelius's concerto for violin that Mme. Powell played here two years ago, so the song of Finland, and especially at the outset, recalled the stern, stripped force of his symphony that Dr. Muck discovered for us. A fierce and restless folk are these Finlanders, clamoring and surging through the music, stretching in their anger the chains that they may not break. Deep is their wrath, their pride, their fortitude—and the music swells to solemn resolution. Their courage soothes their angry hearts; their restless voices are calmer; theirs after all is their land, and it has its cheer for them. The music broadens, brightens, swells again to sober exaltation, ends almost proudly. A subjective Sibelius, searching out his own moods, wrought "The Song of the Spring." An objective Sibelius, feeling his land and his people, hearing their voices, wrote "The Song of Finland." The man is sad and struggling. The patriot stern, passionate, exalted. Who knows, who cares whether folk-tunes suggested "Finlandia"? Sibelius looked in his heart and wrote what his country and his race inspired in it, and the passion they fired is worth reams of folk ditties. Finns are few in this world; many more are those who stir to the stern passion of such an orchestral song as Sibelius has made for them. And he is as rugged in his musical form, as bare and concentrated in his strength, as grim and gray in his coloring as the rocks about hm. His is wind-winnowed music. Throughout "Finlandia" Mr. Fiedler caught its vein.

The Bruch who followed in the concerto for violin that Mr. Hess has resurrected—it was played twice at the Symphony Concerts sixteen years ago—was indeed far from this Sibelius. Last winter the poor old man was full of his complaints in Berlin. He was living in obscurity, in humble circumstance; he could write no more; the world of music and musicians had seemingly passed him by, and he stood wailing by the roadside. It is for the violinists, from the students of the conservatories to the most lauded of the virtuosi, to make him amends. Who ever knew that Bruch wrote a symphony until the learned compiler of the programme listed it? His choral pieces recede faster and faster into provincial twilights. But the two concertos for violin and the "Scottish Fantasia" abide day in and day out wherever there is violinist to play them. They are "grateful" music; they follow the perfect idiom of the violin; they disclose the instrument and the performer to the full, and the virtuosi love them with an undying love. Perhaps they might have less conventional musical ideas; perhaps they might be more animate with imagination and feeling; perhaps they might be less dutifully academic. These, however, are the idle thoughts of the mere hearer. They trouble not the virtuoso. Bruch is the transparent medium, the ambling vehicle for him and for his instrument, and he rejoices accordingly. Perhaps the third concerto that Mr. Hess chose is the most conventional, prosaic and academic of the three; but it is efficient, changeful—and lengthy—to epitomize the virtuoso's skill. Of course Mr. Hess made the most of it. His tone had its clear brilliance, its penetrating sweetness, its nervous undulation, its elegant fineness. He played the piece with supple and adroit technical felicity; he played it no less with an exquisite sense of fitting style. The performance went almost to cloying perfection. Not once did Mr. Hess's brilliance turn dim, his sweetness roughen, his felicities err, his elegance abate, his sense of rhythm falter. The listener could hardly be surer that Mr. Hess was a consummate virtuoso of the violin. Bruch, however, gave him not a significant or a beautiful musical thought to declare and enrich; not an emotion to vitalize in his tones; not a poetic imagining to transmit. The ideas, the emotion, the poetry, such as they were, were all of the violin and the violinist. Thrice was Mr. Hess recalled. Thrice should Bruch be grateful to him—and in a double sense.

Beethoven had much less cause for gratitude to Mr. Fiedler for the playing of the symphony in A major, the seventh as the numbers go, the symphony of the dance as Wagner has labelled it. At least Mr. Fiedler was in the fashion; it is the hour of the dancers; and Miss Duncan even dances to the last three movements of this very symphony, translating their rhythms and their spirit into bodily motion. Probably the music were left more wisely to the imagination and the emotion of those that hear. Fancy and spirit, better than bodies, may dance with such idealizing, such lyrically passionate music. Little, however, did Mr. Fiedler stir the imagination or the emotion of his hearers, and little did any sense of idealizing quality play in his reading. He made the symphony square-toed, heavy-footed, like a conventional classic dutifully placed on the serious programme of serious concerts to be played with becoming respect. There was too little brightness of tone, zest of rhythm and variety of detail. Now Mr. Fiedler over-modelled and moulded a melody, until it lost continuity, and, again, phrase after phrase went in flat monotony. Somehow, the music hardly spoke out, the exhilarating joy of it was gone; its idealizing voice would not mount. Better the vigorous and sweeping Fiedler than these dead levels of respectability. In one of Marcel Prévost's sprightly tales of Parisian women, a young wife is weary of being loved—"with respect." Old Beethoven may be no less weary of being played—with respect.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Mr. Bachner and Mr. Copeland for Pianists and Mr. Wolstenholme for an Organist—The Longy Club Again

At the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, Mr. Fiedler begins the keeping of his promise to put the longer tone-poems of Richard Strauss on his programmes. His first choice is "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), and in due course "Zarathustra," "Death and Transfiguration," and, probably, "Don Quixote," are to follow. "Ein Heldenleben" has not been performed here for seven years; the tone-poem will come almost new to its hearers; and other columns of this paper contain a clear account of it by Mr. E. A. Baughan, the accomplished English reviewer of music. Mr. Fiedler has put the piece at the beginning of his programme and it continues for nearly forty minutes without pause, so that the belated must needs tarry long for entrance. Mr. Fiedler takes his Strauss enthusiastically—much more so than did either Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck. The other numbers of the programme are the prelude and closing scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Tschaikovski's concerto for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, to bring back Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, and doubtless with broader, finer, and deeper powers.

"A HERO'S LIFE"

STRAUSS'S TONE-POEM AFTER SEVEN YEARS

Mr. Fiedler to Revive It at the Next Symphony Concerts—Its Substance and Its Form—The Qualities That Distinguish It Among Strauss's Music—The Phases of His Hero and His Expression of Them—Programme Music That Speaks for Itself

Seven years ago, lacking a few weeks, Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben"—"A Hero's Life"—was played for the first times at the Symphony Concerts, with Mr. Gericke conducting. It was then a relatively new piece. Strauss himself had conducted in the music at Frankfort in March of 1899 for its first performance in any concert; while the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago and the Philharmonic Society in New York had anticipated the Boston band with it in America. Mr. Gericke did not repeat the tone-poem during the rest of his conducting; and Dr. Muck with Strauss leaped from "Till Eulenspigel" to the "Sinfonia Domestica." Now Mr. Fiedler purposes to bring "Ein Heldenleben" to hearing again, and it stands in the first place on his programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week. Recollections of orchestral pieces are short—even of such a huge, searching and impressive as "Ein Heldenleben." It will come almost newly to many of those that will hear it again next Friday and Saturday. It deserves preliminary recalling alike as to its matter and its manner, not in the dry and withering dissection of an analytical pedant, but in the warm impressions and the clear judgment of an intelligent and sensitive listener. There is no better means to this end in our language than the following passages from the articles about "Ein Heldenleben" that Mr. E. A. Baughan wrote for The Daily News, when the tone-poem was new to London, and subsequently reprinted and amplified in his volume of essays, "Music and Musicians," published by John Lane in the summer of 1906.

Much has been written of "Ein Heldenleben," Mr. Baughan begins, "and much that has been unnecessarily confusing. As Wagner once was, so Richard Strauss now is the victim of the literary and musical commentator; but, as with the older composer, his music is not esoteric art. Those who have any feeling for music, some little knowledge of its later manifestations, and a temperament that can be impressed by poetic ideas and abstract emotions, will find in "A Hero's Life" a work which will move them strangely, and if the enthusiasm of the public may be taken as proof, this symphonic poem is among the great masterpieces of musical art which appeal to the initiated by their extraordinary cleverness, and to the larger public by their poetic meaning and power of arousing emotion. I have no hesitation in calling "A Hero's Life" a great masterpiece.

To begin with, no symphonic poem, except, perhaps, Richard Strauss's own "Death and Transfiguration," has seemed so clear in its meaning. This is caused, no doubt, by the nature of the subject. In many symphonic poems—in Richard Strauss's own "Don Juan" fantasia and "Till Eulenspiegel," for instance, and in Dvorak's series—music has attempted the impossible; it has pictured events and things; it has been realistic, in short. In "A Hero's Life" there is no such realism. The composer has taken the inner emotional life of a man for expression, and consequently there is no difficulty in grasping his meaning; it is all well within the psychological power of music, and is set forth legitimately. Strauss's hero is no swaggerer in the full sunshine of material heroism, but a man who makes a fight for his soul. In the very opening of the first section the hero's theme is heard. It is noble and tender, but not in any degree martial or aggressive. As the orchestra tells its tale we understand that the man is a hero because he has aspirations and the indomitable will and energy to realize them. What will the world hold for him? The reply soon [illegible] in the second section. "The Antagonists"—shrill envy (stupidly flippant little themes on the wood-wind), bickerings and fierce brutish growling beset his path. Against these he has to battle, and for a time there is discouragement, but no loss of purpose or nobility. The hero goes his way, and brushes aside his antagonists—but they are not to be so easily overcome.

As a pendant to this outside opposition there is strife within himself. The influence of woman comes into his life. At first it seems almost as bad as the cunning onslaught of his antagonists. A long-winded violin solo tells us that the hero can as little understand this new influence as his opponents understand him.

The solo is for a long while an empty capriccio, full of meaningless twists and turns, and maddening in its reiteration. The hero holds aloof; he does not understand; but gradually the music grows warmer and more passionate, although the violin solo still holds its incomprehensible way. At last the oboe sings a phrase—a love-phrase of infinite beauty and tenderness, and the violin, repeating it, responds. The hero has called and has found his mate. Beautiful is the love-music that follows—it is among the most beautiful music that has ever been given to the world. But what are those shrill discordant trumpet calls that break in on this dream? The call to action; the organized onslaught of the hero's antagonists.

He girds himself for battle, inspired with new strength by the love for his companion. And what a musical battle it is! Technically it is the development section of the work. Themes which we have already heard are hurled against each other; a new hero's theme makes itself heard against the din of the warfare; dissonances which should turn the hair of old-fashioned theorists grey assault the ears; and over all the maddening rhythm of the drums. As a piece of legitimate musical writing it is amazing; when a Berlioz or a Tchaikovsky desired to obtain something of the same effect they had recourse to unmusical tricks—Berlioz with his absurd augmentation of his orchestra by four brass bands; Tchaikovsky with his cannon in the "1812" overture. Strauss does it all by polyphony and by his knowledge of how to use the orchestra. To analyze this musical battle would be almost impossible, but there is really no need for analysis. The meaning of the music cannot be misunderstood. It may not be so, however, with the next section, which deals with the "Hero's Work of Peace"—for Strauss's hero is a creator, and not a mere destroyer. Quotations from his other works are made, and perhaps some listeners may not have understood the drift of it all. It is a wonderful piece of music-making, the continuation of this development begun in the "battle." The hero has conquered his foes in open fight, but the triumph has not brought peace; the battlefield has only been transferred from the outside to the inside—at least, so I read the music. He has not yet conquered himself. He has not risen above all this turmoil of the soul. The woman's love has brought peace, and is the one spot of brightness in his wounded memory.

But there is a greater peace to come, the peace of death. The hero passes away solemnly, and the orchestra triumphantly puts a full stop to his life.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE-NOVEMBER 22, 1908.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Willy Hess Soloist at the Symphony.

Conductor Fiedler Will Assist at Longy Club Concert.

Various Recitals of the Week—Current Gossip.

Concert master Willy Hess was the soloist of the sixth Symphony program, playing the unfamiliar D minor violin concerto by Bruch. There were two numbers by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, "A Song of Spring" and the symphonic poem, "Finland," both new to Boston, and the program closed with Beethoven's seventh symphony. The "Spring Song" is one of the imaginative, romantic pieces which permits fancy to conjure up pretty woodland scenes and to find in a melodic score meanings to suit the music. It is cleverly written, and the orchestra played in the sympathetic manner to be expected.

In a different vein is the same composer's "Finland," evidently a musical picture of some wanderer's return home. It opens with a restless theme in the brasses, which soon leads up to a quiet episode for the light strings, a strongly marked rhythm forming a background through nearly the whole movement. The finale is lofty in character, as if expressive of hope and final happiness for the exile. The various moods received proper musical illustration at Mr Fiedler's hands, the work of the brass contingent deserving favorable comment in particular. There was nothing in the number to tax the resources of the orchestra, though here and there are suggestions of Wagnerian influence.

Mr Hess chose for his violin solo the third concerto by Bruch. The three movements are greatly contrasted, the first being vigorous in treatment, the second deliciously tender, almost pathetic, and the last one mainly dance and song themes, light in character. Our first violinist gave a fine interpretation of the work. Lacking somewhat in the necessary vigor in portions of the first movement did not detract from the beauty of his execution, for his tone was pure and resonant. His skill in technique is too well known to call for mention.

In the second movement the exquisite quality of the violin part made the performance notably attractive, the dainty and appealing melodies being set forth in very beautiful harmonics in legato form. In the lighter themes of the finale Mr Hess did brilliant work. The soloist was tumultuously greeted before and during his performance.

Mr Fiedler read the Beethoven symphony in a manner worthy of high praise and conducted without a score. The opening was impressive, and conductor Fiedler retained the tone of joyousness all through the piece after the strenuous introductory measures. The tempos in the second part were perfectly adjusted and the "Apotheosis of the dance" was vividly displayed in dazzling brilliancy and verve by the orchestra in the finale.

Richard Strauss' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," will be the chief offering on this week's Symphony program. This great work, which is supposed to embody Strauss' idea of his own tumultuous musical career was performed under Mr Gericke in December, 1901. In sharp contrast with this work of Strauss will be the other orchestral number, the prelude and liebstod from "Tristan and Isolde." The soloist will be Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, who appears after an absence of two years. He will play Tschaikowsky's first concerto.

Miss Duncan's Dances.

Isadora Duncan will make her two postponed appearances in Jordan hall next Friday and Saturday evenings. The tickets sold for Nov 11 will be good for Nov 27, and those for Nov 12 will be good for Nov 28

On Friday evening she will give the program advertised for Nov 11. She will dance parts of Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis." On Saturday evening she will give her "Idyllic" dances.

Miss Duncan made her second appearance in New York at the Metropolitan opera house on last Saturday afternoon and again the capacity of the opera house was taxed to its utmost to hold all those who wished to see her. The injury to her foot was rather more serious than the physicians at first thought and she suffered considerable pain during her dances. She has, however, sent assurances that her foot is healing very rapidly and that it will be quite well by the time she comes to Boston.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:

NOVEMBER 22, 1908.

One of the chief violinists in the Boston symphony orchestra, Richard Czerwonky, gave a recital lately in Boston which brought out high praise for his skill as a virtuoso, though he played too many show pieces to please the critics. The beauty of his playing in a Handel sonata and a Viotta adagio, however, was extolled. He will give a second recital January 27.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1908

MUSICAL COMMENT

A NOTE ABOUT MR. HESS FOR A BEGINNING

The Exceptional Place That the Violinist Has Made for Himself Here—His Qualities in the Orchestra, in Chamber Concerts and as a Virtuoso—The Muscled Music of Sibelius—Mottl as an Orchestral Adapter — The Range and the Traits of Some of His Experiments, with an Example or Two from Recent Concerts — 1773 and 1908 — The Subconscious Calve—A Hint of the Repertory of the Boston Opera — Mme. Melba's Unusual Leave-Taking in London—Caruso's Record and Constantino's Return — Local Musical News

Wherever and whenever Mr. Hess plays, he is nervous tensity incarnate. His are the set and straining nerves of the thoroughbred, and perhaps, for that reason, he has made more individual impression upon the concert-going public here than any of his predecessors in the chair of the first violin in the Symphony Orchestra. It was easy to admire Mr. Kneisel a little impersonally and abstractly; admiration for Mr. Hess has a very concrete object. Bruch's concerto that he played on Saturday happens to begin with a considerable orchestral introduction, and through it Mr. Hess seemed the very image of nervous tensity. His body was as taut as a tightly strung wire with his desire to set to his work and to do his utmost at it. In one hand he grasped, rather than held, his violin. In the other was his bow, as rigidly erect and still as the ramrod or the walking stick of a drill sergeant. Not a muscle in Mr. Hess's body moved; not a feature changed; he was straining expectancy crystalized. Came the moment for the entry of the solo violin; and he was off and away like a thoroughbred given his head and touched with the spur. Mr. Hess does much—perhaps too much—but in whatever mood he may come to a task, once he is embarked upon it an irresistible impulse impels to do his utmost. He is always "keyed up"; he tightens himself nervously as he tightens the strings of his violin. The brilliance of his playing is a nervous brilliance; its fineness is a nervous fineness; the incessant undulation of his tone is, perhaps, the half-unconscious play of his acutely strung nerves. He has the power of a conductor like Mahler, of a singer like Fremstad, of a pianist like Gabrilowitsch, to give his more sensitive auditors as fine and keen a nervous thrill as that which is pricking him. It is an ultra-modern reaction (as the psychologists would say) in the listeners and in the performer. It is also the quality in Mr. Hess that saves the brilliance and the elegance of his playing from cloying.

It is this nervous tensity, this impulse to be always doing his utmost that makes Mr. Hess so efficient and influential a concert-master. He is not the easiest man with whom to keep the peace, as more than one conductor in Germany and in America has found; but those same conductors, as soon as they have cooled, testify warmly to his merits as the leader of their strings. He does not merely play solo or distinctive passages that fall to the first violin (as in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" or Wolf's "Italian Serenade") with exceeding vividness and poignancy; he steadily stimulates the men about him diffusing, as it were, a part of his nervous force, giving them something of his eagerness. There are concert-masters who chiefly steady their companions—Mr. Wendling was a recent example here; there are concert-masters who guide them as Mr. Kneisel did in his earlier years with the orchestra. Mr. Hess spurs them, as he spurs himself. He makes them for the moment as taut and sensitive as he.

On the other hand, the very traits that make Mr. Hess so brilliant as a virtuoso and so efficient as a concert-master tend to defeat him in an ambition that he cherishes no less—the leading of a string quartet. There, as everywhere, his thoroughbred instinct to be doing his best and his utmost pricks him onward; but there, by exception, it drives him to excess. Half instinctively, he pushes his violin to preponderance; he is fain to make it dominate the other three instruments and its part pervade the music in hand. The result is inevitable. The other players (as was the case too often at the first concert of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet) are stirred to an eager rivalry that wrecks all adjustment and euphony of tone; the whole performance turns feverish; and the nice proportions of the music are distorted. Everywhere but in his quartet it is the duty of Mr. Hess to assert himself, there it is incumbent on him to become a harmonious and sensitive part of a whole. It is a hard task for him. The undue, if unconscious, predominance of the first violin harmed many a piece that the Symphony Quartet played in Mr. Hess's first years here. There were signs in plenty, last Tuesday, that he had learned no new wisdom and gained no new restraint with the Hess-Schroeder Quartet. It is a pity. The rewards of balanced tone, of flawless euphony, of the community in all things, that are among the secrets of perfection in a string quartet ought to be as grateful to Mr. Hess as those of brilliancy as a virtuoso and exceptional efficiency as a concert-master. In all things Mr. Hess cannot help wishing to be primus—Fate gave him his temperament—but he has not yet learned that in a string quartet, he must be primus inter pares.

Fresh and interesting details of Sibelius's music that passed unheeded in the general impression of his two tone-poems on Friday afternoon stood clear in the repetition of Saturday. Recall, for example, the quick little jump of the orchestra at the beginning of "The Song of Spring," as though Sibelius would hint in the start at the flashes of hot sunshine cleaving the clouds, at the jets of warm air devouring the snow and setting the grasses almost in upward motion, with which the spring comes in one glorious instant in those high northern latitudes where he lives and works. "'T is here; 't is here; 't is gone," like the Ghost of Hamlet's father on the battlements of Elsinore. But the melancholy mood of the watcher will not yield to it, and Sibelius's tone-poem seemed at the second hearing no less than at the first an elegy, rather than a song, of the spring. None the less, like all his pieces that have been heard here in the past two years, "Värsäng" — and "Finlandia" as well — seemed curiously muscular music. Not muscular in the sense of physical power and stress as when the string choir of an orchestra lays on its bows and spares not, and the dutiful reviewers make speed to praise its muscularity. Sibelius's muscularity is not the muscularity of the big tone. The outline, the substance and the manner of the two tone-poems often give the same impression to the ear as to the eye, the tense, clear muscles of the stark and sinewy athlete who is all fine and quivering strength. Some modern music is sprawling; it wanders over what it would says and does not concentrate its sayings. More of it is inflated and exaggerated, as one or another sort of athlete may overdevelop a particular set of muscles. Sibelius's music, on the other hand, is very justly and very finely muscled. It is curiously sinewy music in its melodies, its harmonies, its instrumental coloring. Everything in it has a starkness, a tensity, a kind of youthful and unconscious masculinity. It is neither sensuous nor sensual. It is never feverishly emotional nor reflectively intellectual. It is rather music of the clear power, the deep reticences, and the finely strung intensity that dwell in the young athlete could he translate the impression of his muscles—by some miracle—into the impression of tones.

Felix Mottl, the eminent conductor and the director of the Munich Opera, is an industrious adapter of music for orchestra. Sometimes it is easy to believe that he must give all his leisure to such work, except when he is recounting for the fiftieth time his unhappy experiences at the Metropolitan in New York. Eighteenth-century dances by Gluck or Grétry or Rameau and modern piano pieces out of Liszt or Chabrier are all alike grist to his amplifying hand. He takes them as he finds them; strips them to the skeleton of melody and rhythm; and then reclothes their bones with the plentiful flesh and the pulsing blood of modern instrumentation. Sometimes he makes these transformations with almost uncanny skill and illusion. Chabrier never happened to rewrite his piano piece, the Bourrée Fantasque," for orchestra; but if he had chosen to do so, it would surely have sounded as Mottl makes it sound in his orchestral version that was played at Mr. Debuchy's concert last week. Recall Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody," as it has often been played here; recall the overture to "Gwendoline" and other fragments of his operas, and Mottl in his translation of the Bourrée, has caught the very idiosyncrasies, the very tricks, of Chabrier. The brass sounds as though Chabrier had written the parts for it; the imitation of the shrill piping of the musettes that played the bourrée as a folk dance is musical humor that would have tickled Chabrier to invent; the music is full of progressions and strokes of instrumental color that might be Chabrier's own. Above all, the transcription goes with the verbe, the ebullience, of all that Chabrier wrote. Mottl himself is of very different temperament, and he has made himself Chabrier by sheer dint of imagination.

Mottl cannot, or he will not, transform himself into a Grétry. The three dances that he has arranged from the Frenchman's "heroic ballet" of "Cephalus and Procris," and that Mr. Fiedler has played of late here and at Cambridge, are really much more of Mottl than of Grétry. They are agreeable to hear, but they do not sound like eighteenth-century music, with its cool, clear line and its fine, sober rhythm, and they sound still less like the sparkling and prattling Grétry. Mottl has really taken a melodic or a rhythmic idea or two from "Cephalus and Procris," and out of it built three dances of ancient form, but of very modern speech and raiment for an orchestra of numbers and sonorities of which Grétry never dreamed. They are cleverly interesting; they are good in their kind, but they are no more what they pretend to be than was Godowsky's transcription of a gigue by Loeillet, a minor composer of the eighteenth century, that Miss Willard played the other day. The original dance blushed almost unseen—or rather unheard—in the gaudy bed of flowery ornament in which Godowsky had set it. And to shift the figure, Grétry tinkled innocently now and then through Mottl's sonorities.

There is a golden mean with these eighteenth century dances in modern concert rooms, as there is with most other things. Even the ardent Dolmetski can no more restore the conditions under which "Cephalus and procris" was performed at Versailles and Paris in 1773 and 1775 than he can recall Sophie Arnould, who played the nymph, to life or revive in us who listen now the mood of those that saw and heard in Louis XV.'s court or in the boxes of the Opéra. A modern concert room replaces the little theatre of the palace; democracy sits in its rows of seats, its "rush" seats even, instead of kings in armchairs with the "court circle" about them. A broad platform has replaced the shallow, narrow, smoky stage; Grétry's little band is swallowed into a numerous orchestra. Now we hear the music under the dry clearness of electric lights; the court of the Well-Beloved—though he was hardly that in 1773—heard it through the soft lustre of candles. There is no "heroic ballet" for us to watch nowadays; and we should smile indeed were we to see Ovid's nymphs and swains, out of Greek legend, walking a minuet or prancing—decorously always—through a jig, in perukes and powder, lace and brocade. The music of the eighteenth century, outside that of a few everlasting and universal masters, like Bach and Mozart, must inevitably seem quaint to us of 1908, much or little as we may try to imagine its surroundings or the moods of those that heard it. For us it will have not only its intrinsic, but also an exotic charm. It does need strengthening, that it may sound at all in a modern concert-room, but it needs no such amplification and translation into another orchestral idiom as Mottl gave to these fragments of "Cephalus and Procris." As are the ample pergolas of the country houses of very rich men in the newest suburbs to the little weather-stained summer houses and "temples" that nestle in old Italian gardens, so are Mottl's dances to Grétry's.

BOSTON GLOBE-TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1908

FIRST LONGY CONCERT.

Conductor Max Fiedler and a String Orchestra Assist the Club of Wind Instrumentalists.

Last evening the ninth season of the Longy club of wind instruments opened in Potter hall with the following unique program: Falconi, sextet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano (first time); Handel, concerto for oboe with strings accompaniment; Caplet, suite "Persane" for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. Unfamiliar pieces these, and in the performance of the Handel concerto a string band of 14 assisted with conductor Max Fiedler courteously acting as director.

Mr Longy's associates are the same as last year, although Mr Maguarre did not appear and Mr Brooke took his place in the opening sextet, the latter requesting consideration because he had not seen the score until called upon to play it. Probably no one in the audience would have known this, for there was nothing in his performance of the flute part showing unfamiliarity with the work.

Mr Longy's programs only appeal to a small circle of concert-goers, but they are very interesting to the musical expert and admirer of compositions for wind instruments. The little band of players are artists of great ability, their close association for years enable them to give authoritative interpretations, and in their sphere there is no club in America, and but one or two abroad, that rank with them.

The oboe part in the concerto was delightfully performed by Mr Longy, his tones being clear and without the ear-piercing qualities so usual in oboes. Celerity in execution, a perfect understanding of his subject and a thorough command of the instrument made this selection particularly enjoyable, the strings helping greatly in filling in a contrasting background for a harmonious ensemble.

The other numbers were excellent examples of their kind, a bit monotonous in tonal expression may be, but artistic in performance and worth hearing. The audience was very enthusiastic, and judging from its composition duly appreciative of the evening's work.

CLE... 1 0810

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just made the first of its regular monthly trips, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In all of these cities except New York, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, appeared for the first time. His success with his audiences was a notable feature of the trip, and it seems certain now that he will be one of the most popular conductors the great orchestra has ever had.

It is interesting to note, in view of the many prophecies that have been made of a bad musical season, that the gross receipts of the orchestra for the six concerts on this trip were within $50 of what they were on the corresponding trip of last year.

On Monday night, November 9, the orchestra gave a concert in Princeton, which was the first time it had ever played in that university town.

The next novelty of great interest which Mr. Fiedler is to bring out is Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

BOSTON JOURNAL—TUESDAY.

NOVEMBER 24, 1908

LONGY CLUB PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Max Fiedler and Symphony Players' Assist at Season's First Concert.

The first concert of the Longy Club was given last night in Potter Hall and a good-sized audience turned out in anticipation of what proved to be one of the most satisfactory concerts given by the organization.

The usual three numbers composed the program, the first Falconi's E-flat sextet for five wind instruments and piano, the four movements played without interruption. This was a first-time performance of the sextet, and excepting a slight seeming incoherence in the first movement the audience evidently liked the curious involved phrasing and surprising nuances of the Italian. In this, as in the following numbers, the oboe playing of Mr. Longy was by far the distinctive feature.

The second number, another first performance, was Handel's concerto for the oboe with string accompaniment, preeminently the event of the evening. The assisting artists, fourteen players from the Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Fiedler, accompanied Mr. Longy. The third number was Caplet's Persian suite for wind instruments.

That last night's program was more than sufficient was evident by the enthusiasm evoked by the concerto, and in the applause following its close Mr. Fiedler was both first and last. The second concert of this season, the ninth in the history of the club, will take place on Dec. 21.

BOSTON TRAVELER. MONDAY. NOVEMBER 23, 1908.

MUSICAL EVENTS

RICHARD STRAUSS' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenelben," will be the offering on next week's symphony programme. This great work, which is supposed to embody Strauss' idea of his own tumuultous musical career, has appeared only once on Symphony programmes, having been played under Mr. Gericke on Dec. 6 and 7, 1901—just short of eight years ago.

It is an interesting fact that Paur gave it in New York that season four times at two different pairs of Philharmonic concerts. In the same season Mr. Gericke played it in Boston, he played it in New York with great success.

It will be particularly interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the Strauss tone-poem, for he is regarded as a specialist on Strauss' music. In sharp contrast with this work of Strauss will be the other orchestral number, the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." This very popular excerpt from Wagner's great love drama has not been heard at a symphony concert in several years.

The soloist will be Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, who appears after an absence of two years. He will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor.

The first concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter's Hall this evening. The concert gains great interest from the fact that Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will appear as the assisting artist.

The first Pension Fund Concert of the present year will be given in Symphony Hall on Suday evening, Dec. 1. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a programme which promises much in the way of interesting music.

From LIFE. Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 14 1908

FRIDAY evening of last week should be memorable in the musical annals of Brooklyn as marking what might almost be called a renascence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Not that the five years elapsed since the destruction of the old Academy of Music have had any effect upon the orchestra itself—which, indeed, seems to possess the secret of perpetual perfection, modified only by the art or idiosyncrasies of its various conductors—but certainly, by contrast with the gatherings of the faithful at the Baptist Temple—even during the regime of the extremely popular Karl Muck—the audience at the first concert of the season last week made the five years interregnum seem like a period of musical desuetude in this borough. The concert last week reminded one of the palmiest days of the Philharmonic Society at the old Academy, with practically every seat, from the lowest in the orchestra to the highest in the top gallery, occupied, and what a difference in point of comfort and appointments! If ample opportunities had not already been afforded for satisfying it, the large attendance might be attributed to curiosity to see, and judge of, the merits of the new auditorium; but neither this nor the interest the first appearance of a new conductor might arouse would seem to account for the increased attendance, but rather the opportunity to hear the great orchestra in its entirety and to the best advantage. Of course, great interest was manifested in the new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, and inevitably his energetic method and more daring interpretation invited comparisons more or less odious or flattering, as the case might be, with his predecessor, who undoubtedly enjoyed the advantage of an exceptionally engaging personality and singular grace. As to the relative abilities of the two men in the art of interpretation, that may well be left to the critics. At any rate the program last week was interpreted in a manner which called forth as enthusiastic approval as a Brooklyn audience is ever wont to manifest. The Brahms symphony in C minor, which was, perhaps, the crucial number, was so played as to hold the attention of even the uninitiated until the last grand movement, which must needs stir the dullest musical sensibilities, was reached; while to the Brahms cult it was regarded as an exceptional treat. The Beethoven overture Leonore No. 3, familiar as it is, was invested with rare charm, while the "Tannhäuser" overture was rendered with a fire and abandon which brought the evening to a close in a blaze of glory. The third number representing the nouveau art in music, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot," was also a signally brilliant performance.

THE welcome change from the Baptist Temple to the new Academy brought about an agreeable improvement in the appearance of the audience. In the orchestra stalls, at least, evening dress was the rule and it is to be hoped that out of respect for the dignity of these concerts this feature may become more rather than less marked as time goes on. The audience, as usual, was representative of the borough as a whole. The only unoccupied seats that were noticeable were in the boxes. Mrs. Max Fiedler, Miss Caroline Beebe and Mr. Edward Dethier were the guests of honor in the upper proscenium box next the stage on the left, which Mrs. John Van Nostrand, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. George W. Chauncey and Mrs. Henry R. Mallory have engaged for the season. Mrs. Mallory is still at Port Chester and her seats in the box were occupied by Miss Beebe and Mr. Dethier. The adjoining box was occupied by the Misses Dorothea, Katharine and Mary Dreier, who had as guests Miss Madeleine S. Litchfield and Miss Maud Bartlett. Mrs. Arthur Wellington Foote, who invariably attends the Symphony concerts, was the sole occupant of the lower right-hand box nearest the stage, In the large audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Mr. Huntington Woodman, the Rev. Dr. L. Mason Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. Crowell Hadden, Mrs. John F. Praeger, Colonel Robert B. Woodward, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Stevens, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Mr. Matthew J. Hinman, Miss Hinman, Miss Orr, Miss Terry, the Rev. E. B. Terry, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Alden S. Swan, Dr. and Mrs. Dudley D. Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic W. Hinrichs, Miss Packer, the Misses Merritt, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell and Mr. and Mrs. W. McK. Miller.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

THE TRIBUNE

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date NOV 15 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Providence Concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Following the custom that has prevailed for several years past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the coming winter three evening concerts in Providence. As in former years, the concerts will be given in Infantry Hall. This year they wil be given on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2. The sale of season tickets for these concerts opens at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, tomorrow morning, and will continue until Saturday, when the sale of tickets for the first concert will begin. The prices are the same as in past years.

The management of the orchestra will offer a soloist of first rank at each one of these three concerts. At the first concert, the assisting artist will be Lila Ormond, the American contralto, who has had such brilliant success this year and last with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as at the last Worcester festival and at several appearances in New York. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Lhevinne, the greatest of living Russian pianists, a man of whom, it is said, the mantle of Rubinstein has fallen. He needs no introduction to Providence as he has appeared here in recital and it is only necessary to say that all accounts about his playing in New York seem to show that his art this year is even greater than it was two years ago.

The soloist for the last concert in February cannot now be announced. A brilliant American pianist had been engaged for the occasion, but owing to illness, she is compelled to cancel all engagements for the winter. The management promises, however, that whoever the assisting artist may be, the public will be thoroughly satisfied.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 23 last and on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that his career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six, eight and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter.

These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought-after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Turin, Berlin and Dresden.

Mr. Fiedler's success has been fully up to the highest expectations of his friends. He has shown himself to be a conductor of great authority; a great musician of sound and well-schooled judgment; and an artist of catholic taste. He has been most successful in the building of his programmes and wherever he has appeared with the orchestra, he has aroused great enthusiasm.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany is again at the first desk as concert-master, and associated with him as second concert-master, is Sylvian Noack, who for several years was the second concert-master of the celebrated Amsterdam Orchestra. There are two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon, and a new double bass.

1884

THE BOSTON HERALD

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1908.

FIRST CONCERT OF THE LONGY CLUB

Ninth Season Opened in Potter Hall; Admirable Playing of Handel's Concerto.

ORCHESTRA OF STRINGS LED BY MR. FIEDLER

Mr. Brooke Takes the Place in Sextet Left Vacant by Absence of Mr. D. Maquarre.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first concert of the ninth season of the Longy Club was given last night in Potter Hall. The program was as follows: Falconi, Sextet in E flat, op. 30, for piano, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Handel, Concerto for oboe; Caplet, "Persian" suite for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. The club was assisted by an orchestra of strings for Handel's concerto and Mr. Fiedler led it. There was a good-sized and most applausive audi-

Mr. Brooke, a few minutes after the hour appointed for beginning the concert, told the audience that Mr. D. Maquarre, the first flute, had not arrived, and that he (Mr. Brooke) would play the flute part in Falconi's sextet, although he had not seen it. Mr. Brooke is an excellent musician, so the audience was not seriously disturbed; but Caplet's suite calls for two flutes, one of them interchangeable with piccolo, and no flutist, however skilful he may be, can play two flutes or even one flute and a piccolo at the same time. Mr. Longy, no doubt, looked out at a window like the mother of Sisera and cried through the lattice; "Why is Mr. Maquarre's chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?" But Mr. Maquarre did not come, and the suite was played with nine wind instruments instead of the decreed 10.

Almost 20 years ago piano pieces by Alfonso Falconi were published in this city. Falconi was then living in Florence. These piano pieces are gracefully written and they have a certain harmonic piquancy. Perhaps the Longy Club was a little depressed last evening by the absence of the first flute; perhaps the fault was in the music of the sextet itself; whatever the cause, this sextet as performed had little distinction except in the ingenious use of the instruments for the purpose of obtaining effects of color. The themes have little profile and there is the thought of laborious construction rather than of spontaneous ideas with consequent and flowing development.

Falconi's sextet was played here for the first time. Caplet's suite has been heard here before and it gains by repeated hearings. The first two movements are the best. The opening of the first movement is singularly impressive and the whole of this movement and the second are interesting melodically and harmonically. It matters not whether any theme be strictly Persian or not: the orientalism of a westerner is often more exotic than is the simon pure folk song of the East. Caplet's exoticism is not merely something unexpected, bizarre. It is apparently natural to him, as though the roses of Ispahan bloomed and were fragrant in his back garden. The third movement is not so euphonious, not so imaginative. It should be remembered however that an instrument was lacking in the performance.

The feature of the evening was the performance of Handel's concerto by Mr. Longy and his assistants. The exquisite art of Mr. Longy has long been recognized. It is always a cause for rejoicing, whether it be displayed in the orchestra or on the too rare occasions when he plays solos at the concerts of his club. It was a great pleasure to hear last night the stately and tender music of Handel, one of the few great melodists, a man to be ranked in this respect with Mozart, Rossini, Schubert, Verdi, Wagner. Both in the florid passages and in the beautiful sarabande Mr. Longy was always the poetic master of his instrument. By the way, what a pity it is that the word oboe ever drove out hautboy.

The second concert of the club will take place on Dec. 21.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Daily Eagle,
From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 21 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 4, at 8:15 o'clock. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, with which Mr. Fiedler won so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Osip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto in A major.

1884

[97]

BOSTON JOURNAL—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1908.

LONGY CLUB PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Max Fiedler and Symphony Players Assist at Season's First Concert.

The first concert of the Longy Club was given last night in Potter Hall and a good-sized audience turned out in anticipation of what proved to be one of the most satisfactory concerts given by the organization.

The usual three numbers composed the program, the first Falconi's E-flat sextet for five wind instruments and piano, the four movements played without interruption. This was a first-time performance of the sextet, and excepting a slight seeming incoherence in the first movement the audience evidently liked the curious involved phrasing and surprising nuances of the Italian. In this, as in the following numbers, the oboe playing of Mr. Longy was by far the distinctive feature.

The second number, another first performance, was Handel's concerto for the oboe with string accompanment, preeminently the event of the evening. The assisting artists, fourteen players from the Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Fiedler, accompanied Mr. Longy. The third number was Caplet's Persian suite for wind instruments.

That last night's program was more than sufficient was evident by the enthusiasm evoked by the concerto, and in the applause following its close Mr. Fiedler was both first and last. The second concert of this season, the ninth in the history of the club, will take place on Dec. 21.

BOSTON TRAVELER, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1908.

MUSICAL EVENTS

RICHARD STRAUSS' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenelben," will be the offering on next week's symphony programme. This great work, which is supposed to embody Strauss' idea of his own tumuultous musical career, has appeared only once on Symphony programmes, having been played under Mr. Gericke on Dec. 6 and 7, 1901—just short of eight years ago.

It is an interesting fact that Paur gave it in New York that season four times at two different pairs of Philharmonic concerts. In the same season Mr. Gericke played it in Boston, he played it in New York with great success.

It will be particularly interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the Strauss tone-poem, for he is regarded as a specialist on Strauss' music. In sharp contrast with this work of Strauss will be the other orchestral number, the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." This very popular excerpt from Wagner's great love drama has not been heard at a symphony concert in several years.

The soloist will be Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, who appears after an absence of two years. He will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor.

The first concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter's Hall this evening. The concert gains great interest from the fact that Mr. Fielder, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will appear as the assisting artist.

The first Pension Fund Concert of the present year will be given in Symphony Hall on Suday evening, Dec. 1. Mr. Fielder has arranged a programme which promises much in the way of interesting music.

THE BOSTON HERALD—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1908.

FIRST CONCERT OF THE LONGY CLUB

Ninth Season Opened in Potter Hall; Admirable Playing of Handel's Concerto.

ORCHESTRA OF STRINGS LED BY MR. FIEDLER

Mr. Brooke Takes the Place in Sextet Left Vacant by Absence of Mr. D. Maquarre.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first concert of the ninth season of the Longy Club was given last night in Potter Hall. The program was as follows: Falconi, Sextet in E flat, op. 80, for piano, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Handel, Concerto for oboe; Caplet, "Persian" suite for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. The club was assisted by an orchestra of strings for Handel's concerto and Mr. Fiedler led it. There was a good-sized and most applausive audience.

Mr. Brooke, a few minutes after the hour appointed for beginning the concert, told the audience that Mr. D. Maquarre, the first flute, had not arrived, and that he (Mr. Brooke) would play the flute part in Falconi's sextet, although he had not seen it. Mr. Brooke is an excellent musician, so the audience was not seriously disturbed; but Caplet's suite calls for two flutes, one of them interchangeable with piccolo, and no flutist, however skilful he may be, can play two flutes or even one flute and a piccolo at the same time. Mr. Longy, no doubt, looked out at a window like the mother of Sisera and cried through the lattice; "Why is Mr. Maquarre's chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?" But Mr. Maquarre did not come, and the suite was played with nine wind instruments instead of the decreed 10.

Almost 20 years ago piano pieces by Alfonso Falconi were published in this city. Falconi was then living in Florence. These piano pieces are gracefully written and they have a certain harmonic piquancy. Perhaps the Longy Club was a little depressed last evening by the absence of the first flute; perhaps the fault was in the music of the sextet itself; whatever the cause, this sextet as performed had little distinction except in the ingenious use of the instruments for the purpose of obtaining effects of color. The themes have little profile and there is the thought of laborious construction rather than of spontaneous ideas with consequent and flowing development.

Falconi's sextet was played here for the first time. Caplet's suite has been heard here before and it gains by repeated hearings. The first two movements are the best. The opening of the first movement is singularly impressive and the whole of this movement and the second are interesting melodically and harmonically. It matters not whether any theme be strictly Persian or not: the orientalism of a westerner is often more exotic than is the simon pure folk song of the East. Caplet's exoticism is not merely something unexpected, bizarre. It is apparently natural to him, as though the roses of Ispahan bloomed and were fragrant in his back garden. The third movement is not so euphonious, not so imaginative. It should be remembered however that an instrument was lacking in the performance.

The feature of the evening was the performance of Handel's concerto by Mr. Longy and his assistants. The exquisite art of Mr. Longy has long been recognized. It is always a cause for rejoicing, whether it be displayed in the orchestra or on the too rare occasions when he plays solos at the concerts of his club. It was a great pleasure to hear last night the stately and tender music of Handel, one of the few great melodists, a man to be ranked in this respect with Mozart, Rossini, Schubert, Verdi, Wagner. Both in the florid passages and in the beautiful sarabande Mr. Longy was always the poetic master of his instrument. By the way, what a pity it is that the word oboe ever drove out hautboy.

The second concert of the club will take place on Dec. 21.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

FRIDAY evening of last week should be memorable in the musical annals of Brooklyn as marking what might almost be called a renascence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Not that the five years elapsed since the destruction of the old Academy of Music have had any effect upon the orchestra itself—which, indeed, seems to possess the secret of perpetual perfection, modified only by the art or idiosyncrasies of its various conductors—but certainly, by contrast with the gatherings of the faithful at the Baptist Temple—even during the regime of the extremely popular Karl Muck—the audience at the first concert of the season last week made the five years interregnum seem like a period of musical desuetude in this borough. The concert last week reminded one of the palmiest days of the Philharmonic Society at the old Academy, with practically every seat, from the lowest in the orchestra to the highest in the top gallery, occupied, and what a difference in point of comfort and appointments! If ample opportunities had not already been afforded for satisfying it, the large attendance might be attributed to curiosity to see, and judge of, the merits of the new auditorium; but neither this nor the interest the first appearance of a new conductor might arouse would seem to account for the increased attendance, but rather the opportunity to hear the great orchestra in its entirety and to the best advantage. Of course, great interest was manifested in the new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, and inevitably his energetic method and more daring interpretation invited comparisons more or less odious or flattering, as the case might be, with his predecessor, who undoubtedly enjoyed the advantage of an exceptionally engaging personality and singular grace. As to the relative abilities of the two men in the art of interpretation, that may well be left to the critics. At any rate the program last week was interpreted in a manner which called forth as enthusiastic approval as a Brooklyn audience is ever wont to manifest. The Brahms symphony in C minor, which was, perhaps, the crucial number, was so played as to hold the attention of even the uninitiated until the last grand movement, which must needs stir the dullest musical sensibilities, was reached; while to the Brahms cult it was regarded as an exceptional treat. The Beethoven overture Leonore No. 3, familiar as it is, was invested with rare charm, while the "Tannhäuser" overture was rendered with a fire and abandon which brought the evening to a close in a blaze of glory. The third number representing the nouveau art in music, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot," was also a signally brilliant performance.

THE welcome change from the Baptist Temple to the new Academy brought about an agreeable improvement in the appearance of the audience. In the orchestra stalls, at least, evening dress was the rule and it is to be hoped that out of respect for the dignity of these concerts this feature may become more rather than less marked as time goes on. The audience, as usual, was representative of the borough as a whole. The only unoccupied seats that were noticeable were in the boxes. Mrs. Max Fiedler, Miss Caroline Beebe and Mr. Edward Dethier were the guests of honor in the upper proscenium box next the stage on the left, which Mrs. John Van Nostrand, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. George W. Chauncey and Mrs. Henry R. Mallory have engaged for the season. Mrs. Mallory is still at Port Chester and her seats in the box were occupied by Miss Beebe and Mr. Dethier. The adjoining box was occupied by the Misses Dorothea, Katharine and Mary Dreier, who had as guests Miss Madeleine S. Litchfield and Miss Maud Bartlett. Mrs. Arthur Wellington Foote, who invariably attends the Symphony concerts, was the sole occupant of the lower right-hand box nearest the stage. In the large audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Mr. Huntington Woodman, the Rev. Dr. L. Mason Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. Crowell Hadden, Mrs. John F. Praeger, Colonel Robert B. Woodward, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Stevens, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Mr. Matthew J. Hinman, Miss Hinman, Miss Orr, Miss Terry, the Rev. E. B. Terry, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Alden S. Swan, Dr. and Mrs. Dudley D. Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic W. Hinrichs, Miss Packer, the Misses Merritt, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell and Mr. and Mrs. W. McK. Miller.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Providence Concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Following the custom that has prevailed for several years past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the coming winter three evening concerts in Providence. As in former years, the concerts will be given in Infantry Hall. This year they wil be given on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2. The sale of season tickets for these concerts opens at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, tomorrow morning, and will continue until Saturday, when the sale of tickets for the first concert will begin. The prices are the same as in past years.

The management of the orchestra will offer a soloist of first rank at each one of these three concerts. At the first concert, the assisting artist will be Lilla Ormond, the American contralto, who has had such brilliant success this year and last with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as at the last Worcester festival and at several appearances in New York. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Lhevinne, the greatest of living Russian pianists, a man on whom, it is said, the mantle of Rubinstein has fallen. He needs no introduction to Providence as he has appeared here in recital and it is only necessary to say that all accounts about his playing in New York seem to show that his art this year is even greater than it was two years ago.

The soloist for the last concert in February cannot now be announced. A brilliant American pianist had been engaged for the occasion, but owing to illness, she is compelled to cancel all engagements for the winter. The management promises, however, that whoever the assisting artist may be, the public will be thoroughly satisfied.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years service with the orche made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most importan, and by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29 last and on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that his career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six, eight and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter.

These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years, Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought-after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Turin, Berlin and Dresden.

Mr. Fiedler's success has been fully up to the highest expectations of his friends. He has shown himself to be a conductor of great authority; a great muscian of sound and well-schooled judgment; and an artist of catholic taste. He has been most successful in the building of his programmes and wherever he has appeared with the orchestra, he has aroused great enthusiasm.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany is again at the first desk as concert-master, and associated with him as second concert-master, is Sylvian Noack, who for several years was the second concert-master of the celebrated Amsterdam Orchestra. There are two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon, and a new double bass.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

Date ..... NOV 21 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 4, at 8:15 o'clock. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, with which Mr. Fiedler won so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto in A major.

1884

[87]

MAJOR HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

FROM A PAINTING BY JOHN S. SARGENT

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The next Philharmonic Concert by THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA falls on the evening of December 4th. The programme, like that given on November 6th, is an excellent example of the ability of Mr. MAX FIEDLER in the difficult field of programme making.

The coming of this BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA to Brooklyn year after year must raise in our mind the question whence it comes. We say from Boston. But there are orchestras in New York, in Philadelphia, in Pittsburgh and in Chicago, and yet the standard by which all other orchestras are measured is that which has been created in Boston under the successful direction of GEORG HENSCHEL, ARTHUR NIKISCH, EMIL PAUR, WILHELM GERICKE, KARL MUCK and MAX FIEDLER; which has been managed by Mr. CHARLES A. ELLIS and Mr. FREDERICK R. COMEE; which is composed of musicians selected with the greatest care and without consideration of cost in Europe and in America and which has been supported with the one end in view that the Orchestra may produce the best possible symphonic music. And yet the question whence comes THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is not answered.

Its founder, its creator, its supporter—the man who has set for himself the highest ideal in musical art, is so modest, so retiring, that he does not wish to have his name mentioned in connection with the Orchestra. It is from that man that THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA comes.

Massachusetts and New York have furnished many strong men in the service of the state and of the country, and no state stronger men than those from Massachusetts. And if to-day we were to ask ourselves who are the three strongest men in Massachusetts the answer would be CHARLES W. ELIOT, President of Harvard University, GEORGE A. GORDON, Pastor of the Old South Church on Copley Square, and the FOUNDER of THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The first is our most revered, our greatest university president, whose services to the cause of public education in this country are second only to those of HORACE MANN, whose services in the cause of higher education are supreme—scholar, educator, statesman, the great Puritan president of our oldest university. The second, the Rev. Dr. GEORGE A. GORDON, holds much the same place in Massachusetts that was held by PHILIPS BROOKS a quarter of a century ago, is the great Puritan preacher of this country. And the third, the quiet unknown man, born in New York, a student of letters at Harvard University and of music in Munich and Leipsic; a soldier in the War of the Rebellion, severely wounded; a Boston businessman, whose services to his city, to HARVARD UNIVERSITY, to the country, and to the cause of good music would make a chapter in our history containing a great lesson. But that chapter cannot now be written. All that we in Brooklyn can do is to appreciate the Orchestra; realize that it has a founder and sustainer, and ourselves do all in our power in the interest of the education of all the people in good music.

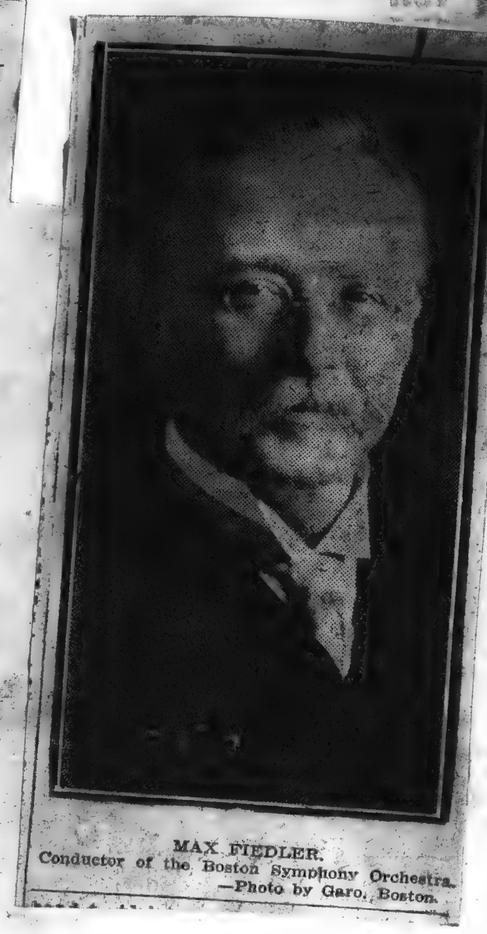
From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 21 1908

Friday evening, Dec. 4, is the date set for the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Feidler, conductor, at the Academy.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 22 1908

1884



MAX FIEDLER.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
—Photo by Garo, Boston.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 21 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony with which Mr. Fiedler won so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto, in A Major.

1884

From PRESS
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date NOV 22 1908

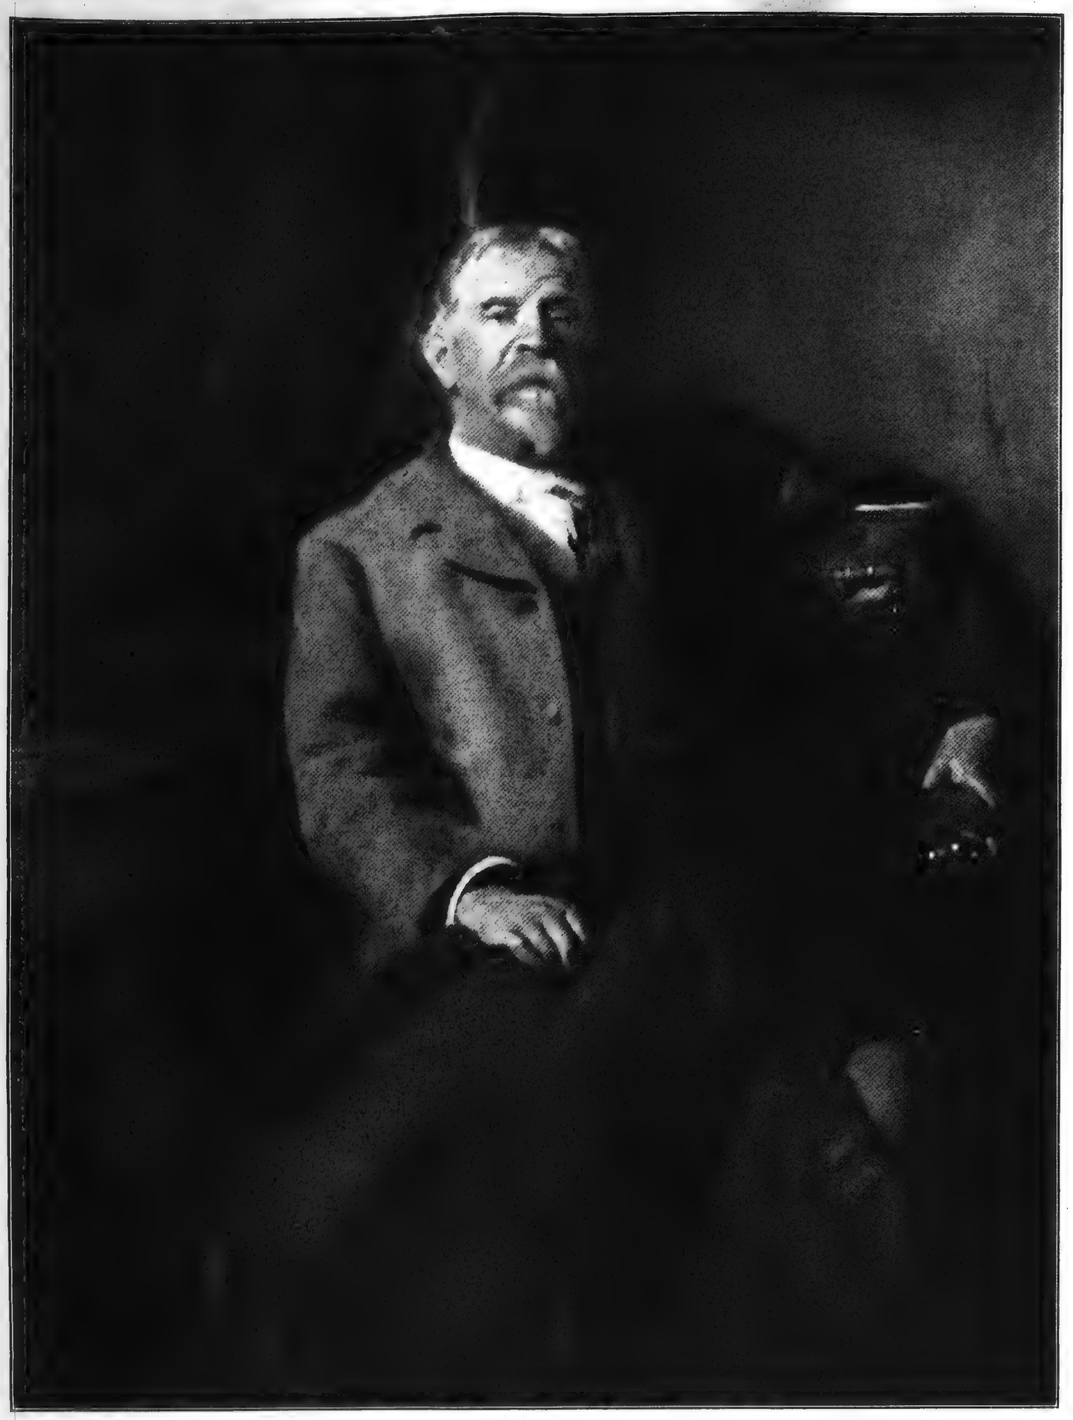
Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of its series of five in the Academy of Music a week from to-morrow evening, November 30, at 8.15. The soloist on this occasion will be Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Madame Rappold has sung with the orchestra with great success in Boston and her appearance with that organization here will be looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the patrons of the concerts. The seat sale for the concert begins to-morrow morning at 1115 Chestnut Street.

[88]

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 22

Henry Hadley's "Salome," which he calls in the manuscript "a tone poem, for full orchestra, after Oscar Wilde's tragedy," will be played by the Philharmonic Society under Wassily Safonoff at its concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan. The work was published in Berlin in 1906, although the composer wrote to H. E. Krehbiel that, inspired by a performance of Wilde's tragedy witnessed in Germany, he had composed the poem before the production of Richard Strauss' opera of the same name at the Dresden in 1905. The score is dedicated to the composer's father, and was first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Muck, last April. The composer, who is now a conductor at the opera house in Mayence, where one of his operas is to be produced this season, is not a stranger to Philharmonic audiences. On Dec. 20 and 21, 1901, his symphony, "The Four Seasons," which had carried off the Paderewski prize two months before, was performed under the direction of Emil Baur. A ballet suite of his composition was brought out at a concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, in Chickering Hall, Manhattan, on March 24, 1897; a cantata, entitled, "In Music's Praise," was performed by the People's Choral Union in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, in April, 1901, and at a concert of his compositions arranged by himself in the Waldorf-Astoria in 1900, which Mr. Seidl conducted, the "Four Seasons" symphony and two movements of a symphony entitled "Youth and Life" were heard. Henry K. Hadley was born in Somerville, Mass., in 1871. His father is a musician, and gave the first care to his education, sending him afterwards to Boston, where he studied counterpoint with George W. Chadwick, harmony with Stephen Emery and violin with Henry Heindl and Charles Allen. He then went to Vienna, where he became the pupil in composition of Eusebius Mandyczewski. Mme. Rider-Kelsey, who is to be the soloist of these concerts, will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice." The programme will begin with Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," and conclude with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, A major.



MAJOR HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

FROM A PAINTING BY JOHN S. SARGENT

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The next Philharmonic Concert by THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA falls on the evening of December 4th. The programme, like that given on November 6th, is an excellent example of the ability of Mr. MAX FIEDLER in the difficult field of programme making.

The coming of this BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA to Brooklyn year after year must raise in our mind the question whence it comes. We say from Boston. But there are orchestras in New York, in Philadelphia, in Pittsburgh and in Chicago, and yet the standard by which all other orchestras are measured is that which has been created in Boston under the successful direction of GEORG HENSCHEL, ARTHUR NIKISCH, EMIL PAUR, WILHELM GERICKE, KARL MUCK and MAX FIEDLER; which has been managed by Mr. CHARLES A. ELLIS and Mr. FREDERICK R. COMEE; which is composed of musicians selected with the greatest care and without consideration of cost in Europe and in America and which has been supported with the one end in view that the Orchestra may produce the best possible symphonic music. And yet the question whence comes THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is not answered.

Its founder, its creator, its supporter—the man who has set for himself the highest ideal in musical art, is so modest, so retiring, that he does not wish to have his name mentioned in connection with the Orchestra. It is from that man that THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA comes.

Massachusetts and New York have furnished many strong men in the service of the state and of the country, and no state stronger men than those from Massachusetts. And if to-day we were to ask ourselves who are the three strongest men in Massachusetts the answer would be CHARLES W. ELIOT, President of Harvard University, GEORGE A. GORDON, Pastor of the Old South Church on Copley Square, and the FOUNDER of THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The first is our most revered, our greatest university president, whose services to the cause of public education in this country are second only to those of HORACE MANN, whose services in the cause of higher education are supreme—scholar, educator, statesman, the great Puritan president of our oldest university. The second, the Rev. Dr. GEORGE A. GORDON, holds much the same place in Massachusetts that was held by PHILIPS BROOKS a quarter of a century ago, is the great Puritan preacher of this country. And the third, the quiet unknown man, born in New York, a student of letters at Harvard University and of music in Munich and Leipsic; a soldier in the War of the Rebellion, severely wounded; a Boston businessman, whose services to his city, to HARVARD UNIVERSITY, to the country, and to the cause of good music would make a chapter in our history containing a great lesson. But that chapter cannot now be written. All that we in Brooklyn can do is to appreciate the Orchestra; realize that it has a founder and sustainer, and ourselves do all in our power in the interest of the education of all the people in good music.

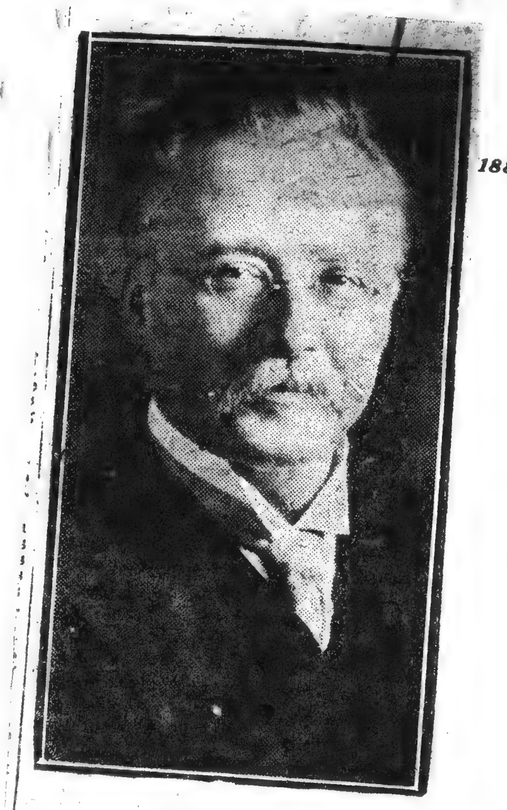
From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 21 1908

Friday evening, Dec. 4, is the date set for the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Feidler, conductor, at the Academy.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date



MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
—Photo by Garo, Boston.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 21 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony with which Mr. Fiedler won so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto, in A Major.

Estab 1884

From
Address
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of its series of five in the Academy of Music a week from to-morrow evening, November 30, at 8.15. The soloist on this occasion will be Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Madame Rappold has sung with the orchestra with great success in Boston and her appearance with that organization here will be looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the patrons of the concerts. The seat sale for the concert begins to-morrow morning at 115 Chestnut Street.

[88]

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 22

Henry Hadley's "Salome," which he calls in the manuscript "'a tone poem, for full orchestra, after Oscar Wilde's tragedy," will be played by the Philharmonic Society under Wassily Safonoff at its concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan. The work was published in Berlin in 1906, although the composer wrote to H. E. Krehbiel that, inspired by a performance of Wilde's tragedy witnessed in Germany, he had composed the poem before the production of Richard Strauss' opera of the same name at the Dresden in 1905. The score is dedicated to the composer's father, and was first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Muck, last April. The composer, who is now a conductor at the opera house in Mayence, where one of his operas is to be produced this season, is not a stranger to Philharmonic audiences. On Dec. 20 and 21, 1901, his symphony, "The Four Seasons," which had carried off the Paderewski prize two months before, was performed under the direction of Emil Baur. A ballet suite of his composition was brought out at a concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, in Chickering Hall, Manhattan, on March 24, 1897; a cantata, entitled, "In Music's Praise," was performed by the People's Choral Union in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, in April, 1901, and at a concert of his compositions arranged by himself in the Waldorf-Astoria in 1900, which Mr. Seidl conducted, the "Four Seasons" symphony and two movements of a symphony entitled "Youth and Life" were heard. Henry K. Hadley was born in Somerville, Mass., in 1871. His father is a musician, and gave the first care to his education, sending him afterwards to Boston, where he studied counterpoint with George W. Chadwick, harmony with Stephen Emery and violin with Henry Heindl and Charles Allen. He then went to Vienna, where he became the pupil in composition of Eusebius Mandyczewski. Mme. Rider-Kelsey, who is to be the soloist of these concerts, will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice." The programme will begin with Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," and conclude with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, A major.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
ess NEW YORK CITY
NOV 23 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Emil Sauer will make his only appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Saturday matinee concert.

NEW YORK CITY
NOV 21 '08

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVUE.
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 22 1908

Der Plan, das N. Y. Philharmonische Orchester mit einem neuen permanenten Orchester zu vereinigen, das nach dem Vorbilde des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gebildet wird, kommt seiner Verwirklichung immer näher. Wahrscheinlich wird der Titel „N. Y. philharmonisches Orchester" beibehalten werden, doch verlautet aus sicherer Quelle, daß Gustav Mahler die Leitung der neuen Vereinigung übernehmen wird. Wie Herr Richard Arnold, der Concertmeister der Philharmonischen Gesellschaft einem Vertreter d. Bl. mittheilte, sind Verhandlungen mit dem oben erwähnten Endzwecke schon seit längerer Zeit im Gange. Hoffentlich führen sie auch zum glücklichen Ziel.

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 22 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony with which Mr. Fiedler was so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto in A major.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall am 3. Dezember Abend und am 5. Dezember Nachmittag statt. Als Solisten fungiren die Pianisten Herr Ossip Gabrilowitsch in dem einen und Herr Emil Sauer in dem anderen.

York, 1884

TWO IDEALS IN MUSIC

Among our National institutions it is not unjustifiable to include that superb organization the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is true that its members are almost all of foreign origin, but all Americans and American institutions are ultimately derived from Europe; it is true that it has a definite location in Boston, but it is not quite so firmly fixed there as that other National institution, Faneuil Hall; it is true that it owes its existence to private munificence, but so do universities and art galleries which are National in character and influence. What we mean by calling the Boston Symphony Orchestra a National institution is simply this: that if a foreigner were to ask what would be regarded in America as approaching more nearly than anything else the highest American standards of musical excellence, he would not be misled if he were instructed to hear for a season the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is all but universally acknowledged. It is a very great distinction. When, therefore, a new conductor comes to direct that great orchestra, no one who cares how art prospers in this country can be wholly unconcerned.

This fall Mr. Max Fiedler, who has come to America from Hamburg, has succeeded to the office filled successively by Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Gericke again, and Muck. Unlike his predecessors, who, with the exception of Mr. Henschel, have all been conductors of opera, Mr. Fiedler has received all his experience in the concert room; yet no one of them all has had a more dramatic conception of music than he has displayed. Indeed, in dependence for effect upon strong contrasts and stirring climaxes, Mr. Fiedler seems to differ from them all. He has already conducted a number of concerts in Boston and other cities, and he has created in the minds of different kinds of critical listeners much the same impression. That impression has proved unpleasant or agreeable in accordance with the listeners' musical taste.

There are two extremes toward the one or the other of which almost every conductor tends. At one extreme is the conductor who exalts beauty of musical structure, at the other the conductor who exalts intensity of emotional effect. The one delights in a great musical composition as a piece of fluid architecture; the other delights in it as the nearest possible approach to pure feeling. The one endeavors to make clear the texture of the counterpoint, the brilliance or mellowness of the instrumentation, the subtle melodies easily obscured by carelessness, the growth and relation of thematic elements, the proportion of parts, the stateliness or grace of the whole production as a work of fine art; the other endeavors to convey a mood, to enchant his hearers by the expressiveness of tone, to sway them by the ingratiating strains of the dance movement,

From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON NOV. 24

Following the custom that has prevailed for several years past, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max. Fiedler, conductor, will give during the coming winter three evening concerts in Providence. As in former years, the concerts will be given in Infantry hall. This year they will be given on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th and Feb. 2d.

The sale of season tickets for these concerts opens at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, Monday morning, Nov. 16th, and will continue until Saturday, when the sale of tickets for the first concert will begin. The prices are the same as in past years.

The management of the orchestra will offer a soloist of first rank at each one of these three concerts. At the first concert, the assisting artist will be Lilla Ormond, the American contralto, who has had such brilliant success this year and last with the Boston Symphony orchestra as well as at the last Worcester festival and at several appearances in New York. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Lhevinne, the greatest of living Russian pianists, a man on whom, it is said, the mantle of Rubinstein has fallen. He needs no introduction to Providence as he has appeared here in recital and it is only necessary to say that all accounts about his playing in New York seem to show that his art this year is even greater than it was two years ago. The soloist for the last concert in February cannot now be announced. A brilliant American pianist had been engaged for this occasion, but owing to illness she is compelled to cancel all engagements for the winter. The management promises, however, that whoever the assisting artist may be, the public will be thoroughly satisfied.

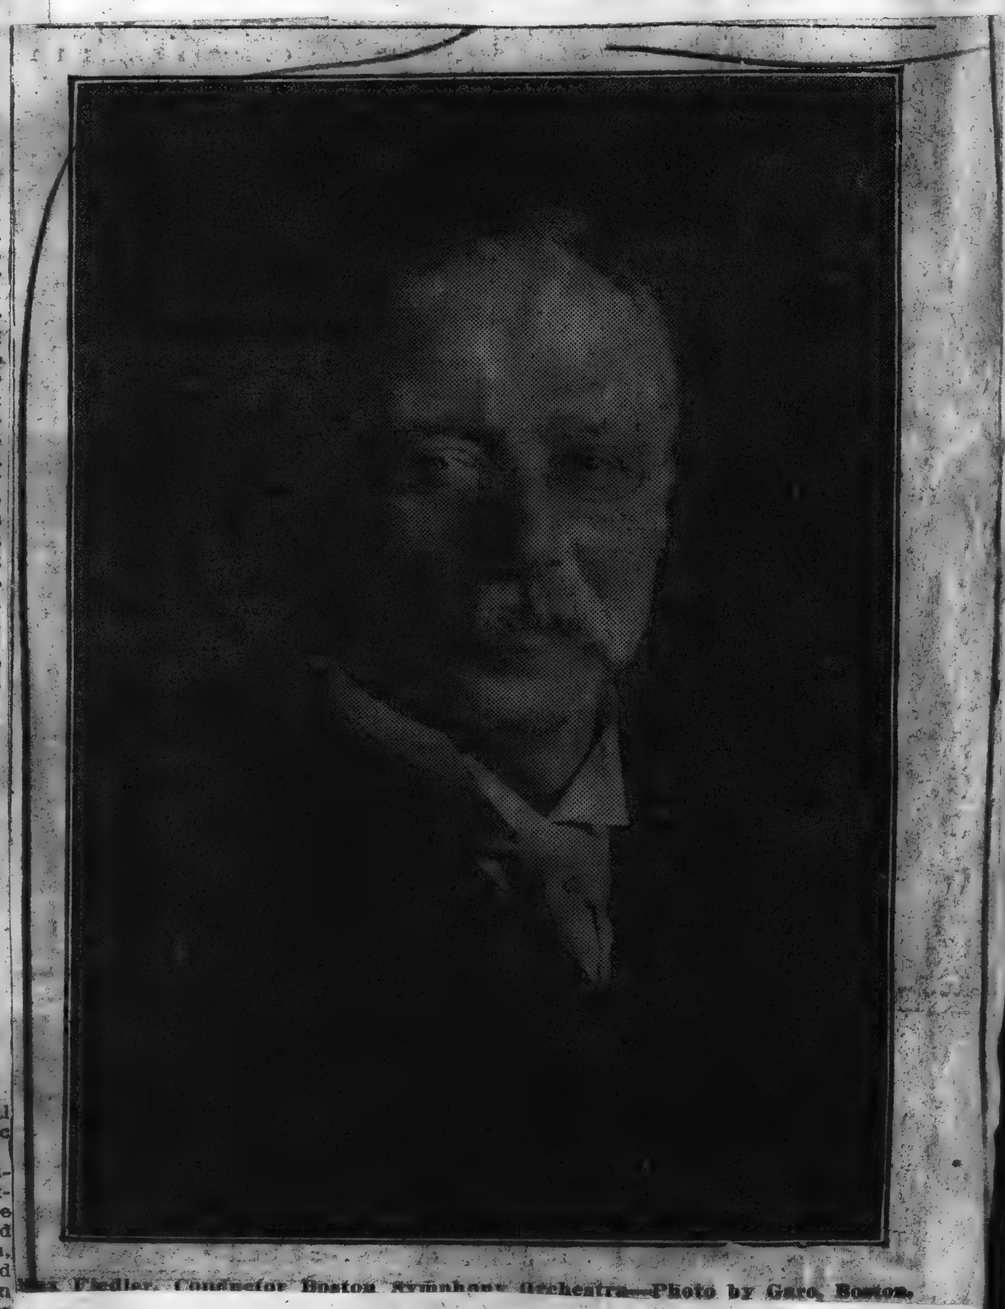
This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who was been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29th last and on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9th, made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

(Continued on Page

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany is again at the first desk as concert master and associated with him as second concert master is Sylvain Noack, who for several years was the second concert master of the celebrated Amsterdam orchestra. There are two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.



Max Fiedler, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Photo by Garo, Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date NOV 22 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of its series of five in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow evening, November 30, at 8.15. The soloist on this occasion will be Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Madame Rappold has sung with the orchestra with great success in Boston, and her appearance with that organization here will be looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the patrons of the concerts. The seat sale for the concert begins tomorrow morning at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

ess .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Emil Sauer will make his only appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Saturday matinee concert.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NOV 22 19

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Der Plan, das N. Y. Philharmonische Orchester mit einem neuen permanenten Orchester zu vereinigen, das nach dem Vorbilde des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gebildet wird, kommt seiner Verwirklichung immer näher. Wahrscheinlich wird der Titel „N. Y. philharmonisches Orchester" beibehalten werden, doch verlautet aus sicherer Quelle, daß Gustav Mahler die Leitung der neuen Vereinigung übernehmen wird. Wie Herr Richard Arnold, der Concertmeister der Philharmonischen Gesellschaft einem Vertreter d. Bl. mittheilte, sind Verhandlungen mit dem oben erwähnten Endzwecke schon seit längerer Zeit im Gange. Hoffentlich führen sie auch zum glücklichen Ziel.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

TWO IDEALS IN MUSIC

Among our National institutions it is not unjustifiable to include that superb organization the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is true that its members are almost all of foreign origin, but all Americans and American institutions are ultimately derived from Europe; it is true that it has a definite location in Boston, but it is not quite so firmly fixed there as that other National institution, Faneuil Hall; it is true that it owes its existence to private munificence, but so do universities and art galleries which are National in character and influence. What we mean by calling the Boston Symphony Orchestra a National institution is simply this: that if a foreigner were to ask what would be regarded in America as approaching more nearly than anything else the highest American standards of musical excellence, he would not be misled if he were instructed to hear for a season the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is all but universally acknowledged. It is a very great distinction. When, therefore, a new conductor comes to direct that great orchestra, no one who cares how art prospers in this country can be wholly unconcerned.

This fall Mr. Max Fiedler, who has come to America from Hamburg, has succeeded to the office filled successively by Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Gericke again, and Muck. Unlike his predecessors, who, with the exception of Mr. Henschel, have all been conductors of opera, Mr. Fiedler has received all his experience in the concert room; yet no one of them all has had a more dramatic conception of music than he has displayed. Indeed, in dependence for effect upon strong contrasts and stirring climaxes, Mr. Fiedler seems to differ from them all. He has already conducted a number of concerts in Boston and other cities, and he has created in the minds of different kinds of critical listeners much the same impression. That impression has proved unpleasant or agreeable in accordance with the listeners' musical taste.

There are two extremes toward the one or the other of which almost every conductor tends. At one extreme is the conductor who exalts beauty of musical structure, at the other the conductor who exalts intensity of emotional effect. The one delights in a great musical composition as a piece of fluid architecture; the other delights in it as the nearest possible approach to pure feeling. The one endeavors to make clear the texture of the counterpoint, the brilliance or mellowness of the instrumentation, the subtle melodies easily obscured by carelessness, the growth and relation of thematic elements, the proportion of parts, the stateliness or grace of the whole production as a work of fine art; the other endeavors to convey a mood, to enchant his hearers by the expressiveness of tone, to sway them by the ingratiating strains of the dance movement,

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON NOV. 24

Following the custom that has prevailed for several years past, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will give during the coming winter three evening concerts in Providence. As in former years, the concerts will be given in Infantry hall. This year they will be given on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th and Feb. 2d.

The sale of season tickets for these concerts opens at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, Monday morning, Nov. 16th, and will continue until Saturday, when the sale of tickets for the first concert will begin. The prices are the same as in past years.

The management of the orchestra will offer a soloist of first rank at each one of these three concerts. At the first concert, the assisting artist will be Lilla Ormond, the American contralto, who has had such brilliant success this year and last with the Boston Symphony orchestra as well as at the last Worcester festival and at several appearances in New York. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Lhevinne, the greatest of living Russian pianists, a man on whom, it is said, the mantle of Rubinstein has fallen. He needs no introduction to Providence as he has appeared here in recital and it is only necessary to say that all accounts about his playing in New York seem to show that his art this year is even greater than it was two years ago. The soloist for the last concert in February cannot now be announced. A brilliant American pianist had been engaged for this occasion, but owing to illness she is compelled to cancel all engagements for the winter. The management promises, however, that whoever the assisting artist may be, the public will be thoroughly satisfied.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29th last and on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9th, made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

(Continued on Page Four)

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany is again at the first desk as concert master and associated with him as second concert master is Sylvain Noack, who for several years was the second concert master of the celebrated Amsterdam orchestra. There are two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

From Standard Union,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 22 19

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony with which Mr. Fiedler was so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto in A major.

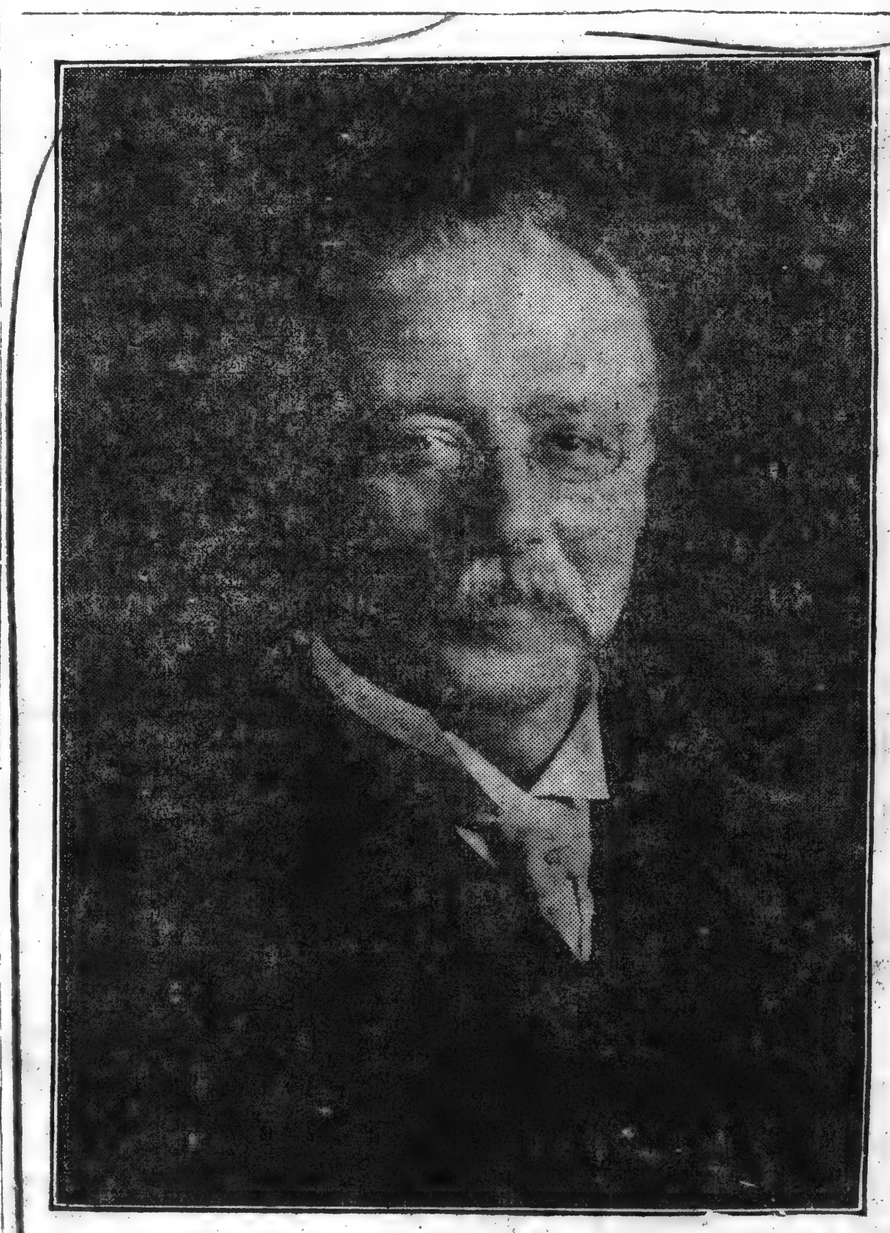
From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date .....

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall am 3. Dezember Abend und am 5. Dezember Nachmittag statt. Als Solisten fungiren die Pianisten Herr Ossip Gabrilowitsch in dem einen und Herr Emil Sauer in dem anderen.

York, 1884



Max Fiedler, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra—Photo by Garo, Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of its series of five in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow evening, November 30, at 8.15. The soloist on this occasion will be Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Madame Rappold has sung with the orchestra with great success in Boston, and her appearance with that organization here will be looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the patrons of the concerts. The seat sale for the concert begins tomorrow morning at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

Max Fiedler, With Gestures, Acts Scores Orchestra Plays

NOW that Isadora Duncan is showing the world how a Beethoven symphony may be danced, isn't the actor-conductor about due? Not the gyratory contortionist, nor the metronomic gymnast, but a conductor who would act the music of the symphony or an overture, as it progressed, inventing new gestures for each separate work, according to its various mood pictures or the marks of expression with which it is punctuated.

The possible evolution of such a conductor—one who would aim at the Wagner principle of coordination in the arts of music and acting toward a new vantage point, the symphony—was suggested by the recent Washington debut at the National Theater of Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We have had acrobatic conductors galore. They have despoiled calisthenics of all the glory of its contemplated development, and have exhausted the possibilities of physical culture, of Swedish muscle, practice, and Delsarte. They have been fit subjects for the gymnasium exhibition, but what dramatic ability have any of them displayed? What gift to make bodily movements represent, in any appreciable degree, the various gradations of light and shade, the underlined comments, the forceful, languishing, or impassioned utterances of the great masters?

The critics of the country have acknowledged that Dr. Fiedler brings something new to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, something not experienced in the conducting of Carl Muck and Wilhelm Gericke. This evanescent quality, this indefinable something which he has put into the performances of this conservative and venerable organization, the reviewers describe variously, and for the most part they approve.

A few object to the unusual muscular activity of the new conductor. They are the absolutists in music, who have set up their chosen art on a pinnacle and resent the intrusion of any other element, whether of sight or sound, to becloud the pure polyphony, the crystal limpidity of musical expression, undefiled by extraneous arts. They are the enemies of "program music" as well, the same who feel the debasement of music when it is used to illustrate a drama or epitomize tales from long-loved episodes of mythology or fiction, the same who prefer their songs without words, as they would have their drinks unadulterated.

Dancing and Its Origin.

But there is no preventing what has already happened. Isadora Duncan is here, and she is shattering symphony traditions with every toss of her pretty feet. And Dr. Fiedler is here. Miss Duncan is reviving Greek dances of 2,000 years ago, and Dr. Fiedler is—well, isn't he reviving the early savage or primitive dances? A careful reading of the encyclopedia makes it appear so. Here is what it says:

"Dancing is the universal human expression by movements of the limbs and body of a sense of rhythm which is implanted among the primitive instincts of the animal world. The rhythmic principle of motion extends throughout the universe, governing the lapse of the waves, the flow of the tides, the reverberation of light and sound, and the movements of celestial bodies; and in the human organism it manifests itself in the automatic pulses and flexions of the blood and tissues. Dancing is merely the voluntary application of the rhythmic principle, when excitement has induced an abnormally rapid oxidation of brain tissue, to the physical exertion by which the overcharged brain is relieved. This is primitive dancing, and it embraces all movements of the limbs and body expressive of joy, grief, or any other emotion."

The gestures Dr. Fiedler employs in directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra are unquestionably representative of some of the emotions depicted in the music he conducts; though in some instances, he strikes an attitude in pantomime which conveys an impression quite contrary to the emotional content of the score. If Dr. Fiedler be the exponent of a new school of conducting, and if that school is yet embryonic, perfection in his role of actor-conductor could scarcely be demanded at the present time, the more so, since he himself is innocent of any ambitions in this direction. Unlike Miss Duncan, Boston's new conductor dances accidentally, and without preconceived formula or intention, to the music of Brahms, Wagner, and Richard Strauss.

Dr Fiedler's Program.

Dr. Fiedler made his Boston debut as conductor of the symphony orchestra with a program characteristic of his own personal preferences in music, and this program was used by the orchestra in its tour ended last week, in which Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and New York were among the visited cities. The first business of a good actor is to commit his lines to memory. Dr. Fiedler directed the entire program without a score. Like the dramatic artist, too, he was thoroughly imbued with his subject, and apparently unconscious of the physical manifestations with which he accompanied his musicians, being solely intent upon the most effective and soul-stirring interpretation of the work in hand.

"The rude imitative dances of early civilization are of extreme interest," says a reliable authority. "The Kru dancer of the coast negroes represent hunting scenes."

During the playing of the "Leonore" overture No. 3, of Beethoven, which opened the program, Dr. Fiedler jabbed his baton at the players as though it were a javelin, he slashed the air with strokes as if he were severing the head of a fallen deer, made lunges at imaginary foes, and pierced his prostrate adversary with vengeful sword thrusts. Jerky, nervous movements were used to indicate sudden explosive effects or forceful accents. On such occasions Dr. Fiedler's head jerked, his left arm was brought down as heavily as the right, and his heels were lifted and lowered vehemently, decisively. He marked the beat with a muscular force which shook his whole body. For the small fine effects he used a pronounced wrist movement, his upper arm and forearm scarcely moving.

The men and women of the Dahomeys and the Hoolee of the Bhil tribe in the Vindha Hills engaged in the "bravery dance," a mimic fight, in which the women fought with long poles on the one side and the men with short cudgels on the other.

In his reading of Brahms' "First Symphony," Dr. Fiedler whacked during excitable moments as with a battleax. When the climax in the fourth movement was pending, the hair fringing his forehead vibrated vigorously, and in the crashing chords at the close he made successive movements as though he were throwing large rocks at the players. During the opening measures of the symphony he made sudden darts toward certain players with his baton as though to scare them into emphasis, and later on his left fist was shaken in a threatening attitude to enforce the directions given with his right hand.

A gesture used during the "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot" (Richard Strauss) was that of pointing an obnoxious visitor toward the door, and he ended the work with a tableau as of David standing over the lifeless form of Goliath.

Of course, it is to be understood that the actor-conductor, when he really appears in all the glory of radiant perfection, completely and finally evolved, will be a composite of pantomimist with the interpreting kapellmeister as we know him today. Dr. Fiedler is a man of authority. The impression gained from his first appearance is that he is a man of big heart and wide sympathies, who will bring out the humanity in a work if it is there. So long as he compels the orchestra to speak great thoughts in a great way, quibbling and fault-finding as to his method of doing so would be the acme of injustice.

That he is original to the point of eccentricity in certain of his movements is patent to the most superficial observer. He has a remarkable collection of gestures for cutting off a phrase abruptly. They vary from a reversed circle, starting from a point directly in front of the conductor and veering outward to a sudden, reversed wrist movement, as of peremptorily shutting off any remnants of sound. During a sustained passage in the first movement of the Brahms symphony his arms were held steadily aloft, and the time marked by a wrist movement. At the first note of the "Andante Sostenuto," Dr. Fiedler's entire posture was changed. The rigid position he had previously maintained was relaxed. His head was bent slightly forward and his arms were lifted slowly, as though he were bringing up a heavy weight with them.

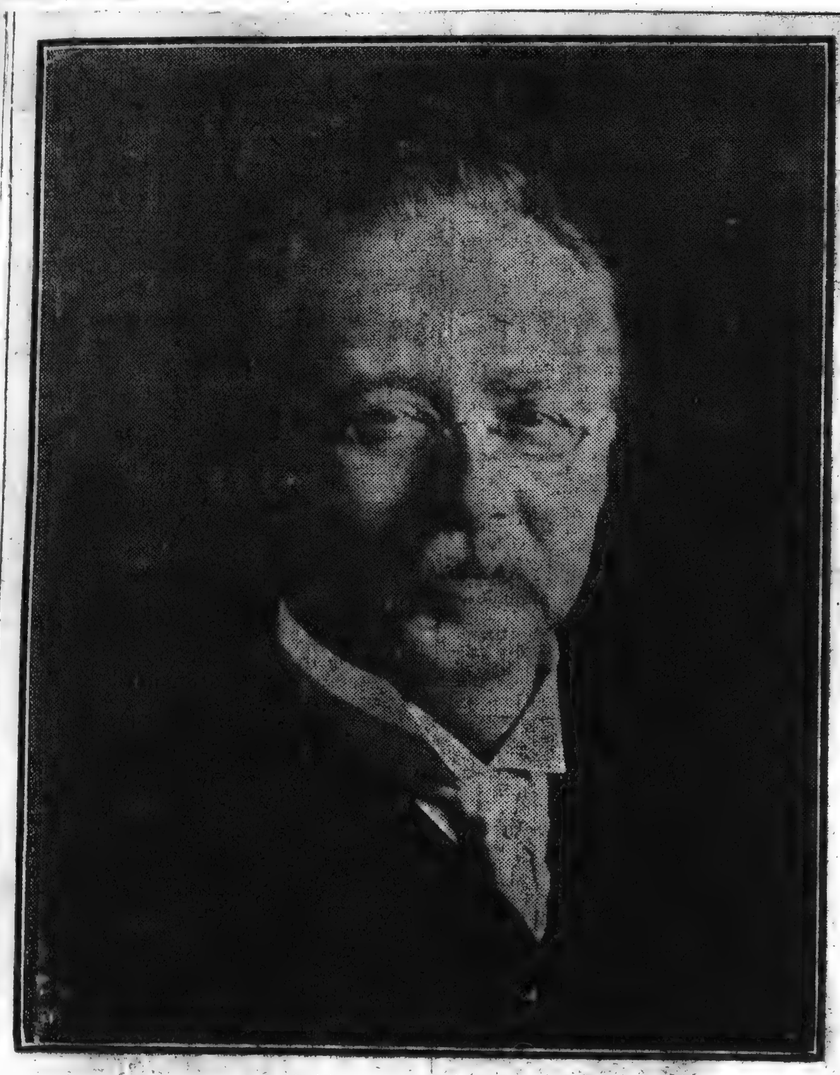


Photo by Garo.

MAX FIEDLER.

His attitude exaggerated, almost, the tender religious quality of the music, and this was undoubtedly necessary to attract the attention of the players, who were reading their music, and could give him only an occasional glance. For an accentuation he gave a little push with both hands; then, anon, the strains again subsiding, his indications appeared paternal, as though he were stroking the forehead of a loved child or smoothing out his furrowed brow.

His baton was made to beat like the pendulum of a small clock in the third movement. The back of the left hand was beat down, and oscillated slightly to and fro with a wrist movement. As the players plucked their strings he hardly moved his conductor's stick, but made two decided beats with his shoulders. In the adagio Dr. Fiedler accompanied the rapid string arpeggios in "pizzicato" with jerky movements of his head, arms, and shoulders, like an automatic doll.

Swings Baton at an Angle

During the broad violin episodes, his baton hung suspended between his fingers and was swung along the sides of an imaginary right angle as though it were a cane. To get a great vibration in the "crescendo" and "diminuendo" he reinforced the arm movements by rising on his toes with a slightly springing step, very unlike the abrupt click of his heels with which he marked the fierce, austere moments on his rostrum.

As the opening strains of the Strauss number were wafted out to the listeners, Dr. Fiedler spread out his hands, palms downward, and placed them in front of him, side by side. He moved them a short way apart, and then together again in rhythmic measure, somewhat suggestive of swimming. The arms were lifted high above his head and there remained while he marked the measure with oscillating wrists for the brass and battery at the back of the platform.

During this number he jerked his head at one crisis, and at another made a flapping motion with his arms. His shoulders were unusually expressive during the closing number, which was the "Tannhauser" overture. They marked the beat, occasionally, and exercised considerable control over the dynamics. He swung his hands in this number as though they held a lasso, shook his head, pushed something away with both hands, and waved his baton at a group of players as though it were a handkerchief.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Emil Sauer will make his only appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Saturday matinée concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

Symphony Orchestra's New Conductor. Students Course Concerts.

The sale of season tickets for the series of three concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Infantry Hall during the coming winter will open at Steinert's Music Store to-morrow morning. The dates for the concerts are Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made brilliant pages in its history.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years ago.

Mr. Fiedler's success has been fully up to the highest expectations of his friends. He has shown himself a conductor of great authority; a musician of sound and well-schooled judgment; and an artist of catholic taste. He has been most successful in the building of his programmes, and wherever he has appeared with the orchestra, he has aroused great enthusiasm.

Single tickets for the first concert may be procured at Steinert's on and after next Saturday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of its series of five in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow evening, November 30, at 8:15. The soloist on this occasion will be Marie Rappold, one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Madame Rappold has sung with the orchestra will great success in Boston.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the first Boston Symphony concert to be given in Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening, Providence will hear for the first time Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." With this work Mr. Fiedler has won exceedingly great success in Boston and in New York. It is one of the most colorful and interesting works of its kind and full of attractive melody. The sale of season tickets is now in progress at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, and the sale of seats for the first concert will open Saturday.

SPRINGFIELD

NOV 23 1908

Press

FOR BOSTON'S NEW OPERA HOUSE

President E. D. Jordan Will Lay the Cornerstone on Monday, November 30.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Nov. 22.

Eben D. Jordan, president of the Boston Opera Company, will lay the corner stone of the new opera house a week from to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock in the presence of Governor Guild and Mayor Hibbard, who will speak, and other prominent persons.

In the cavity beneath the stone there will be placed a list of the stockholders of the company, revised up to the evening of November 26, phonographic records by Caruso, Mmes. Nordica, Eames, Farrar, Homer and Neilsen, and by David Bispham; works by American composers, including Parker, Converse, Chadwick, Payne, Coerne, Loeffler, Damrosch, Foote and Hadley; programmes to show the musical activities of the present day, including those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia Society, Choral Art Society, Apollo Club, Kneisel Quartette and New England Conservatory Orchestra; the year books of Harvard Musical Association and the Conservatory of Music; the prospectus of the Boston Opera School and of the Boston Opera Company; the list of officers of the company, of boxholders and the newspapers of the day.

It is expected that some of the directors of the Metropolitan

[90]

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 22 1903

„Ich freue mich aufrichtig, wieder in New York zu sein", sagte Gustav Mahler, Dirigent am Metropolitan Opernhause, gestern Abend bei der Ankunft des Hamburg-Amerika Dampfers „Amerika" zu dem Vertreter des Blattes am Dock in Hoboken. „Wissen Sie, daß wir erst diesmal den wirklichen Genuß von der Einfahrt in den hiesigen Hafen gehabt haben? Man muß thatsächlich zum zweiten Male nach New York kommen, um die erhabene Schönheit dieses Schauspiels würdigen zu können. Auch die Ueberfahrt war schöner als meine erste und die Rückreise. Ich habe allerdings an zwei Tagen Poseidon in allen Tonarten, Dur und Moll und dann noch A-Moll angerufen; meine Frau und mein Töchterchen aber sind durchgekommen ohne dem Beherrscher des Meeres Tribut zu zollen.

„Den Sommer über habe ich mich mit den Meinigen in Toblach in Tyrol vor Anker gelegt und ganz nach meiner Bequemlichkeit gelebt. Allerdings habe ich einen längeren Abstecher nach Wien gemacht, wo ich mit Direktor Dippel zusammentraf und mit ihm die Pläne für die ganze Saison entwarf. Nach unseren damaligen Verabredungen werde ich an Novitäten „Die verkaufte Braut" und „Pique-Dame" dirigiren und außerdem „Figaro's Hochzeit" neu einstudiren. Dazu gesellt sich noch mein altes Repertoire, so daß es mir an Arbeit nicht fehlen dürfte. Ende September begab ich mich nach Prag, wo mit dem böhmischen Symponie-Orchester die Uraufführung meiner VII. Symphonie stattfand. Das Werk wurde Anfang Oktober in München mit großem Erfolge wiederholt."

Herr Mahler hat mit den Seinigen im Savoy Hotel Wohnung genommen.

Meister der Tasten.

Zwei hier rühmlichst bekannte Piano-Virtuosen, der Russe Ossip Gabrilowitsch und der Amerikaner Ernest Schelling befanden sich ebenfalls unter den Passagieren des Dampfers. Herr Gabrilowitsch, der vor zwei Jahren hier war, hat in der Zwischenzeit Konzertreisen in Deutschland, England, Oesterreich, Rußland, Holland und der Schweiz absolvirt. Er will in diesem Winter unter der geschäftlichen Leitung von L. G. Charlton eine Tournee unternehmen, die bis zum Frühjahr dauern und sich auf das ganze Land und Mexico erstrecken wird. Seine beiden ersten Konzerte sind am 27. und 28. November in Boston mit dem dortigen Symphonie-Orchester. In New York wird er sich mit demselben Orchester zuerst am 3. Dezember in Carnegie Hall hören lassen. Der Künstler ist sofort nach Boston weiter gefahren.

Herr Ernst Schelling, der hier in New York ansässig ist, stammt aus Philadelphia, hat seine künstlerische Ausbildung in Paris und Berlin erhalten und hat dann drei Jahre unter Paderewski studirt. Er hat sich den Sommer über in Deutschland aufgehalten und im Spätherbst eine kurze Tournee von einem Dutzend Konzerten in Süddeutschland, der Schweiz und Frankreich absolvirt. Im Mai war er in München zum Tonkünstler-Tag und hat mit seiner „Phantastischen Suite", die im vorigen Winter zum ersten Male vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter Dr. Muck gespielt wurde, großen Beifall errungen. Das Werk ist in Leipzig im Druck erschienen. Der Künstler gedenkt den ganzen Winter hier zu bleiben und eine Tournee durch das ganze Land bis nach Californien zu unternehmen. Sein erstes hiesiges Konzert wird am 6. Dezember in Carnegie Hall stattfinden. Außerdem beabsichtigt er hier ein Konzert in Gemeinschaft mit der Opernsängerin Mary Garden vom Manhattan Opernhause zu geben. Anfang April begiebt er sich wieder nach Europa, wo er für die ganze nächste Saison verpflichtet ist. Auf einer Automobilfahrt im Sommer stieß dem Künstler in der Ortschaft Zirl bei Innsbruck ein Unfall zu, als eine Brücke, über die der schwere Wagen fuhr, einbrach. Die Insassen wurden herausgeschleudert, und während Herr Schelling mit dem bloßen Schrecken davonkam, erlitt seine Gattin eine ziemlich ernste Verletzung am Kinn, die sie auf einige Wochen in einem Hospital in Innsbruck ans Krankenlager fesselte. Während seines hiesigen Aufenthaltes wohnt der Künstler im Savoy Hotel.

...rk, 1884

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date

DANCER THE SOLOIST OF BIG SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Isadora Duncan Interprets the Music of Masters at Damrosch Concert at the Academy—Completes Conquest Here

By Leigh Mitchell Hodges

AT THE Academy of Music last night Isadora Duncan, that marvelous genius of the dance, completed her conquest of Philadelphia, begun under adverse circumstances some weeks ago, captivating an audience which rivaled in size and brilliancy that attendant upon the opening of the Metropolitan opera season Tuesday evening.

In the course of the many years that symphony orchestras have been appearing here—the Boston, New York and Philadelphia permanent organizations and orchestras under the leadership of Damrosch, Thomas, Herbert, etc.—it is a question if ever before a dancer has had the honor of being soloist with a company of musicians so distinguished.

Miss Duncan, interpreting the music of Beethoven under the same conditions as a Ysaye, Paderewski or Gadski might have done in their various lines, made the occasion a remarkable one.

The dignity of dancing as an art never before had such impressive demonstration here. Miss Duncan has established new ideals.

Accompanied this time, as was fitting, by Walter Damrosch with his symphony orchestra, and interpreting in her own ultimately artistic manner the music of Beethoven and Chopin, she repeated both the program and triumph of her recent appearance in New York and caused the assemblage to wellnigh break all local records for enthusiastic applause.

With three movements from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—that "apotheosis of the dance"—and a group of Chopin numbers, including waltzes, nocturnes and mazurkas, this American girl, who has revived the Greek dancing of twenty centuries ago—although it is doubtful whether any Hellenic maiden ever succeeded in putting such poetry into motion—revealed superbly the wonderful possibilities of the art she has undertaken to re-establish.

It is quite useless to attempt to convey in words any adequate idea of Miss Duncan's classic interpretations, for she has carried her work to a height whence its appeal becomes spiritual rather than emotional. Unaided by any scenic attributes and herself the sole occupant of the stage for two hours, she first amazes, then charms and finally overwhelms.

Her dancing last night was more graceful and beautiful than at any previous appearance here, for she had a proper accompaniment, Mr. Damrosch's players providing admirably the musical background necessary to such a picture, and the vast audience being with her from the moment she slipped into view and tripped like some vision down to where the lights illumined her flawless form, only half hid by filmy folds of gossamer.

Then, to the Beethoven measures, she glided through a maze of marvelous poses and movements, any one of which caught and held forever would have made a statue needing no change.

She drew from these rich, rhythmic phrases new meanings and made it seem as if this one of the "immortal nine" symphonies had been incomplete until her coming.

In the Chopin numbers, she interpreted the feelings of the composer quite as delightfully and gracefully, and with astonishing facility portrayed the varying moods of the music.

To satisfy the demand for a further opportunity of seeing her art, Miss Duncan will dance again at the Academy next Monday night.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

Attractive Symphony Programme. — A Famous Violinist.—Club and Studio News.

The first of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Providence this winter takes place in Infantry Hall, on next Tuesday night, Nov. 24, at 8:15. The patronage of the orchestra has been steadily growing for the last two or three years, until now Providence is one of the best cities it has on the list. The conductors of the orchestra are as careful in their selection of programmes for Providence as they are for New York, and this unquestionably has had its share in the increased patronage that has been given to these concerts.

The programme chosen for the first Providence concert is one of the most attractive the orchestra has ever presented here. It opens with Rimsky-Korsakoff's extraordinarily brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which, although it has never been played here in Providence, has for a considerable time been one of the great "show pieces" of the orchestra.

The second orchestral number will be three very charming dances, which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottle, from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procris." The first is "Tambourin;" the second, "Menuet," and the third, "Gigue." The final orchestral number will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Miss Lilla Ormond, the soloist, comes to Providence with a reputation of being one of the finest mezzo-sopranos that this country has ever produced. Her first number will be a concert aria, entitled "The Complaint of Aridane," by the French composer, Coquard. For her second number she will sing three songs with piano accompaniment: "Minnelied," "Mainacht" and "Staendchen," all by Brahms.

LILLA ORMOND.

Contralto Soloist to be Heard at First Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night.

Symphony Programme Changed.

The first of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will take place to-night in Infantry Hall, beginning promptly at 8:15 o'clock. The programme has been changed and now comprises Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-major, three charming old world dances by the French composer, Gretry, which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottle, and the Wagner's Vorspiel von der Meistersinger. The soloist will be Lilla Ormond, contralto, who will sing a concert aria by Coquard, entitled, "The Complaint of Ariadne," and three songs with piano accompaniment, "Minnelied," "Mainacht" and Steaendchen," all by Brahms.

Change in Symphony Programme.

An eleventh hour change has been made in the programme for this evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first and last numbers on the programme as announced there have been substituted Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-major and the Vorspiel from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

[91]

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date

"IMMIGRATION IS HURTING AMERICA" PADEREWSKI SAYS.

"They Are Spoiling Their Rich, Pure Anglo-Saxon Strain with a Younger and Coarser Vintage That Comes from the Waste Products of the Old World."

"YOU ARE A MAGNIFICENT RACE; KEEP IT SO."

"And the Women! I Would Not Dare Make Comparison with Those of Other Countries, and, Besides, I Am a Married Man."

(Copyright, 1908, by the Press Publishing Company, New York World.)

(Special Correspondence of The World.)

WARSAW, Poland, Nov. 11.—"I do not wish my husband to be interviewed." said Madame Paderewski when she heard that a World representative wished to see him. "It always ends in the same way. Whenever he gives anybody an interview all he says is twisted and turned till even he cannot recognize it, and then all sorts of misunderstandings follow."

Such was Madame's verdict when she and her husband arrived in Warsaw to arrange about his taking over the directorship of the Warsaw Conservatoire—a post all Poles desirous of seeing their country's musical status raised, hope he will accept and keep. Happily, nevertheless, she allowed herself to be persuaded, and Monsieur Paderewski very kindly accorded the interview, sandwiched into a busy day, with callers crowding his doors, plying him with compliments, questions and business.

While in Warsaw the great pianist occupies a suite of rooms in the Bristol, the one hotel in Poland which is built, decorated and managed on modern European lines. So different is it from others in the country that, once within its doors, the traveller thinks himself in Paris, London or Nice. This digression is made because the hotel was built, thanks to M. Paderewsk"s advice and support, a service for which all foreigners stopping in Warsaw are, or should be sincerely grateful.

His Appearance To-Day.

Courtesy and amiability personified, M. Paderewski received me at the entrance to his apartments, which consist of a large suite of rooms on the second floor, within a few steps of the elevator. Slight and of medium height, with fair, clear skin and hazel eyes, his long hair, of gold tinted with red, brushed back from the forehead in a fashion familiar to all the world; dark blue clothes and a turned down collar giving plenty of room to the throat; a long white silk tie, knotted in a careless fashion that in no way detracts from the general look of scrupulousness; a broad, intellectual forehead, well shaped, white, muscular hands, a musical voice and manner—such at close quarters is M. Paderewski—musician, composer and performer, poet, thinker and polished man of the world, whose simplicity the triumphs of two continents have not marred, and whose geniality captivates in private as his art does in public.

He led the way past a cozy room where stands a dining table covered with the remains of luncheon—a luxurious disorder of flowers, silver and half-emptied champagne glasses—to a large salon—the word drawing-room does not aptly convey the idea of those continental rooms, which are cozier, less orderly and more lived in than their Anglo-Saxon substitutes. Several large windows, green and warm pink tints, plenty of plants and a profusion of large yellow chrysanthemums tell of taste. A toast rack, full of crisp toast is on one table, a pile of visitors' cards on another. There are, too, several local comic papers where the great man's portrait appears. There is no piano in the room.

"Certainly not," answered M. Paderewski, when asked whether he intends to devote himself exclusively to his work in Warsaw. "I shall not spend more than three months of the year at the Conservatoire. I do not intend to hide myself from the world. I came to Warsaw now to make final arrangements about the directorship. As a Pole I feel it my duty to take up this work which has been offered me. Though I am very fond of England and America, I often long to be back in Poland—though I am exceedingly grateful to the countries and people who have received me so well. I myself studied at the Warsaw Conservatoire when a young boy.

Russia's Treatment Pleases Him.

"The place is so badly built that sound isolation is impossible. Under such conditions a new building must be erected as soon as possible—or found. This of course costs money, and money in Poland is scarce. At the hands of the Russian Government I have found not only courtesy, but a welcome. This has been a pleasant surprise to me, because I expected difficulties from this source. On the contrary, the authorities have promised to give me a perfectly free hand. Now it is but a question of money, which must be found to keep up the Conservatoire as such a place should be kept up. I find that a subsidy of 4,000 roubles ($2,000) ought to be guaranteed. So far only half that amount has been offered.

"I shall now return to my villa in Switzerland and get on with my work till the local Russian authorities summon me to take up my work here. Though this point is not yet decided, I look upon the arrangements as concluded. I wish to spend my leisure time—or rather the time when I am not touring—in Poland. We have been looking about the country in search of an estate. This is not so easy to find, as I must have something within easy reach of Warsaw, and the means of communication are very bad here.

"I and my wife had a comical adventure. We started in a motor early in the morning, hoping to look over a property that is for sale. In the midst of a very bad piece of road, many miles from our destination, the car broke down and was damaged to such an extent that it was of no use thinking of getting to the property the same day! So, with two men to carry our few traps, we had to walk to the nearest station, which we reached just in time to catch the last train to Warsaw. A friend said," he added with a laugh, "that one can motor in this country, but every expedition costs three or four hundred rubles, because you have to count on bursting at least a couple of tires, to say nothing of other damages."

The great pianist shrugged his shoulders and smiled when asked whether he was looking forward to devoting three months in the year to the Conservatoire.

PADEREWSKI AND CONSERVATORY AT WARSAW OF WHICH HE IS TO TAKE CHARGE

IGNACY PADEREWSKI

Present Building of the WARSAW CONSERVATORY

Warsaw's Cold Shoulder.

"Yes and no. It is one's duty to help one's country as much as possible. Young Polish talent needs encouragement. Warsaw does not treat her tyroes kindly. She gives them the cold shoulder till they earn fame and laurels abroad- then she welcomes them wildly. Work of the kind I am taking up is full of difficulties because there are so many sections and cliques who squabble among themselves. I cannot await the final decision because I have left a great deal of work behind me in Switzerland.

"I must finish a symphony, a large enough piece of work, which I intend to play in America when I go to the States in January next. I shall play it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and am looking forward to that very much, indeed, because it is a real joy to me to play with that orchestra. England has her choirs and choruses and her muscal festivals, but America has her orchestras, and I assure you in all my travels I have not met with a finer one than the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is as near perfection as anything human can be. It is magnificent!

"The Germans pride themselves on their orchestras, and especially on the one at Bayreuth, but they forget that Bayreuth makes such a specialty of Wagner that it falls below the average in other branches. Such specialization does not suit American ideas, because the American's range of intelligence is not only thorough but vast. He makes himself proficient not only in one thing but in many. He is not content to specialize and to leave the rest ignored. An American will never try to hold forth on a subject he does not understand. He would rather listen humbly to other people and see what he can learn from them.

American's Quick Mastery.

"So clever and gifted as he is he will master a subject quicker than anybody else. He goes straight to the point. Being young, he is full of courage, but I find that he almost exaggerates frankness; this is why people call him brusque. One of the Americans I admire most is Roosevelt. He is a splendid man. He too tells people just what he thinks. I have a very deep admiration for him. I also think he is quite right in warning the American people against absorbing so many immigrants as they do. All this foreign blood is not wanted there. I should even say there is too much of it already."

M. Paderewski made a little gesture as if holding a wine glass up to the light. "You see, it is like mixing old wine with new in your glass. You have a glass of the best mellowed red wine and drop by drop your pour in some of a younger, coarser vintage. The color remains the same, for when you hold it up to the light you see no difference. But put it to your lips and you find the flavor is spoiled. The bouquet has gone. So it will be with my friends the Americas. They are spoiling their pure, rich Anglo-Saxon strain with a new vintage that comes from the waste products of the old world.

"It is slowly but gradually spoiling them. No great or permanent harm has been done yet, but it is beginning, and if they go on like that, instead of progressing, their culture will retrogress and in a few years they will find the pendulum has swung back to where they were a hundred years ago. The Anglo-Saxon race is one of the finest the world has ever seen, and the more they dilute it the worse it will become.

"It is the only race that is distinctively developed. You see this in travelling from the Continent of Europe to England. It is only on reaching the island that you find individuality. Before, on the Continent, all the nations were more or less alike to you. Some had dirtier hands and dirtier clothes than others, and there their individuality stopped. Not so with the Anglo-Saxons. They are a magnificent race, and Americans ought to guard themselves against this inrush of non-Anglo-Saxon Nevertheless, America is gaining in culture every year. Nations are like men, they begin to cultivate the fine arts when they have satisfied the primal needs. America has reached that stage when she longs for the beautiful. I notice a difference every time I go there—in the people in the towns. Even in the smaller towns with four or five hundred inhabitants you see beautiful parks, monuments and statues.

"The same progress is being made with her music. America will be a thoroughly musical country soon. I say 'soon' because she has not yet become so. A thoroughly musical country is one that can boast of two distinct classes of supporters. Very few countries have these classes. Germany, for instance, had them more in the past than in the present. These classes are the musical composers and the musical consumers—those who make music and those who listen to it. In France you have only the first-class men like Massenet, Saint-Saens and others. The only town where music is listened to is Paris. In the provinces it is ignored, and in Paris who listens to it? Not Frenchmen but foreigners, chiefly Americans and English people.

Good Composers Will Come.

"In England you have not only those who flock to hear good music, but busy, cultivated men who will give up their spare time to sing in a large choir or chorus. In America you have many ardent consumers of good music, and, as I said just now, splendid orchestras. So far she has not produced any composers of high order; but that will come.

"It always gives me great pleasure to play music in concert with the orchestra I named, because the work is so well executed. Nevertheless, I must confess that as a composer I belong to what may be called the 'indifferent class of parents.' When my child is with me, and I am at work upon it, I care very much indeed. Once it is given to the world, its chief interest for me is lost. Some artists are in despair when their works are not seized upon by the whole world, performed, praised, written about. I do not care so much, for when it has left my hands it becomes much more of a stranger to me.

"For me, of course, it is better so. I suffer less than those parents who fearfully follow their artistic offspring through their whole lives."

Here a caller was announced. "And the American women?" I asked. M. Paderewski shook hs head. "They are charming," was his answer. "But if you mean me to compare them with their English sisters I must tell you beforehand that I dare not do so. Whatever I say about one will displease the other. The Americans are beautiful women. They have besides, a type which distinguishes them from other women, no matter where they may be. But how beautiful they are I will not say. If I tell you I think them prettier than English women, all England will be up in arms against me. If, on the other hand, I say I prefer English beauty I shall have the Americans making indignant remarks. For this reason I prefer to keep my opinion about American women to myself. Besides," he concluded, with a smile that lights up his face whenever he mentions Madame, "I have no opinion about women, because, as you know, I am a married man."

And with this non-opinion of the master fair Americans must rest content.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 25, 1908

Here in Boston

Mischance befell the Symphony Orchestra in its concert at Providence last night where Mr. Fiedler was conducting for the first time. The programme originally announced began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" in which the first bassoon tells the tale of the Kalendar Prince. Unfortunately, Mr. Sadony was ill, and Mr. Fiedler wisely decided not to risk the piece with a player unpractised in the difficult part for the first bassoon. Beethoven's seventh symphony was played instead—a piece in which Mr. Fiedler conducts to much less advantage. Consequently, probably, Providence received him less warmly than did Springfield a few weeks ago.

NEWS-DEMOCRAT, PROVIDENCE, R. I.,
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1908.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROVED A REAL DELIGHT

While it was to be expected that the usual amount of interest shown each year in the opening of the musical season in Providence, which generally dates from the first of the series of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts, there is no doubt that such interest was largely increased last evening, in the appearance of Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra.

An unusually large audience attended the opening concert of the series, and there seemed to be a revival in the musical world, something which Providence has been in need of for a number of years. Perhaps some were disappointed last evening by the fact that owing to the sudden illness of the first bassoon player two changes were made in the program, and one of these was the substitution of Beethoven's symphony No. 7 in A major, in place of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade."

This was unfortunate, but, as a matter of fact there was no just cause for complaint, for both in the Beethoven symphony, and in the "Vorspiel," from "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, which was substituted for Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," there was much to delight the lover of good music. The program was: Symphony No. 7, in A major, Beethoven; aria, "Plainte d'Ariana," Coquard; three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," heroic ballet, Gretry, 1, Tambourin, 2, Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana"), 3, Gigue; songs with pianoforte, (a), "Minnelied," (b), "Mainacht," (c), "Standchen," Brahms; Vorspiel, ("Die Meistersinger"), Wagner.

There is a peculiar charm about Beethoven's seventh symphony, and its reposeful beauty was most fully brought out by Mr. Fiedler, and, perhaps, afforded the audience a better opportunity to gain an idea of the work of the new conductor than might have been afforded in the more brilliant "Scheherazade," which is essentially a "show piece," and it can be said without any straining of the truth that Mr. Fiedler compares most favorably with any and all of his predecessors.

Mannerisms he has, but this is peculiar to every conductor, and, coming as he does, as the direct successor of Dr. Muck, a conductor of marked power and individuality, Mr. Fiedler makes a most favorable impression both in his readings and methods of handling the excellent orchestra.

Perhaps the most delightful feature of the program was the Gretry set of three dances, adapted for the orchestra by Felix Mottl, and which were played for the first time in Providence. The old-fashioned style of music was delightfully played, and Mr. Fiedler's musicians brought out all the delicate romance and simplicity, particularly in the menuet and gigue. The always acceptable and brilliant "Vorspiel," was played as only a first-class orchestra, under an able conductor, can play it.

Miss Lilla Ormond, last evening's soloist, is a young American contralto, who promises much, although traces of weakness were perceptible here and there. She has a splendid voice, and when she has overcome some minor faults of judgment in its use, there is no doubt she will be one of America's leading vocalists.

It was announced last evening that "Scheherazade" suite will be given at the next concert, Tuesday evening, Dec. 29.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1908

Here in Boston

The Symphony Orchestra has on its programme for today and tomorrow Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," the prelude and the closing scene of Wagner's "Tristan," and Tschaikovski's concerto in B flat minor, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play the piano part. In Chicago the Thomas Orchestra is giving a pair of its occasional concerts with a "popular" programme of short or light pieces; Brahms's "Academic" overture, Greig's Variations on a Norwegian folk-song, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Nicolai's overture to his opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," a fragment of Massenet's music to "The Furies" of Leconte de Lisle, arrangements for orchestra by Mr. Stock himself of Schubert's "The Bee" and Dvorak's "Humoresque,' a waltz by Glazounoff, and Van der Stucken's march, "Louisiana." (Imagine such a list at our Symphony Concerts!) In Philadelphia today and tomorrow Mr. Pohlig's programme is contrastingly severe: Brahms's symphony in D major; a concerto for orchestra by Bach; Chabrier's overture to his opera, "Gwendoline" and Max Schillings's setting of "The Song of the Witch" with Dr. Wüllner to declaim Wildenbruch's verses. With the New York Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Mr. Mahler will conduct for the first time in concert in America, and he has made his programme from Schumann's symphony in B-flat, Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," Smetana's overture to his opera of "The Bartered Bride," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Friday afternoon, Feb. 12, and Saturday evening, Feb. 13, are the dates now set on the schedule of the Symphony Orchestra for the performance here—the first in any concert—of Paderewski's new symphony, and of his reappearance as a pianist. The following week the orchestra will play the piece in New York, and still later the Thomas Orchestra will undertake it in Chicago.

THE NEWS-DEMOCRAT, PROVIDENCE
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1908

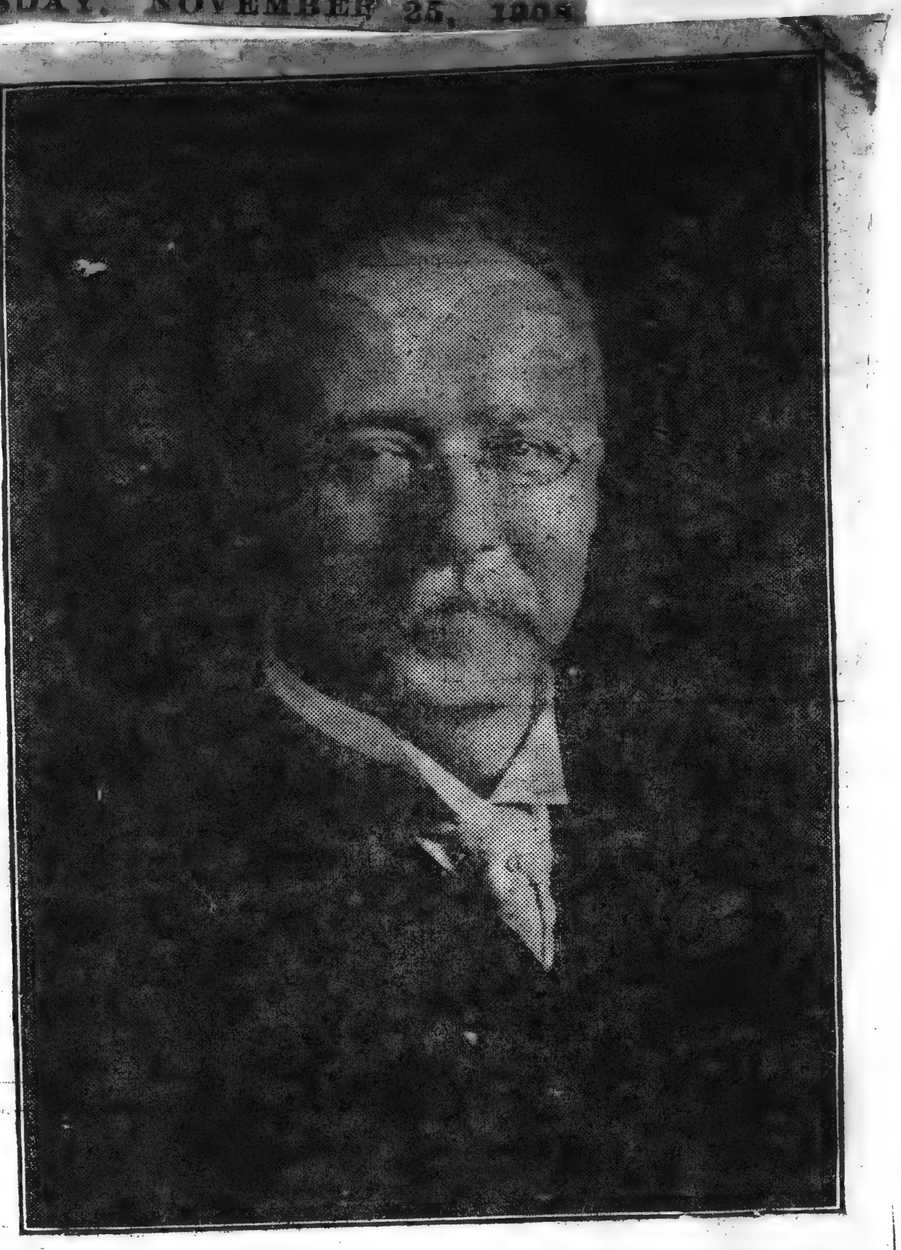

Photo by Garo, Boston.

MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Society at the Symphony

The event of the season in the musical world and the one concert to which all music lovers throng is the Symphony, and with its first appearance last evening at Infantry hall the musical season can be said to have begun.

In the large audience present were noted: Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Barus, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. George L. Shepley, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Mrs. Edward D. Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Gardner, Mrs. N. W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Mrs. John R. Rathom, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Edward F. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Howard Sturges, Miss Dorothy Sturges, Miss Martha B. Wilson, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Mr. Frank L. Hinckley, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Lester Bradner, Jr., Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Miss Alice Thurber, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Miss Edith Nichols, Messrs. Edward F. Child, Harold A. Waterman, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. William C. Loring, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary A. Carpenter, Miss Margarethe L. Dwight, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mr. Edward A. Greene, Miss Sarah F. Greene, Mr. Theodore F. Green, the Misses Rockwell, the Misses Hall, Mrs. Elliott Flint, the Misses Sherman, Miss Vaughn, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. C. Moulton Stone.

Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Jessie Hunt, Miss Gilman, Mr. Harry A. Slocomb, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Browneli, Mrs. Carrie S. Rand, Miss Annie M. Sumner, Miss Helen Campbell, Mrs. Frederick S Kinyon, Mr. Hugo Kinyon, Miss Agnes DeWolf, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Annie S. Drown, Mr. Herbert F. Hinckley, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Miss Helen Kimball, Mrs. Edgar B. Smith, Mrs. Robert F. Noyes, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Mrs. John Street, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mrs. George R. Niven, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. Eleazer B. Homer, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister, Miss Caroline U. Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Frank Spencer, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin F. Arnold, Mrs. J. B. Jones, Mrs. Theodore H. Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. Charles P. Sisson, Mrs. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Alice Brown, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Mr. William Aldrich, Mrs. Dexter Brownell, Miss Mary A. Brownell, Mr. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. Albert Greene, Mrs. George H. Fowler, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Miss Amey L. Willson, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Edward C. Sanford, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster.

THE BOSTON HERALD—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1908.

ISADORA DUNCAN'S DANCES APPLAUDED

Encored at Her First Appearance Before Large Attendance in Jordan Hall.

CLASSIC AND ROMANTIC EVOLUTIONS EXECUTED

Revival of Old Grecian Mimetic Art—Performance of Glowing Vitality and Grace.

By PHILIP HALE.

Miss Isadora Duncan danced last night in Jordan Hall for the first time in Boston. There was an orchestra conducted by Paul Eisler of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The hall was filled to overflowing with a brilliant and deeply interested attendance. Miss Duncan danced dances and choruses from Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and in response to recalls she added other dances, among them the "Beautiful Blue Danube" and a "Musical Moment" of Schubert.

Dancing to Gluck's music, Miss Duncan was noble and nude and antique. Some may have wished that a synopsis of the libretto of "Iphegenia in Aulis" and also that of "Iphegenia in Tauris" were printed on the program, for the operas are not familiar to the great majority of those that were delighted, and some may well have asked what Scythians were doing in Aulis. Yet the pantomime of Miss Duncan was so expressive that it mattered little what precise text she was illustrating. It was as though a figure on a Grecian urn had come to life, and Keats' words might have headed the program:

Beauty is truth, truth beauty—that is all
Ye know on earth and all ye need to know.

Nor is it necessary to inquire too curiously into the traditions of the Greek dances. It is enough to say that the mimic was never separated from the dance, whether the latter were tragic, comic, satirical, religious, warlike, erotic or symbolic of manners, customs, amusements. The dancer danced a game, or a tragedy, as of Pelops' line, or a historical incident. The dance was a mimed action with expressive movements and gestures. The Greek dancer spoke with his or her body and addressed the mind rather than the eyes or the spectator. There was always the sense of that which is significant and beautiful in the human form. There was, above all, eurythm, perfection in rhythm and by rhythm which ancient philosophers declared to be the most precious quality of the soul. In modern ballets of large pretensions there are both mimes and dancers; in the Greek dances the two were one. They that wish to acquaint themselves intimately with the old dances should read Lucian's essay and consult the monumental work of Maurice Emmanuel.

Much has been said about Miss Duncan's costume. After she has been seen it is hard to imagine her in any other. Whether she be in expressive repose, or a maiden playing at ball or knucklebones, or a barbaric Scythian, or the incarnation of Spring, or a Bacchante leaping and revelling in the frenzy of life, this costume that frankly reveals is as the modesty of unconscious nature.

Drapery of the conventional ballet dancer or of conventional civilization would be incongruous, absurd. With the addition of this drapery immodesty might enter. As Miss Duncan dances she recalls the lines of Swinburne:

And all her body was more virtuous
Than souls of women fashioned otherwise.

Seldom, if ever, is seen on the stage a more gracious apparition of girlish innocence, of pure and fragrant womanhood.

Miss Duncan said not long ago that she does not pretend to have solved vexed questions concerning the exact nature of Greek dances, nor does she insist that her dancing is precisely that of the ancient Greeks. She dances as, after careful study of representations of dances preserved on urns and bas-relief, and after study of statuettes, she thinks the Grecians danced. Whether her art be a close imitation of theirs or whether she has in some instances not caught the spirit, is not a matter of vital importance, nor is it one to be answered easily. If the Greeks did not dance as Miss Duncan dances, they should have seen her and learned of her.

Nor is her dancing easily described in words. No rhythmic arrangement of purple phrases, no painful pursuit and supposed capture of the one fitting and inevitable word, could reproduce the eloquence of her movements and gestures, the exquisite repose, even in action, the flowing grace, the exuberant, riotous gayety. There is always the impression of outdoor freedom, of life in an unsophisticated age, where there was little sadness and no knowledge of sin. When she danced for joy at the sight of the fleet, or as a bacchante mad as Nature herself is mad with life, the stage seemed pent-up and contracted for the full expression of vitality. When she danced to the music of Johann Strauss, she symbolized the glorification of the waltz; she ennobled that which is either perfunctory or sensuous.

This remarkable woman will dance tonight in illustration of Botticelli's "Primavera" and Titian's "Bacchus and Ariadne"; in illustration of the old idyl, "Pan and Echo," to ancient music by Rameau, Gluck and others, to modern music as Nevin's "Narcissus." She will also dance in Symphony Hall on the evening of Dec. 10. She then purposes to illustrate Beethoven's 7th symphony (the three last movements) and music by Chopin.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1908.

Transcript - Nov 28/08

SOCIETY

New Gowns Seen At Symphony

Gabrilowitsch, Soloist at Rehearsal, Greeted by Throng.

Society turned out en masse yesterday to hear Gabrilowitsch, soloist for the Symphony rehearsal, and such an array of new gowns and furs! Harriet Arline Shaw, the harpist, was pressed into service and presented a most dignified appearance at the instrument. More hats were removed than heretofore, and the audience looked quite dressy. Mrs. John L. Gardner wore a new gown of brown velvet, made long and clinging, and a scoop-brimmed hat of white felt veiled with black lace. Her escort was George Proctor, in one of the latest top coats in gray.

Others noted were Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Edgar Champlin, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Barbara Higginson, Mrs. George Stoddard with her debutante daughter, Yvonne, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Matthews, Mrs. Robert Stowe Bradley, Mrs. F. R. Comee, wearing a striking hat of black fur with a crown of crimson feathers; Mr. Grew, Mary Vaughan, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Frederick Milliken, Grace Edwards, a picture in gray velvet with hat to match and adorned with blue and pink wings; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss Helen MacNichol, Joe Chipman, Wallace Goodrich, Louis Elson, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mrs. Nason Hamlin, Mrs. Cabot Morse, Mrs. Thomas (formerly Mrs. Reece), looking very handsome in dark green broadcloth and fetching hat; Mrs. William Gaston, Mary Shreve Ames, Miss Stackpole, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. B. F. Keith, Miss Batchelder, Mrs. H. Staples Potter, Paul Thomas, Rosamond and Ethel Gibson, Mrs. William Ames, Laura Hawkins, Juliet Higginson, Elizabeth Gray and Mrs. B. F. Pitman.

DANCING PICTORIAL, BUT NOT PHILOSOPHICAL

ISADORA DUNCAN IN GLUCK'S BALLET MUSIC

Season's Artistic Fad Fills Jordan Hall—Scarcely a Terpsichorean Renaissance.

In Jordan Hall, last night, was exhibited the season's reigning artistic fad.

Years ago, a dozen or so, Isadora Duncan was a dancing teacher in New York. She had a profitable class and was popular as a solo dancer. She appeared in houses of the rich and at times danced in the studios for more appreciative persons. A few, Ethelbert Nevin for one, called her a unique artist. With the public, however, she was best known as the woman who led her pupils safely from the burning Hotel Windsor.

She went abroad and, like other Americans, singers, painters, luminaries in various branches of art, became famous. Munich trumpeted her greatness and other cities joined in the chorus. Now she is famous. She herself confesses that imitators follow her wherever she goes. They spring up even in the Caucasus and Germany is full of them. Pages of panegyric are printed in magazines. Ellen Terry calls an English audience to witness her revival of "the lost beauty of an old world of art." When last she danced in Paris "the great artists and poets," so we are told, "unafraid of tears, wept and congratulated each other for such rare joy."

Now she is dancing again in the United States and crowds follow her. With the assistance of an orchestra she can fill the Metropolitan Opera House and hundreds are turned away from halls she appears in. Last night's audience filled Jordan Hall to the doors. The programme Miss Duncan danced was based upon Gluck's opera, "Iphigenie en Aulide," which deals with the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. The offended goddess Artemis holds the Greek fleet at Aulis and Calchas, the seer, announces that Iphigenia must be sacrificed to appease her. Artemis relents, however, and accepts the sacrifice of a hind, bearing Iphigenia away to become her priestess at Tauris.

Gluck's ballet music has been taken and airs from his opera. There is the overture, a gavotte and a minuet for the orchestra, which supports Miss Duncan in dances. The first is a greeting to Iphigenia in Aulis. Green draperies supply the background. From a corner a tall woman of rangey build advances gravely. She advances and retreats sedately, occasionally breaking into a little skipping dance, but varying posture more than step.

There are poses eloquent and traditionally Greek, but the dancing is nowise remarkable. The dance of the knucklebones develops more freedom of movement, more animation both mentally and physically. Poses in imaginary manipulation of the ball are graceful. The dance of the maidens as they see the Greek fleet in the distance, is in five movements. The most effective is the fifth, the Air Gai. It is finely rhythmic and truly vital, the essence of joyous energy.

A gay little dance, "Choeur des Prêtresses"; the "Danses des Scythes," a series of picturesque poses; "Musette," perfect in a simple way; a "Bacchanale," which indeed justified leaves in the hair, but did not suggest anything bacchanalian in a modern sense; the Strauss waltz, "Blue Danube," which was greeted with positive enthusiasm being neither "past" nor "future," but dancing of the present and two other encores made up the second section, more interesting than the first. If Miss Duncan will dance Gluck, why not arrange something for his concerto for glasses tuned with water, with orchestra accompaniment?

We cannot testify with Miss Duncan that she has called back to life "an art which has slept for 200 years." Frankly, her movements often momentarily suggest the cramping influence of long skirts. Neither can persons who have recently enjoyed the perfect dancing of Adeline Genee accept Miss Duncan's dictum that "great art must be nude art." In her own case nudity does not enter into the question. We do not consider her bare feet or the scantiness of draperies in which she moves untrammelled. She is poetic enough to banish thoughts of dress. It need only be said that what she wears, or does not wear, in no way interferes with the execution of dances which are never sensual and only sensuous in a rather superb way.

The claim that her dancing is "philosophic" we must also reject. It is pictorial to the imaginative. It creates pictures, if we give imagination free rein. But where is the philosophical system? Why drag in Plato's "Republic" to compel respect for expressive dancing? It speaks for itself.

S. C. Williams.

'OST, SATURDAY , NOVEMBER 28, 1908

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Richard Strauss' "A Hero Life' Given for the Second Time ir Boston

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Strauss' great tone poem for orchestra, "A Hero Life," was given performance for the second time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the seventh Symphony rehearsal of the season.

"Ein Heldenleben" was first heard in this city when Mr. Gericke was here in 1901. It was then difficult for the majority of hearers to form any opinions of the work. Strauss was quite new to us seven short years ago. He wrote music which seemed, and seems, to the more conservative of the passing generation, too complicated to retain either beauty or intelligibility.

The hero stands on his own feet. Perhaps there is a touch of the flamboyant about him, yet he elicits your unwilling admiration, and the opening section, which portrays the individual, is splendid, vigorous, soundly constructed music. The second division, "The Hero's Enemies"—they who mock and gibe and snarl at the great man—is a masterpiece of malicious irony. It would not have been surprising to have looked up and discovered the woodwind players "making faces" just then. The enemies, as depicted by the composer, are surely a hellish crew.

The solo violin represents the loved one in what is to us an unfavorable light. Such a coquette! Such a whirligig! Was this the present Mrs. Strauss in the days of her youth? Perish the thought! The determined wooing of the swain, the ultimate acquiescence of the adored, are so obviously set forth that he who runs might read. The love music which follows has genuine tenderness, though the tenderness is very German, and rather heavy, and inclined toward sentimentalism.

The battle scene has long ere this set audiences by the ears. It is the ne plus ultra of magnificent contrapuntal effrontery. Themes are fairly hurtled against each other. The lyric phrase associated with the beloved appears ever and anon amid the brutal shrieking cacophony and the pounding of the drums, sailing smoothly along above or between the other motives. Such sure and prodigious workmanship is confounding! And out of the maelstrom which has served for what technicians call the "development section" we come, firm on our feet, the hero theme triumphantly hurled out by the brass in the primary tonality of the piece, and the "recapitulation" begins, called by Strauss "The Hero's Works of Peace." And what are they? Why, "Don Juan." "Don Quixote," "Traum durch die Dammerung," by Richard Strauss! This new material is introduced with consummate skill. But of what avail the simple life? Still the world is scornful. Existence is a delusion. And now comes one of the most wonderful passages of the whole tone poem. In the throes of a diminished seventh chord, while the strings rush up and down a sizzling chromatic scale, the whole orchestra shudders. Is this revulsion, world-weariness? Does the hero say, with Lenau's Don Juan, though from a different point of view, "Exhausted is the fuel, and on the hearth the cold is fiercely cruel?" But this passes. Noble pages follow. Music of contemplation and generous majesty. The Hero dies, and a magnificent E flat chord accompanies his passing.

Works such as this should be heard oftener than twice within seven years. One can only record impressions now. The world moves swiftly. The music was surprisingly clear yesterday. It is absolutely symphonic in texture. Strauss' canvas is large to the point of unwieldiness. He fills it with great masses and a multiplicity of detail, though these details are kept in place, and the architecture is designed in broad, big lines. He handles his material with freedom, but he keeps well within the tenets of the form perfected by Beethoven. Yet, with all this, the "Heldenleben" seems at a second hearing swollen, elephantine and curiously out of perspective in spots.

What a monstrous effusion it is! You may not like it. It may rouse your most deep-seated artistic antagonisms, but you can hardly pass it by—this ebullient, overwhelming outpouring. And whether Strauss does, or does not, portray himself in what is generally considered the composer's autobiography, the work is beyond peradventure the product of an egotism so sublime as to be its own excuse.

Of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance of Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto, and of the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," which brought the concert to an end, we will speak tomorrow.

THE BOSTON HERALD—
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1908.

ISADORA DUNCAN'S DANCES APPLAUDED

Encored at Her First Appearance Before Large Attendance in Jordan Hall.

CLASSIC AND ROMANTIC EVOLUTIONS EXECUTED

Revival of Old Grecian Mimetic Art—Performance of Glowing Vitality and Grace.

By PHILIP HALE.

Miss Isadora Duncan danced last night in Jordan Hall for the first time in Boston. There was an orchestra conducted by Paul Eisler of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The hall was filled to overflowing with a brilliant and deeply interested attendance. Miss Duncan danced dances and choruses from Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and in response to recalls she added other dances, among them the "Beautiful Blue Danube" and a "Musical Moment" of Schubert.

Dancing to Gluck's music, Miss Duncan was noble and nude and antique. Some may have wished that a synopsis of the libretto of "Iphegenia in Aulis" and also that of "Iphegenia in Tauris" were printed on the program, for the operas are not familiar to the great majority of those that were delighted, and some may well have asked what Scythians were doing in Aulis. Yet the pantomime of Miss Duncan was so expressive that it mattered little what precise text she was illustrating. It was as though a figure on a Grecian urn had come to life, and Keats' words might have headed the program:

Beauty is truth, truth beauty—that is all
Ye know on earth and all ye need to know.

Nor is it necessary to inquire too curiously into the traditions of the Greek dances. It is enough to say that the mimic was never separated from the dance, whether the latter were tragic, comic, satirical, religious, warlike, erotic or symbolic of manners, customs, amusements. The dancer danced a game, or a tragedy, as of Pelops' line, or a historical incident. The dance was a mimed action with expressive movements and gestures. The Greek dancer spoke with his or her body and addressed the mind rather than the eyes of the spectator. There was always the sense of that which is significant and beautiful in the human form. There was, above all, eurythm, perfection in rhythm and by rhythm which ancient philosophers declared to be the most precious quality of the soul. In modern ballets of large pretensions there are both mimes and dancers; in the Greek dances the two were one. They that wish to acquaint themselves intimately with the old dances should read Lucian's essay and consult the monumental work of Maurice Emmanuel.

Much has been said about Miss Duncan's costume. After she has been seen it is hard to imagine her in any other. Whether she be in expressive repose, or a maiden playing at ball or knucklebones, or a barboric Scythian, or the incarnation of Spring, or a Bacchante leaping and revelling in the frenzy of life, this costume that frankly reveals is as the modesty of unconscious nature.

Drapery of the conventional ballet dancer or of conventional civilization would be incongruous, absurd. With the addition of this drapery immodesty might enter. As Miss Duncan dances she recalls the lines of Swinburne:

And all her body was more virtuous
Than souls of women fashioned otherwise.

Seldom, if ever, is seen on the stage a more gracious apparition of girlish innocence, of pure and fragrant womanhood.

Miss Duncan said not long ago that she does not pretend to have solved vexed questions concerning the exact nature of Greek dances, nor does she insist that her dancing is precisely that of the ancient Greeks. She dances as, after careful study of representations of dances preserved on urns and bas-relief, and after study of statuettes, she thinks the Grecians danced. Whether her art be a close imitation of theirs or whether she has in some instances not caught the spirit, is not a matter of vital importance, nor is it one to be answered easily. If the Greeks did not dance as Miss Duncan dances, they should have seen her and learned of her.

Nor is her dancing easily described in words. No rhythmic arrangement of purple phrases, no painful pursuit and supposed capture of the one fitting and inevitable word, could reproduce the eloquence of her movements and gestures, the exquisite repose, even in action, the flowing grace, the exuberant, riotous gayety. There is always the impression of outdoor freedom, of life in an unsophisticated age, where there was little sadness and no knowledge of sin. When she danced for joy at the sight of the fleet, or as a bacchante mad as Nature herself is mad with life, the stage seemed pent-up and contracted for the full expression of vitality. When she danced to the music of Johann Strauss, she symbolized the glorification of the waltz; she ennobled that which is either perfunctory or sensuous.

This remarkable woman will dance tonight in illustration of Botticelli's "Primavera" and Titian's "Bacchus and Ariadne"; in illustration of the old idyl, "Pan and Echo," to ancient music by Rameau, Gluck and others, to modern music as Nevin's "Narcissus." She will also dance in Symphony Hall on the evening of Dec. 10. She then purposes to illustrate Beethoven's 7th symphony (the three last movements) and music by Chopin.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1908.

Transcript - Nov 28/08

SOCIETY

New Gowns Seen At Symphony

Gabrilowitsch, Soloist at Rehearsal, Greeted by Throng.

Society turned out en masse yesterday to hear Gabrilowitsch, soloist for the Symphony rehearsal, and such an array of new gowns and furs! Harriet Arline Shaw, the harpist, was pressed into service and presented a most dignified appearance at the instrument. More hats were removed than heretofore, and the audience looked quite dressy. Mrs. John L. Gardner wore a new gown of brown velvet, made long and clinging, and a scoop-brimmed hat of white felt veiled with black lace. Her escort was George Proctor, in one of the latest top coats in gray.

Others noted were Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Edgar Champlin, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Barbara Higginson, Mrs. George Stoddard with her debutante daughter, Yvonne, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Matthews, Mrs. Robert Stowe Bradley, Mrs. F. R. Comee, wearing a striking hat of black fur with a crown of crimson feathers; Mr. Grew, Mary Vaughan, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Frederick Milliken, Grace Edwards, a picture in gray velvet with hat to match and adorned with blue and pink wings; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss Helen MacNichol, Joe Chipman, Wallace Goodrich, Louis Elson, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mrs. Nason Hamlin, Mrs. Cabot Morse, Mrs. Thomas (formerly Mrs. Reece), looking very handsome in dark green broadcloth and fetching hat; Mrs. William Gaston, Mary Shreve Ames, Miss Stackpole, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. B. F. Keith, Miss Batchelder, Mrs. H. Staples Potter, Paul Thomas, Rosamond and Ethel Gibson, Mrs. William Ames, Laura Hawkins, Juliet Higginson, Elizabeth Gray and Mrs. B. F. Pitman.

DANCING PICTORIAL, BUT NOT PHILOSOPHICAL

ISADORA DUNCAN IN GLUCK'S BALLET MUSIC

Season's Artistic Fad Fills Jordan Hall—Scarcely a Terpsichorean Renaissance.

In Jordan Hall, last night, was exhibited the season's reigning artistic fad.

Years ago, a dozen or so, Isadora Duncan was a dancing teacher in New York. She had a profitable class and was popular as a solo dancer. She appeared in houses of the rich and at times danced in the studios for more appreciative persons. A few, Ethelbert Nevin for one, called her a unique artist. With the public, however, she was best known as the woman who led her pupils safely from the burning Hotel Windsor.

She went abroad and, like other Americans, singers, painters, luminaries in various branches of art, became famous. Munich trumpeted her greatness and other cities joined in the chorus. Now she is famous. She herself confesses that imitators follow her wherever she goes. They spring up even in the Caucasus and Germany is full of them. Pages of panegyric are printed in magazines. Ellen Terry calls an English audience to witness her revival of "the lost beauty of an old world of art." When last she danced in Paris "the great artists and poets," so we are told, "unafraid of tears, wept and congratulated each other for such rare joy."

Now she is dancing again in the United States and crowds follow her. With the assistance of an orchestra she can fill the Metropolitan Opera House and hundreds are turned away from halls she appears in. Last night's audience filled Jordan Hall to the doors. The programme Miss Duncan danced was based upon Gluck's opera, "Iphigenie en Aulide," which deals with the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. The offended goddess Artemis holds the Greek fleet at Aulis and Calchas, the seer, announces that Iphigenia must be sacrificed to appease her. Artemis relents, however, and accepts the sacrifice of a hind, bearing Iphigenia away to become her priestess at Tauris.

Gluck's ballet music has been taken and airs from his opera. There is the overture, a gavotte and a minuet for the orchestra, which supports Miss Duncan in dances. The first is a greeting to Iphigenia in Aulis. Green draperies supply the background. From a corner a tall woman of rangey build advances gravely. She advances and retreats sedately, occasionally breaking into a little skipping dance, but varying posture more than step.

There are poses eloquent and traditionally Greek, but the dancing is nowise remarkable. The dance of the knucklebones develops more freedom of movement, more animation both mentally and physically. Poses in imaginary manipulation of the ball are graceful. The dance of the maidens as they see the Greek fleet in the distance, is in five movements. The most effective is the fifth, the Air Gai. It is finely rhythmic and truly vital, the essence of joyous energy.

A gay little dance, "Choeur des Prêtresses"; the "Danses des Scythes," a series of picturesque poses; "Musette," perfect in a simple way; a "Bacchanale," which indeed justified leaves in the hair, but did not suggest anything bacchanalian in a modern sense; the Strauss waltz, "Blue Danube," which was greeted with positive enthusiasm being neither "past" nor "future," but dancing of the present and two other encores made up the second section, more interesting than the first. If Miss Duncan will dance Gluck, why not arrange something for his concerto for 3 glasses tuned with water, with orchestra accompaniment?

We cannot testify with Miss Duncan that she has called back to life "an art which has slept for 200 years." Frankly, her movements often momentarily suggest the cramping influence of long skirts. Neither can persons who have recently enjoyed the perfect dancing of Adeline Genee accept Miss Duncan's dictum that "great art must be nude art." In her own case nudity does not enter into the question. We do not consider her bare feet or the scantiness of draperies in which she moves untrammelled. She is poetic enough to banish thoughts of dress. It need only be said that what she wears, or does not wear, in no way interferes with the execution of dances which are never sensual and only sensuous in a rather superb way.

The claim that her dancing is "philosophic" we must also reject. It is pictorial to the imaginative. It creates pictures, if we give imagination free rein. But where is the philosophical system? Why drag in Plato's "Republic" to compel respect for expressive dancing? It speaks for itself.

S. C. Williams.

'OST, SATURDAY , NOVEMBER 28, 1908

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Richard Strauss' "A Hero Life" Given for the Second Time in Boston

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Strauss' great tone poem for orchestra, "A Hero Life," was given performance for the second time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the seventh Symphony rehearsal of the season.

"Ein Heldenleben" was first heard in this city when Mr. Gericke was here in 1901. It was then difficult for the majority of hearers to form any opinions of the work. Strauss was quite new to us seven short years ago. He wrote music which seemed, and seems, to the more conservative of the passing generation, too complicated to retain either beauty or intelligibility.

The hero stands on his own feet. Perhaps there is a touch of the flamboyant about him, yet he elicits your unwilling admiration, and the opening section, which portrays the individual, is splendid, vigorous, soundly constructed music. The second division, "The Hero's Enemies"—they who mock and gibe and snarl at the great man—is a masterpiece of malicious irony. It would not have been surprising to have looked up and discovered the woodwind players "making faces" just then. The enemies, as depicted by the composer, are surely a hellish crew.

The solo violin represents the loved one in what is to us an unfavorable light. Such a coquette! Such a whirligig! Was this the present Mrs. Strauss in the days of her youth? Perish the thought! The determined wooing of the swain, the ultimate acquiescence of the adored, are so obviously set forth that he who runs might read. The love music which follows has genuine tenderness, though the tenderness is very German, and rather heavy, and inclined toward sentimentalism.

The battle scene has long ere this set audiences by the ears. It is the ne plus ultra of magnificent contrapuntal effrontery. Themes are fairly hurtled against each other. The lyric phrase associated with the beloved appears ever and anon amid the brutal shrieking cacophony and the pounding of the drums, sailing smoothly along above or between the other motives. Such sure and prodigious workmanship is confounding! And out of the maelstrom which has served for what technicians call the "development section" we come, firm on our feet, the hero theme triumphantly hurled out by the brass in the primary tonality of the piece, and the "recapitulation" begins, called by Strauss "The Hero's Works of Peace." And what are they? Why, "Don Juan," "Don Quixote," "Traum durch die Dammerung," by Richard Strauss! This new material is introduced with consummate skill. But of what avail the simple life? Still the world is scornful. Existence is a delusion. And now comes one of the most wonderful passages of the whole tone poem. In the throes of a diminished seventh chord, while the strings rush up and down a sizzling chromatic scale, the whole orchestra shudders. Is this revulsion, world-weariness? Does the hero say, with Lenau's Don Juan, though from a different point of view, "Exhausted is the fuel, and on the hearth the cold is fiercely cruel?" But this passes. Noble pages follow. Music of contemplation and sonorous majesty. The Hero dies, and a magnificent E flat chord accompanies his passing.

Works such as this should be heard oftener than twice within seven years. One can only record impressions now. The world moves swiftly. The music was surprisingly clear yesterday. It is absolutely symphonic in texture. Strauss' canvas is large to the point of unwieldiness. He fills it with great masses and a multiplicity of detail, though these details are kept in place, and the architecture is designed in broad, big lines. He handles his material with freedom, but he keeps well within the tenets of the form perfected by Beethoven. Yet, with all this, the "Heldenleben" seems at a second hearing swollen, elephantine and curiously out of perspective in spots.

What a monstrous effusion it is! You may not like it, it may rouse your most deep-seated artistic antagonisms, but you can hardly pass it by—this ebullient, overwhelming outpouring. And whether Strauss does, or does not, portray himself in what is generally considered the composer's autobiography, the work is beyond peradventure the product of an egotism so sublime as to be its own excuse.

Of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance of Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto, and of the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," which brought the concert to an end, we will speak tomorrow.

DAILY ADVERTISER, SATURDAY
NOVEMBER 28, 1908

Transcript Sat. Nov 28

"MUSICAL NIHILISM" AS STRAUSS MADE IT

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES "HELDENLEBEN"

Mr. Fiedler at His Best in Modern Works—This Week's Programme Long but Palatable.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss—"Heldenleben."
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for Piano, No 1, B-flat minor.
Pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitch.
Wagner—Vorspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde."

The concert was long, but interesting in every part, and it displayed Mr. Fiedler at his best. He won a complete triumph. A Russian concerto between two German orchestral works made a palatable sandwich. We were glad of the juxtaposition, for it showed Wagner, even after an hour and a half of strenuous modern music, greater than the greatest composer of the present. It also showed Tschaikowsky as the apostle of the beautiful in Music, even when indulging in the passionate freedom of today.

No man can deny that in "Heldenleben" Strauss shows that there are orchestral depths (or heights) that even Wagner did not explore. Nor can one deny that there are beauties in the work that show the composer a tonal giant. But sustained passion, intensity of long breath, such as Wagner gives, is not in the prolix tone-poem,—"Heldenleben."

One may revolt also against the bad taste of a composer celebrating himself as his own hero. The indulgence in self-praise which two moderns (Strauss and Wagner) have exhibited would have shocked the greater Bach or Beethoven.

We cannot ever become reconciled to the attempted realism of the battle-scene. Mr. Fiedler gave this a very powerful interpretation—one of the most brilliant that we can recall—but the movement remains a frightful example of musical nihilism. Instead of remembering Mozart's sentence, —"Even in the most terrifying moments Music must never offend the ear,"—Strauss proceeds on the lines of Sherman's apothegm—"War is Hell!"—and illustrates it in an appropriately infernal manner.

We reprint here our poem upon this matter,—with apologies to Southey:—

THE BATTLE OF HELDENLEBEN.

One Saturday at evening,
The critic's work was done.
He sat within the music hall,
The concert had begun.
And by his side there might be seen,
His little grandchild, Wilhelmine.

Young Peterkin was also there,
With programme-book in hand,
And asked the critic to explain
What ailed the music band.
What was the thing that Fiedler found
That was so big and full of sound?

The critic gazed upon the boy
That stood expectant by,
He knit his brows, he scratched his head,
And heaved a natural sigh.
'Tis some poor fellow's score, said he,
That wrote a monster symphonie.

I find them often hereabout,
When I to concerts wend,
Strange, shapeless things, with gongs and drums,
And trombones without end.
For many a tiresome bore, quoth he,
Thinks he must write a symphonie.

Now tell us what 'twas all about,
Young Peterkin he cries,
While little Wilhelmine looked up,
Half-deafened, in surprise.
Now tell us all about the score,
And what they make such racket for.

It was a German, he replied,
A modern one, no doubt.
But what he wrote such discords for
I cannot well make out.
But everybody says, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

With chords of ninth, and eleventh, and worse,
And zigzags in all keys,
He turns the music inside out
With unknown harmonies,
But things like that, you know, must be
In every modern symphonie.

Great praise the big bass-tuba won,
And kettle-drum machine,
Why 'twas an ugly, noisy thing,
Said little Wilhelmine.
Nay, that you must not say, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

Much praise our Mr. Fiedler won
For leading such a din.
But what good came of it at last?
Quoth little Peterkin.
Why that no man can say, quoth he,
It is a modern symphonie.

Yet "Heldenleben" grows on one with repeated hearing. We do not think that we shall "first endure, then pity, then embrace" in this case, for we still feel that Strauss mis-spends his great gifts on such work, but we know that no other composer alive could have given such an impressionist picture in tones.

In brute force, in herculean swing of the orchestra, Strauss goes beyond Wagner, but if one compares even the motives used by the two the inferior position of Richard the Second will be apparent. Compare, for example, the "Hero" theme, with that of Siegfried; the Love theme with that of Tristan and Isolde; the cackling of the Hero's enemies with the Beckmesser music; the burlesque muted trumpets of the foes with the steel-wired harp of the final scene of "Die Meistersinger"; and then compare the treatment of these themes, in the one case glorious, continuous and logical, in the other sputtering and fragmentary, and it will readily be seen that Strauss does not attain Wagner's level.

What enemies our hero made of the flutes, the oboes and the bass tubas! Never was such bitter reviling and grunting. In this graphic vein the composer is inimitable. In sustained beauty he is much less great. No, Richard Strauss, you are not a Richard Wagner, but you are the greatest man in the world, in a school that is altogether on the wrong track! In the performance of "Heldenleben" Mr. Fiedler and our orchestra deserve the most rose-colored adjectives. Their work was simply and emphatically glorious.

The rest of the concert was spent in healing the wounds of sound—not by silence, as a poultice, but by themes that were beautiful in themselves and were logically treated. The Tschaikowsky concerto, which was first played, and first appreciated, in Boston, is still as full of charm as when Von Bulow played it for us. It is also a long work, but it is not taxing to the mind. Yet, even with the intermission of ten minutes between, the work at first seemed tame after the iridescence of spice and fury of Strauss. It was like going from a prize-fight to a five o'clock tea. Gradually, however, this quiet impression wore off, thanks to the very brilliant playing of Mr. Gabrilowitch, and the finale was an entire success.

The pianist made much of the end of the first movement and his cadenza was very effective. But the Coda of the Finale was the crowning part of the work. In this the powerful double octave and chord work of Mr. Gabrilowitch was of superlative excellence and it excited the audience to very great (and deserved) enthusiasm. The pianist was recalled again and again.

But all that had gone before melted away in the white heat of the passion of "Tristan and Isolde." The figure which represented the hero's wife and the music devoted to that gentleman's wooing shrivelled up when compared to the theme of Wagner's two lovers and their affection. The treatment of the themes too was diametrically opposite in the two cases; the one being very skillful the other a delirium of ecstasy. It was as well that Tschaikowsky had acted as a buffer between the two modern Germans.

This concert gave Mr. Fiedler his best opportunity and he made the fullest use of it. That the public at large was aware of the especial value of this occasion was provd by a waiting line of "rush auditors" that was larger than any we have yet seen. It extended from the door of the hall well into Gainsborough st.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.
NOVEMBER 29.

THE PASSING YEARS

At the seventh Symphony concert of the season Mr. Fiedler gave a rousing performance of Strauss' gigantic tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben"; Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, followed with an equally individual performance of Tschaikowsky's gorgeous B flat minor concerto, and the concert came to an end with the mounting passion of the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

We heard the "Heldenleben" for the first time in 1901, and it was a bewildering sensation then. How times have changed! Strauss was setting the world awry with his apparently iconoclastic theories 15 years ago, but how differently, even now, do we look upon him. It was ever thus. Nature will pursue her way. Given, in the course of human development, the desire, conscious or sub-conscious, for a broader and more significant musical speech, and up rises the composer born to fulfil that need Given, again, the composer, with his enormous demands on the faculties and intellects, and behold, we develop with astounding rapidity more highly sensitized ears to meet those demands. No doubt a good part of the credit belongs to Mr. Fiedler, but the audience listened in a far different manner than it did only seven years ago. How apparent it all was! How could it ever have been otherwise?

Tschaikowsky's concerto, with all its barbaric splendor and opulent color, was robbed of its full effect by the preceding piece. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was in fine fettle, and he had his own idea of the concerto, though it was of little avail to exhausted nerves. There should have been a 20-minute intermission, for only an Over-man may survive the "Heldenleben" with an appetite for more.

ISADORA DUNCAN

A DANCER WHOSE ART IS ALL HER OWN

Innocence, Plasticity, Delicate Modulation and Pervading Beauty Its Dominant Qualities—Its Range as Miss Duncan Exemplified It Last Night and the Individuality She Has Given It—The Likeness to "Absolute" Music—The Frame, the Music and the Design That Served Her Last Night

The charm of Miss Isadora Duncan's dancing, as she disclosed it last night on the stage of Jordan Hall, is its exquisite innocence, its exquisite lightness and its exquisite plasticity. Youths, in the pauses between her dances, sold pamphlets up and down the aisles that called it the dancing of the future—which, of course, is pure conjecture. The preliminary advertisements in turn called Miss Duncan's dancing "a revival of Greek—or was it classic?—art." That designation was no less conjectural. If the archæologists may be trusted, scanty indeed are the accounts of Hellenic dancing or even allusions to it that have come down to us. Dancing figures are plentiful on vases and reliefs and in the wall paintings of imitative Romans. Miss Duncan has obviously studied such figures. As clearly she has meditated upon the pictures of the early Italian painters—Botticelli and Fra Angelico for example. Quite as sedulously, seemingly, she has observed the rhythmic movements of natural objects, like the leaves of the forest or growing grain swept by the wind, and of children and other spontaneous and natural folk. Out of all these strands she has woven the form, the manner, and the artistry of her dancing. No one of them may fairly name the whole fabric. Most of all, she has woven it out of her own imagination, skill, and ambition, of intuitions, experiment, and trials. It is fairest and clearest to name it Miss Duncan's dancing and rest content.

It is the more truly Miss Duncan's dancing because it relies almost wholly upon itself. The stage of Jordan Hall was roofed and draped with green hangings that, under the lights that were turned upon the dancer, became of more neutral hue. They hung in full soft folds to a floor covering of like neutral tint. A small orchestra—say twenty or thirty men—sat beneath the stage. It sufficed for the music to which Miss Duncan danced last night, chosen from Gluck's opera of "Iphigenia in Aulis." A part of it followed the dance tunes of the opera, the rest was delicately rhythmed airs from it used as music for the dance. Miss Duncan made no effort to translate into motion and miming the whole legend of Iphigenia, slain by her own father, Agamemnon, on the altars of Artemus to appease the angry goddess and speed the Argive fleet to Troy. She made no more effort to follow the dramatic narrative of the opera. Still less, seemingly, did she try to individualize herself as Iphigenia, with her tale and her fate written upon her face and her moving body. Rather Miss Duncan chose certain episodes from the legend, or from the opera, or from both, that suited the purpose and the manner of her dancing. Less concretely, she danced as often for the dancing's sake to fragments of Gluck's music in the opera, as she did later in the evening to the music of Schubert and of Johann Strauss. The plasticity of Gluck's music, its undulating line, its clear soft poignancy, its fineness of rhythm and a remoteness and detachment in it, when it is played for such dancing, made it the more serviceable and becoming to her purposes. Miss Duncan finally wore no distinctively Greek dress except in a single episode. Hers were rather a succession of dancing tunics, of very bright, diaphanous, clinging stuff, sensitive to the slightest motion and oftenest of neutral colors. They made a dress that had invariable charm of flowing fold and changeful line. Many a dancer has been more heavily and fully clad and given much more suggestion of nakedness. For though Miss Duncan be bare of feet and legs, of arms and shoulders, there is in her and in all that she does a pervading suggestion of chastity and of a singular and virginal innocence. There is no thought whether she has beauty of face or body or limb. There is thought only of beautiful motion.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

The first of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Providence, will take place tonight in Infantry hall, beginning promptly at 8:15 o'clock. The program comprises Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant Oriental suite, "Scheherazade"; three charming old-world dances by the French composer, Gretry, which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl, and Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

The soloist will be Lilla Armond, contralto. She will sing a concert aria by Coquard, entitled "The Complaint of Ariadne," and three songs with piano accompaniment — "Minnelied," "Mainacht" and "Staendchen," all by Brahms.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 1908

MME. EMMA EAMES TO SING HERE

Will Be Soloist Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the soloist at its next Baltimore concert, on Wednesday evening, December 2, will be Madame Emma Eames of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Application for a singer was made as long ago as the middle of September, and only last Friday evening was Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Orchestra, able to make an engagement with Mr. Gatt-Gazzaza for Madame Eames, it being almost impossible to secure singers from either of the opera companies, no matter what price is offered.

Madame Eames will sing the "Bolero" from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers" and the "Prayer" from Puccini's "Tosca." The rest of the program is to be as follows: Smetana Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"; Tschaikowsky, "Pathetic" symphony; Gretry, three dances from the heroic ballet "Cephale et Procris," arranged by Felix Motti; Wagner, "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."

e First Established and most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World wood.

AT SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In the audience at the first concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night were: President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Miss Dorothy Sturges, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Merwin White, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Virginia Shepley, Miss Edith Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Caroline Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Lister, Mrs. Walter B. Jacobs, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell, Miss M. J. Atwood, Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, Mr. William C. Loring, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess, Mrs. Fred W. Allen, Master Richmond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan W. Littlefield, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. Charles R. Fry, Rev. and Mrs. Lester Bradner, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic N. Luther, Mr. Frank L. Hinckley, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Horace G. Belcher, Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Thurston, Mr [illegible] Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mr. and M[illegible] Edward Douglas Pearce, Mr. and M[illegible] Albert C. Rider, Miss Annie S. Brow[illegible] Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mr. Albert C[illegible] lin, Mrs. E. B. Smith, Mrs. Robert [illegible] Noyes, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, M[illegible] Margaret L. Dwight, Miss Agnes D[illegible] Wolf, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, M[illegible] Sarah A. Greene, Mrs. Elisha Howar[illegible] Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Mr. and Mrs. De[illegible] ter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Lindsey Cu[illegible] mings, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Main[illegible] Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harri[illegible] the Misses Willson, Mr. and Mrs. Benja[illegible] min F. Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Theodor[illegible] H. Bliss, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mr. an[illegible] Mrs. W. W. Dempster, Mr. and Mr[illegible] Frederick Fuller.

[95]

THE SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, NOVEMBER 29, 1908.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON

Strauss' Tone-Poem "A Hero Life," Is Performed with Great Effect.

NEW STRENGTH AND BEAUTY DISCLOSED

Poetic Piano Playing by Mr. Gabrilowitsch in Concerto of Tschaikowsky.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the seventh Symphony concert, Mr. Fiedler conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, with the assistance of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, was as follows:

Tone poem, "A Hero Life".....R. Strauss
Concerto in B-flat, minor No. 1..Tschaikowsky
Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

Strauss' colossal tone-poem was played here for the first time seven years ago, and it had not been heard here since until last night. It needs eight horns. For four or five years after the first performance the orchestra was not thus equipped.

Objections have been urged against this composition even by those who were not born to hate Richard Strauss and look upon him as antichrist in music. Some protest against the monstrous egoism of the man in writing thus his autobiography. Some find the battle scene too much for their nerves. Others like little of the music and they apply to it a list of adjectives as "abnormal, eccentric, morbid, complicated, violent, delirious, grotesque, swaggering, strutting, flamboyant, noisy, wildly jagged," and thus they recall Rabelais with his strings of epithets. There is no need of referring to those who object to nearly all of Strauss' music because, as they say, he is unduly fond of pecuniary gain and once was guilty of the atrocious crime of giving a concert in a department store. Yet these objectors are eminently serious persons and have much to say about purity in art.

Is this poem an autobiography? All music that is worth while is autobiographic in a way. But it is said that Strauss arrogantly paints his own portrait in tones describes his own deeds and glorifies them, holds up his enemies to scorn, introduces his wife for inspection, and at last, tired of the world, leaves it to find comfort in omphalic contemplation and the inevitable approach of death. In like manner Walt Whitman was accused of prodigious egoism because he began "Leaves of Grass": "I celebrate myself"; but Whitman added: "And what I assume you shall assume, for every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you." Every man is a hero to himself, if not to his valet. Every man has his aspirations, and the majority have their love episodes. The humblest has his enemies, and he might say with Strauss' hero and the young man in "Maud":

Be mine a philosopher's life in the quiet woodland ways,
Where if I cannot be gay let a passionless peace be my lot,
Far off from the clamor of liars belled in the hubbub of lies;
From the long-neck'd geese of the world that are ever hissing dispraise,
Because their natures are little, and, whether he heed it or not,
Where each man walks with his head in a cloud of poisonous flies.

And is a battle scene not a legitimate subject for musical treatment? How many composers have thought otherwise from Clement Jannequin of the 16th century, who in his "Defaite des Suisses a la journee de Marignan" attempted to imitate in vocal music fifes, drums, bugles, the thunder of cannon and the crack of musketry?

How small, how contemptible these objections seem in the presence of a master work! Let us be thankful for Strauss, his genius, his audacity! What a void there would be in the concert world today if his tone-poems had never been written.

It is true, however, that the inspiration of the greatest is never plenary. Both Aeschylus and Shakespeare wrote bombastic pages. Beethoven had his pot-boilers. Wagner his scenes of intolerable dulness. The weaknesses of Strauss are not hard to seek. His themes themselves are sometimes without marked distinction, if at other times they are superbly heroic or of ravishing beauty. There are undoubtedly passages in his later works that are effective chiefly on paper. Yet here enters the all important subject of appreciative and skilful interpretation. A conductor may be a sound musician, painstaking, an orthodox citizen, and yet make little out of the music of Richard Strauss.

Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of "A Hero Life" was highly romantic and poetic. It was at the same time analytical, in that the structure of the work was clearly revealed. And what a work it is! It is easy to say that this section and that section are the most remarkable—the truly heroic opening, the wonderful love music after the woman has put aside her coquetry as she would take off a garment, the serene music of contemplation, music that is worthy of Beethoven in his supreme moments of rapt meditation, music that is filled with the peace that passeth understanding; it is easy to prefer this or that section, I say, yet how the work is knit together, how one section depends on another, continues it or supplements it. Take the pages in which quotations from previous compositions of Strauss are introduced or hinted at. How deftly they are woven in the fabric!

There is the battle scene, discordant the objectors say. The clashing dissonances and the din disturb them. What would the gentlemen have? Echoes of a battle? Something sandpapered and oiled? In strict form, with smoothly flowing contrapuntal devices? If we are to have a battle in music, let us not be put off with a skirmish.

Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked heartily both for giving the opportunity of hearing this tone-poem again and for the magnificence of the performance.

Nor did the concerto of Tschaikowsky suffer by coming after the music of Strauss. Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave a memorable performance of the piano part, and he was assisted eloquently by the orchestra. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has gained steadily since he first came here a young man eight years ago, so that he can now be reckoned among the first. He has passed through the stages that nearly all must pass: at first a virtuoso rejoicing in his youth and strength; then the pianist striving after the true authority that does no come from force and brilliance, and, in the endeavor to gain this, erring on the other side and being a little didactic, a little dry; at last he has both the romantic spirit and the mental comprehension and grasp of the mature musician, the complete and rounded artist. His performance last night was admirable in every way. The spontaneous and long continued applause of the audience was richly deserved by him.

An effective reading of the familiar music from "Tristan and Isolde" ended the most brilliant concert of the present season.

There will be no concerts this week. The orchestral pieces of the concerts of Dec. 11 and 12 will be Norden's "Kaleidoskop: Theme and Variations" (first time in Boston); Debussy's "Nocturnes" (first time at these concerts) and the overture to "Der Freischuetz." Miss Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, and of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will be the soloist.

ISADORA DUNCAN DANCES.

Jordan Hall Is Crowded with Deeply Impressed Spectators.

Miss Isadora Duncan danced last night in Jordan Hall for the second time in Boston. The orchestra was conducted by Paul Eisler of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The program included these dances for Miss Duncan:

"Primavera" (after Botticelli's picture), Caroso; "Angel with Violin," Peri; "The Dancing Angels," Musette Rameau; "Pan and Echo" (idyl by Moschos), Ariosti; Tambourin and Gavotte, Rameau; "Narcissus," Nevin; Lamento, Champs Elysees, Meeting of Orpheus and Eurydice and Gavotte from Gluck's "Orpheus"; "Bacchus and Ariadne" (after Titian's picture), Picci.

The orchestra played pieces by Rameau and Couperin.

Again an attendance eager to see the exquisite art of Miss Duncan filled Jordan Hall to overflowing. Perhaps the dances were, on the whole, of greater interest to average spectators than were those illustrative of Gluck's "Iphigenia" the night before. It would be hard to say which pantomimic dance gave the greatest pleasure, but her dancing of Botticelli's famous picture, "Spring," was something long to treasure in the memory. No wonder that Kaulbach, painting Miss Duncan, preferred her in this scene.

But whatever she chose as a medium of her rare expressive faculty, she was delightful, enchanting. This is not dancing of the formal, athletic school, of which Miss Genee is a most admirable example. It is a wholly different art. The beauty and nobility of this art are not to be described in words. It is enough to say that the pantomime of Miss Duncan is a revelation and a rare delight.

She will dance in Symphony Hall on Friday night, Dec. 11, instead of Thursday, Dec. 10, as announced. The orchestra will consist of 65 Boston Symphony orchestra players, led by Gustav Strube.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE, MD.

NOV 26 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate in being able to announce that the soloist at its next Baltimore concert at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 2, will be Madame Emma Eames, of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Eames will sing the "Bolero" from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers" and the "Prayer," from Puccini's "Tosca." Other numbers on the program are Smetana Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau;" Tschaikowsky, "Pathetic" Symphony; Gretry, Three Dances from the Heroic Ballet, "Cephale et Procris," arranged by Felix Mottl.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE NEW STRAUSS AND THE OLD WAGNER

"A Hero's Life" and the Prelude to "Tristan", as Mr. Fiedler Played Them, and the Comparison That His Ways with Them Suggested—The Lekeu Club Gives Its First Concert—Mr. Mahler Conducts in Concert for the First Time in America—A Novel of Hardy on a Dorset Stage—"The Trumpet-Major" Played—Local Musical News—The Double Travesty That "Joe" Weber Brings Here—The Cast for "The Pipe of Desire"—Mr. Hadley's "Salome" in New York

Mr. Fiedler had his just reward at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. His audience not only listened to "A Hero's Life" with absorbed and unwearying interest, as indeed had the hearers of Friday afternoon, but at the end they applauded the conductor and his men long and ardently. All this was the more significant because the public of the Symphony Concerts is a little careless of applause. It is so used to them as it were; week after week, it sees the same orchestra and the same conductor before it, and the same faces around it. Week after week, it hears interesting music ably performed. Inevitably and almost unconsciously it is inclined to take the concerts for granted and to assume that orchestra and conductor are as sure of its interest and approval. They, however, are only men. Each week they are bringing different pieces to performance and to the utmost of their ability. They know that the same audiences are listening; and for that very reason, they are the more eager to please and to stir them anew. The audible token that they have gained their ends is applause, and hearing it, they go with the more confidence and zest to their next task. What the listeners take for granted seems to them only one more meeting of a fresh test. With the audience, applause is the token of a pleasure that has just ended. To conductor and to players it is rather a spur to make the next pleasure the fuller and keener.

Certainly the two performances of Strauss's tone-poem deserved all the applause that they received, and they suggested that his music is to undergo the same fortune here in America as befell Wagner's music-dramas. We heard them first, for example, at the hands of the Germans who sought in particular power, vehemence and the large and sweeping achievement that spring from these qualities at their best. Then came performances of the music-dramas with international casts, and the goal was beauty and finesse as well as power and sweep. In similar fashion, when we in America first heard Strauss's tone-poems, the chief aim of those who performed them seemed often the disclosing of the ruder, the unusual, the more superficial qualities of the music, while its recurring beauty, its truly poetic passion and its subtler qualities of psychological insight and expression went too little heeded. We heard so much of the wonders of Strauss's polyphony and instrumentation that we forget the mastery of musical design and of musical form, in the freer and the less academic sense, which these marvels served.

As a new generation of finer and more discriminating singing-actors came to Wagner's operas in the days of Mr. de Reszke and Miss Ternina, so a new generation of conductors may be coming to Strauss's tone-poems. Take, for example, Mr. Fiedler's two performances of "Ein Heldenleben." The clearest impressions of them were the fashion in which he and the orchestra reared the large structure of Strauss's tone-poem and steadily disclosed its musical and its psychological architecture; the luminous adjustment of backgrounds and the penetrating proportioning of details; and the incessant emphasis of the beauty and the poetic quality of the music and not of what is merely big or merely unusual in it. The tone-poem rose under Mr. Fiedler's hand as the vast and organic musical design that it is. He saw the end from the beginning no less truly than did Strauss. He perceived how intrinsically symphonic the music is. He made it rear itself from the introduction that unfolds the hero and his mate through the exposition and the free fantasia of the middle sections, to the coda that is at once the apotheosis of the hero and a musical summary of all that has gone before. So he made the piece like to a vast symphony, and into the mighty web of it he wrought each strand of detail and decoration. He did not mistake backgrounds for foregrounds in the section of the battle and the adversaries; he did not hide the wood with the trees in the section of the hero's memories. Above all, he disclosed very fully the passionate beauty, the truly poetic characterization of the hero's wooing; the loftier and deeper beauty of the hero's visions; the poignant tenderness of his musings and the glory of the mighty and serene close that mounts like the opening of some tonal heaven to the final and encompassing chord. To do these things as Mr. Fiedler did them is almost to re-create Strauss and at last in his own true image.

On the other hand, if Mr. Fiedler sought a new way with Strauss, he walked obediently in the old with the prelude to "Tristan" and Isolde's love-song. Dutifully he followed the old "grand style" that proclaims the doom of the lovers; that sends their passion steadily upward and upward in broad waves of ecstasy; that breaks and descends again, makes the murmuring transition to Isolde's song and then sweeps it upward to swelling climax and luminous ecstasy. Not so, the newer and neurotic way that makes the music of the passion of the lovers almost wrench itself from the doom that fate has prepared for them; that gives each phrase, almost each measure, of the ascending love music its nervous and quivering thrill; that makes the climax of the prelude a single moment of tremulous ecstasy; that makes Isolde's love-song twilit and shadowy, sad and tender, the low, soft speech of her own spirit to Tristan's, the sublimated voice of their passion, and no mighty proclamation that "Love is stronger than Death." The new way Mr. Mahler brought to us last spring, Mr. Fiedler overwhelmed it with the old.

As Tschaikowsky's concerto was played again by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, it was national flavor that came uppermost. It permeated both performer and performance. The piece took on the character of the ideal concerto; it was as if soloist and orchestra had united in a free improvisation. It was true that for the first few minutes the reminiscences of elder concertos flitted across the hearing, shadowy reminders of Lizst in cascades of chromatics, or Beethoven's concertos in thunderous triple chords sunded alternately by orchestra and piano, of Chopin in arabesques which wove their patterns from bass to treble—inclining one, if not to sympathy at least to tolerance for the savage Nicholas Rubenstein, so prone to lay his index finger on "borrowings." But as the movement progressed, these fell away and vanished altogether, leaving only the music of the fiery Slav played in no less fiery mood—a concerto which has no more the laborious piecing together of symphonic orchestration and feathery keyboard rhythms, but a fusion of instruments out of which emerged the distinct outlines of the plan, with that unity which sees the end from the beginning. The concerto gives us three Russians, the symphonic, the romantic and the nationalist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was a scholarly symphonist on the somewhat uncertain footing of the first movement; his musings in the Andantino were becomingly individual, but the national consciousness dominated the whole performance and found its true utterance in the furious career of the Slavic finale.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

.....

.....

.....

Before the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its concert last evening at Infantry Hall the announcement was made that the first and last numbers on the programme would be omitted and two others substituted. After the first selection was finished I overheard a woman in a seat behind me telling her companion all about the first number on the programme, evidently under the impression that they had been listening to it. I suppose she must have come in after the announcement was made, but inasmuch as she did not know the difference between the selection played and the one on the programme I wondered how many others there were in the large audience who were as unfamiliar with high-class music as this woman and I thought at first that the concert might almost be considered as wasted on many. But then I reflected that such ignorance provided for the element of education as well as that of mere enjoyment and that repeated attendance at such concerts must tend to the stimulation and development of a taste for and appreciation of good music.

MEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

dress .....

e .....

Society has been largely given over the past week to what might be characterized as home gatherings. Many of the young people have returned for the Thanksgiving holidays, bringing with them schoolmates and friends, and several dinners and a number of informal teas are given in their honor. Other than this in the social line came the "Cafe Chantant" of the Irrepresibles, at Churchill House on Monday night, which proved a pleasant opening for the week's events, combining as it did, the social and charitable elements.

Society people also showed in large numbers at the first night of "The Witching Hour" on Monday evening at the Providence Opera House, but the event par excellence of the week, was the first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, when society, especially those musically inclined, assembled in large numbers.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE MOST NOTABLE, THUS FAR, OF THE SERIES

Strauss's Tone-Poem, "A Hero's Life," for the First Time in Seven Years—The New and Strong Impressions That the Music Made—Mr. Fiedler's Ample Share in Them—Tschaikovski, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch, and Wagner for the Rest of the Concert—The Interesting Contrasts of Power

The seventh Symphony Concert fulfilled yesterday afternoon the good fortune that presumably lurked in its number, and proved the most interesting and stirring, thus far, of the year. It began with Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," revived for the first time in seven years and one of the pieces in which, and with good reason, Mr. Fiedler's conducting is of wide and high reputation in Europe. It continued with one of the few puissant and splendid piano concertos of the last half century. Tschaikovski's in B-flat minor, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play the piano part with a broader power and a more fiery intensity than he has hitherto disclosed here. It ended with the passionate prelude that Wagner wrote to his opera of "Tristan and Isolde" and the transfiguring love-song in which he set her spirit free. From beginning to end, the music of the concert was charged and surcharged with passion of idea, feeling and expression. It stretched to the utmost the technical and the emotional resources of the orchestra and the conductor. It engrossed, enthralled—and exhausted—the listeners. Above all, in nature, if not in exact date, it was music of our own time, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh; in substance and in style, in thought and passion of the generation that heard and applauded it. The classics are the classics and they are good; but they may not stir some of us as that which we ourselves have wrought musically in the image of our own minds and hearts.

The beginning of "A Hero's Life" is as superb in its creative and visualizing power as is the shorter introduction to "Zarathustra." In sheer magnificence of passionate and vivifying tone, it may stand beside the mighty sweep of the final measures of "Death and Transfiguration." In sheer characterizing force, even such passages as those which delineate Don Quixote do not excel it. The orchestra begins, and in a few measures the hero, the ideal hero, strides into existence, panoplied in his strength, lofty of spirit, rejoicing in his life. He has sprung out of this creative music as Minerva out of the brow of Jove. The orchestra proceeds. The sternest purist of us all could not question its orderly development, fertile, imaginative, potent, everywhere sufficient in its abstract self, yet everywhere serving the concrete purpose of the composer. The sternest critic of programme music could no more resent the use to which Strauss has put it. He bids it vivify less an ideal hero than the ideal of exalted and struggling heroism. The orchestra proceeds; and steadily it is clothing the hero with new and clear traits. We learn the strength of his will, the exaltation of his purpose, the richness of his nature. The music assembles these heroic attributes, girds him with them and then in climax proclaims him fully armed to the world where he must battle. Strauss has seldom written with more vividness, eloquence and power. He has wrought his design and achieved his idea superbly and by wholly musical means worked and welded by a master of invention and development, of variety within unity, of polyphony and harmony, of rhythm and color. He has created in tones a hero.

Follows the tone-picture of the gibing, jabbering, malignant world into which the hero strides. When "Ein Heldenleben" was new we that listened prattled much of croaking bassoons, shrieking flutes, and of every snarling contrast or combination of instrumental timbres with which Strauss has given this world voice. It squeaked and chattered and muttered yesterday afternoon, and no less came the answering smile. But the mood of the music and the mood of the listener changes when Strauss transforms the musical means by which he has created his hero and makes them disclose him downcast with these things, rebellious at them. The imaginative purpose of this music seemed now uppermost; its course was revealing another side of the hero's spirit, to which these dissonant sniggerings were but the vivid background. The design of the whole tone-poem had advanced another stage; it was creating itself out of itself. The imaginative and the musical power of Strauss were interlaced to eloquence.

Then the orchestra, or rather almost a single instrument in it, the first violin, again creates—the ideal woman, the woman fit to stir such a hero and to mate with him. She springs to life in the solo passages that gradually disclose and define her. In the rest of the orchestra, the hero sees and hears: longing wakes in him and rises to passion. The woman answers, kindles, gives herself in the poignant voice of the violin. The whole orchestra hymns the depth and the intensity of the heroic passion of the pair. The mutterings of the outer world fall away and are nearly still. Again the tone-poem is evolving itself out of itself, rearing its own design, achieving its own form, speaking with its own voice. It is as organic, as architectural, as interrelated and as adjusted in mass and detail, as orderly in development, as sensitive to its chosen form as though it were the most abstract of music. Yet it is calling ideal figures to life, giving them deep emotions and voices of sublimated beauty and lofty eloquence.

The trumpets sound, muted and far; the march to war begins; the battle follows; the din hurtles; the foes are routed; the clamor dies; the chant of victory mounts. It was easy in the early days of "Ein Heldenleben" to call this battle piece a confused orgy of hideous sound, and the witty Huneker once put it into print in line after line of warring and whirling consonants. It is no less ear-racking and nerve-racking today. Strauss, the realist, might have retorted that battles inevitably are things of hideous din and that he was bound to suggest them in no less ugly and clamorous music. But now that the listener anticipates all this hurly-burly of dissonance, he instinctively makes it a background. Against this background he hears and sees the hero marching in his strength; [illegible] his vision of the inspiring ideal woman; and out of the reek and riot feels the chant of victory swell. Again, the poetic purport of the music and of the idea behind, its creative and visualizing power, the mighty march and unfolding of its design come uppermost, and the details that seemed so momentous fuse into a mere background, under the energy of Strauss's imagination and expression of what are really the essential things.

The point of repose follows, and who knew and who cared yesterday whether Strauss was quoting fragments from his other music and fusing them with each other and with the melodic ideas of "Ein Heldenleben" in almost superhuman strands of polyphony? There is a passage, say the analysts, wherein he is plying simultaneously twenty-three—or is it twenty-four?—of these musical ideas. Neither the number nor the intricacy matters to the hearer. Strauss, with his cerebral energy and subtlety and polyphonic mastery and daring, has indeed written such music, page upon page. He has not, however, forgotten that it must also be heard to emotional purpose; that it must summon and maintain a mood; and that in this particular case it must continue to disclose his hero. Quotation or no quotation, feats or no feats of polyphony, it does accomplish these things. The hero brooding, the hero melancholy, the hero dreaming dreams and seeing visions lives in the music, freighted with sadness and longing. And these things were clearer now than they were when we listened, leaped to each intricate detail that we believed we had discovered.

Then "The Passing of the Hero" ends and completes the tone-poem. He has lived his life as an ideal figure; it has lived its life as organic music rising out of itself, making its own form, accomplishing its own ends. The close is near. The hero recalls his life as in long vision the music recalls its [illegible]. The purely musical and the purely poetic content of "Ein Heldenleben" pass in fused and transfigured epitome before the listening ear and imagination. Slowly, insistently rises the melody of the ideal woman, but more distinct now—the melody of the ideal the hero has sought and cherished. Upon it the hero is translated. The death music is austerely brief and simple, in its bare and solemn sorrow. The night and the silence out of which the hero seemed to spring in those impinging, vivid measures that brought him into the world close again upon him.

Such seemed "Ein Heldenleben" yesterday, and it owed many of its new aspects, and not a little of its new power and eloquence to Mr. Fiedler's reading of it. Undoubtedly nowadays we hear Strauss's music more clearly and truly for what it is than we did when it was the sensation of the hour ten years ago, and we do so in part because our conductors themselves take it less sensationally. In those days they were in custom bound to intensify every snigger and squall of "the hero's detractors," to heap a Pelion of din upon an Ossa of dissonance in the battle-piece, and to emphasize unusual or intricate detail from beginning to end. Such methods hid the larger aspects of the music and killed its true spirit. Musical and poetic ideas vanished in what Strauss had designed merely as backgrounds; large conceptions and large fulfilment of them became mere strands of superhuman polyphony and purple patches of instrumentation; the tone-poem proceeded in bits rather than mounted and expanded into an organic whole; while pedantically insistent detail bid the noble architecture that carried it.

Mr. Fiedler counted the jabber of the adversaries and the din of the stricken field but as background for the large poetic ideas, the musically living figures that moved against them. He turned polyphony into passionate eloquence. He made feats of instrumentation alive with meaning and feeling. He wove detail of all sorts into the huge and splendid web of the whole. Above all, as his performance of Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony foreshadowed, he comprehended the vast design, the mighty evolution, the grandeur, the power of the whole tone-poem. It rose, under his hand, as Strauss would have it rise, creating itself, solid of substance, massive of form, vivid of image, passionately eloquent and vital always. He carried the music to its true nobility; he sustained it at its true grandeur. He kept its exaltation of idea, of feeling, of utterance. He caught its epic stride. The weight of thought, the intensity of passion, the beauty and the power of the music each spoke in his reading. Through the tonal magnificence of the orchestra they spoke only the more eloquently. The performance as well as the music had its creative force.

A piano concerto may be a small thing after such a tone-poem, but Tschaikovski in it seemed in no wise small at the heels of Strauss. Perhaps, indeed, the introduction to the concerto in B-flat minor is to the beginning of most other modern concertos as the opening of "Ein Heldenleben" is to that of many a tone-poem. Again, the music was vital with power and eloquence. It created itself, it wrought passionate and poetic mood. It had breadth and stride. Then through the concerto, after the diatonic sweep of Strauss, came and went the finer chromatic intensities of Tschaikovski. Writing as he was to no kindling programme, writing, as he confessed, in partial subjection to his chosen instrument, he keeps a noble and fiery ardor, that sets the music glowing with beauty and tingling with energy of idea and expression. The beauty in the changeful Russian has its moments of softness, its intervals of gayety, its riot of high spirits, but it is always a vivid and vital beauty. The energy never flags. It makes form pliant and expressive; it gives the piano a spontaneous voice; it carries the concerto forward and upward, as though a composer were actually writing such a piece from sheer creative impulse. Tschaikovski has much to say that is rare in the dry and perfunctory or the stirring and perverse concertos of our time. He says it with an eagerness and an intensity that make and keep the concerto a living form. And Mr. Gabrilowitsch played it with an understanding, a power and a large and deep eloquence that were like to Mr. Fiedler's with the tone-poem. The introduction came as a passionate declamation the allegro was all changeful fire, now bright and hot and then soft and warm; the cradle song of the slow movement held its simple charm, and in the finale wild, high spirits danced and raced to the breathless close. The piano was no solo instrument for display, but the characteristic voice of the music, and not once did Mr. Gabrilowitsch forget that the concerto had substance, design and form, with all its ardors of mood and speech.

And Wagner ended the concert with still another sort of power. Strauss had wrought his ideal and heroic figures striving in an epic world of tones. Tschaikovski had filled a classic form with new vitality and eloquence. His was a passion and a beauty of sound in itself. Wagner, in turn, now wrought into tones human passions intoxicating and exalting, torturing and desolating human beings caught in the bonds of love and fate and death. The eloquence of the prelude to "Tristan" seemed more human than is either Strauss's or Tschaikovski's; the voice of Isolde's final love song, though there was no Isolde but only an orchestra, seemed a more human and poignant voice. The radiant strings—and how luminously and throbbingly, the violins played—clothed Isolde in their brightness, her great passion swelled out of the orchestra till it seemed to release her. It was the end of a human tragedy, the triumph of a human love, and there was no mistaking the answering human thrill.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.
DECEMBER 6, 1908

Symphony Orchestra

The last public rehearsal and concert by the Symphony Orchestra was the most stimulating thus far of the season. The concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will not fall back in this respect. Noren's "Kaleidoskop" variations have created widespread discussion, not only among musicians, but in courts of law.

Noren, who became famous, so to say, in an afternoon, is a man 45 years old. He is a native of Austria, having been born in Graz. The greater part of his career has been spent in teaching, and these variations came as a revelation to all who knew him. He now lives near Dersden, where he is at work on a symphony and an opera. The "Kaleidoskop" was played for the first time a year ago last summer at the Tonkuenstler Festival in Dresden, when it made a decided sensation.

Debussy's Nocturnes

The "three nocturnes" by Debussy are not entirely new to Boston, having been given at an orchestral concert under Mr. B. J. Lang's direction four or five years ago. Three years since, when Vincent d'Indy was in this country, he played the first and second nocturnes in New York. The first is entitled "Clouds," and the programme, according to the composer, in this: "The unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and melancholy march of clouds ending in a gray agony tinted with white."

The second is entitled "Festivals" movement, rhythm dancing in the atmosphere, with bursts of brusque light. The third is entitled "Sirens"; the sea and its innumerable ryhthm. "Then amid the billows silvered by the moon the mysterious song of the Sirens is heard; it laughs and passes."

BOSTON JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 5, 1908.

MISS DESTINN AT A SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the next public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, and Saturday evening, Dec. 12, respectively, Boston public will hear for the first time Miss Emmy Destinn, who is now in this country as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York. Miss Destinn will sing a ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and three songs with piano—"Wegweiser," "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Earl-King," all by Schubert.

The novelty for orchestras will be Noren's "Kaleidoskop," a set of orchestral variations. Another equally interesting number will be three nocturnes by Debussy, and in this the orchestra will be accompanied by a chorus of women's voices from the New England Conservatory of Music. The final number will be Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—
—NOVEMBER 29, 1908.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Gabrilowitsch Plays at the Symphony.

Handel and Haydn Concerts—Recitals of the Week.

Gossip and News Items of Current Interest.

Forty minutes of Richard Strauss greeted the patrons of last week's Symphony concerts, the program opening with the tone poem "A Hero Life." Ossip Gabrilowitsch followed as soloist in Tschaikowsky's first piano concert, and Wagner closed the selections with an excerpt from "Tristan and Isolde." It is about seven years since the Strauss work has been played here, and its advent was somewhat of a novelty. That it is as puzzling as ever to the general ear cannot well be denied, for, despite the "advance" in musical culture and understanding, the work sounds as queer today as it did in 1901.

Wonderful in its orchestral structure, and revealing a master hand in working out combinations of the different instrumental choirs, there is so much of the dissonant and inharmonic woven into the "melodies" that the ear frequently is assailed with sounds that suggest incompetency among the performers.

And yet here and there are exquisite melodic thoughts beautifully expressed and appealing to the lover of "real tunes." But brief are these moments, the composer apparently taking delight in introducing cross harmonies, strange modulations or some other form of his musical fancy.

The bigness of the composition is universally recognized, but its value is, and probably will be for years, a dubious proposition. Mr Fiedler and his band showed it was no child's play to interpret this hero life according to the Strauss idea; but all the multiplex difficulties of the work were splendidly surmounted, and evidently to the satisfaction of the conductor. Mr Hess did his solo allotment skilfully and all the fortissimo passages received the expected vigorous exploitation.

Mr Gabrilowitsch performed the Tschaikowsky concerto magnificently. It is a man's piece in nearly every movement and in the heavy chord passages of the first part Mr Gabrilowitsch gave early evidence that his performance was to be one worthy of high commendation. And so it proved to be.

The beautiful melody of the first movement, at first simple in its voicing and finally developing into crashing passage work, was given through gradations artistically set forth by the player, whose clarity and smoothness in light finger work were of the finest quality.

The cantabel in the second part was delightfully melodic and delicate and the turbulence of the finale was fairly electrifying in its effect. All in all it was a performance of surpassing vigor, skill in tonal coloring and execution and brilliancy, and the audience was justified in its hearty tributes of appreciation. Mr Gabrilowitsch was recalled to the stage a half dozen times. The orchestral assistance was sympathetic and inspiring. Mr Fiedler gave an admirable reading of the Wagner selection along traditional lines.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its second monthly trip. The soloists on this trip will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch in Washington, New York and Brooklyn; Emil Sauer in New York; Mme Rappold in Philadelphia; Mme Emma Eames in Baltimore. The principal orchestral works to be performed will be the "Scheherazade," a suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan opera company will be the soloist at the next concerts here.

[97]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1908

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

AN UNUSUAL NUMBER THAT ARE INTERESTING

Noren's "Kaleidoscope," Debussy's Three Nocturnes and Miss Destinn to Make an Exceptional Symphony Concert—The Cecilia to Revive Parker's "Saint Christopher"—New Pieces for the Kneisel Quartet—Dr. Wuellner Again—More Reger—Other Concerts and Recitals

Noren's long announced Variations—"The Kaleidoscope"—begin the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The piece was originally performed at Dresden in the summer of 1907, excited lively interest up and down Germany, and was generally announced on orchestra lists for the following season. Then came the litigation with Strauss's publishers over Noren's alleged appropriation of two melodies from "Ein Heldenleben," and for some months courts, and not conductors, were busy with the Variations. When they were free for performance again, it was too late for Dr. Muck to play them here, as he had intended. They have fallen accordingly to Mr. Fiedler. Technically the piece is a theme, eleven variations and a double fugue, richly scored for full modern orchestra. Noren, however, has not written the variations as so much self-contained and self-sufficient music. He would give each a particular pictorial or poetic suggestion, and he has labelled them accordingly. A slow introduction foreshadows the theme; a sustained passage sets it forth. Then follow (Variation I.) a light prelude; (Variation II.) a "melancholy dance" in the form of a slow waltz; (Variation III.) a canon; (Variation IV.) a "chuckling and frisky" scherzo; (Variation V.) "in the cathedral" with organ-like harmonies; (Variation VI.) a pastoral piece; (Variation VII.) a funeral march; (Variation VIII.) a lively Slavonic dance; (Variation IX.) a moody song "from far-off days"; (Variation X.) a bright mazurka; (Variation XI.) "to a celebrated contemporary" with its quotations from Strauss's "A Hero's Life." Out of the two themes so quoted and of material of his own, Noren builds his double fugue; there is climax heaped upon climax; and then the whole piece ends tranquilly.

Heinrich Gottlieb Noren, whom "The Kaleidoscope" has made known after long obscurity is an Austrian musician of forty-five, with Moravian and Slovak blood in his veins. He has lived the life of a teacher of music in the conservatories of Austria and Germany and before he wrote the Variations he had some reputation as a composer in the smaller musical forms. He worked at intervals through four years at "The Kaleidoscope" and finally sent the manuscript to the managing committee of one of the German festivals at which much new music comes to hearing. It was accepted, performed at Dresden in the summer of 1907, and forthwith became the novel piece of the year. Then came the litigation. In the final variation Noren quoted twice from "A Hero's Life," used quotation marks—a rare thing in a musical score—and proceeded to combine the two subjects from Strauss with his own theme to build his double fugue. Strauss's publishers demanded indemnity for such use of the composer's melodies, resting their case upon the German statute that forbids such infringements of copyright. The learned Court, after much expert testimony and much delicate deliberation, ruled that Noren had quoted no melodies within the purview of the law, but only "musical figures." And the way was clear for "The Kaleidoscope" to make the round of the orchestral world.

The other notable number of Mr. Fiedler's programme is Debussy's three "Nocturnes," once performed here at an orchestral concert under Mr. Lang, but hitherto unheard at the Symphony Concerts. They follow "The Afternoon of a Faun" in Debussy's orchestral pieces, and they were first performed in 1900 and 1901. "The title of nocturnes," wrote Debussy at that time, and quite as much to mystify as to enlighten his hearers, "is to be interpreted in a wider sense than that usually given to it, and most especially must it be understood to have a decorative meaning . . . signifying in the amplest manner diversified impressions and special lights." The first of the three pieces is "Clouds" ("Nuages"), the second "Routs" ("Fetes") and the third "Sirens" ("Sirènes"). "In them," writes Mr. Bruneau, "with the aid of a magic orchestra, he has lent to clouds traversing the sombre sky the various forms created by his imagination; he has set to running and dancing the various forms perceived by him in the silvery dust scintillating in the moonbeams, and he has changed the white foam of the sea into tuneful sirens." According to Debussy himself the first Nocturne pictures "the unchanging aspect of the sky and the slow, solemn movement of the clouds dissolving in gray tints, lightly touched with white." The second is of "aerial revelry, in the restless dancing rhythm of the atmosphere, interspersed with sudden flashes of light," and the music is a maze of delicate, iridescent harmonies, rising into a fantastic and sonorous revelry, and then declining again into radiant flecks and flickers of dancing sound. The third Nocturne, as Debussy designs it, is "of the sea and its perpetual rhythm, while amid waves silvery in the moonlight pass the sirens" in light laughter and mysterious song. It is gleaming music. In this last Nocturne Debussy asks a choir of sixteen women's voices. They will come next week from the New England Conservatory.

The singer of the two concerts will be Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan Opera House to which she came a month ago, from the Royal Opera in Berlin and from Covent Garden in London. Miss Destinn is one of the most distinguished dramatic singers of our time, and though she has made her career chiefly in the opera house, she is not unpractised in the concert-room. An article that appeared a few weeks ago in this place described her career and her traits fully, and there is no need now to repeat them. Suffice it that her chief distinction is her ability to make her tones the very voice of the character and the passion in opera, and to impart in concert the mood and the poetic and emotional content of her songs. Her voice, thus, is of dramatizing quality rather than of purely sensuous beauty; but she makes the expressive quality of her tones the more vivid by her mastery of the art of song. Here in Boston, where she sings for the first time, her pieces will be Senta's ballad from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" (in which the girl sees the vision of the tortured Hollander and his release by a saving woman) and three songs of Schubert—Gretchen's lament as she spins, the tale of the Erl-King, and the wanderer's melancholy song of the guide-post that points him to death ("Der Wegweiser"). After these songs, Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz" will end the concert.

The Symphony Orchestra will give the third of its current series of concerts in Cambridge at the Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening with a programme that Mr. Fiedler has adroitly made of the best-liked pieces of his recent concerts in Boston—Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony, Mac Dowell's tone-poem, "Lamia," Smetana's tone-poem, "The Moldau," the overture to "Oberon" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." Miss Lilla Ormond will be the assisting singer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
NOV 28

MANY ATTEND CONCERT.

Society Hears Programme by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among those in the audience last night at the first Symphony concert in Infantry Hall were Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mrs. John R. Rathom, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Edward F. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Howard Sturges, Miss Dorothy Sturges, Miss Martha B. Willson, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Mr. Frank L. Hinckley, Mr. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Lester Bradner, Jr., Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Miss Alice Thurber, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Miss Edith Nichols, Messrs. Edward F. Child, Harold A. Waterman, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. William C. Loring, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary A. Carpenter, Miss Margarethe L. Dwight, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mr. Edward A. Greene, Miss Sarah F. Greene, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, the Misses Hall, Mrs. Elliott Flint, the Misses Sherman, Miss Vaughn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Jessie Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, Miss Gilman, Mr. Harry A. Slocomb, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. Edward D. Pearce, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Carrie S. Rand, Miss Annie M. Sumner, Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. Frederick S. Kinyon, Mr. Hugo Kinyon, Miss Agnes DeWolf, Mr. Carl Barus, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Annie S. Drown, Mr. Herbert F. Hinckley, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Miss Helen Kimball, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mrs. Edgar B. Smith, Mrs. Robert F. Noyes, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Mrs. John Street, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mrs. George R. Niven, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. Eleazer B. Homer, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister, Miss Caroline U. Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Frank Spencer, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin F. Arnold, Mrs. J. B. Jones, Mrs. Theodore H. Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. Charles P. Sisson, Mrs. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Alice Brown, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Mr. William Aldrich, Mrs. Dexter Brownell, Miss Mary A. Brownell, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. Albert Greene, Mrs. George H. Fowler, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Miss Amey L. Willson, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Edward C. Sanford, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George L. Shepley, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 28 1908

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, will give the lecture preliminary to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 4 o'clock next Thursday afternoon in the music hall of the Academy. The lecture will be illustrated on the piano by Alfred De Voto.

The second Boston Symphony concert is to be given at the Academy on the evening of Friday, Dec. 4.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
NOV 28

ARTISTIC CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Infantry Hall was filled with a large and very appreciative audience last night for the first of the series of three concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city during the present winter. There has been for two or three years a steady increase of appreciation of these concerts by the music lovers of the city and the fact was shown last night by the size of the gathering and the evidences of pleasure which the numbers of the programme afforded. This enlarged patronage and enjoyment of the concerts has resulted, too, in a more careful selection and arrangement of numbers than was the case some years ago and the programme which was presented last evening was all that could be desired by the most exacting patron.

Special interest was felt in this opening concert of the present series in view of the fact that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, was to make his first appearance in this city in that capacity. His reputation had, however, preceded him, so that all were prepared to be quite satisfied with his work with the orchestra and there was no disappointment on that score. His command of his musicians was admirable and under his skilful handling instruments harmonized most delightfully and the ensemble was artistic and musicianly. The orchestra itself, too, was in excellent form and showed improvement over past years, the men playing together with precision and in the part and solo passages with a clearness and technique which were to be expected of this assemblage of skilful players. That the work of both conductor and orchestra was fully appreciated was evidenced by the cordial applause that followed each number and was at times repeated.

The orchestral programme was particularly attractive, comprising Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-major, three dances arranged by Felix Motti from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procis," including tambourin, menuet and gigue; Wagner's "Meistersinger" vorspiel. There may be some disappointment at the omission of Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which has never been presented in this city by this orchestra, although it is given at many of its concerts, and also because of the change by which Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" was not given, but if so it must have been greatly minimized, if not entirely dissipated, by the excellence of the numbers which took the place on the programme of those which had necessarily been withdrawn because of the illness of one of the members of the orchestra. The three selections gave ample opportunity for the orchestra to show its skill with varying themes and the rendition of each left nothing to be desired to round out the feeling of satisfaction at having enjoyed a delightful evening with the masters and with musicians who could give worthy expression of these great works.

The vocalist, Miss Lilla Ormond, came here with a high reputation as a mezzo-soprano whose voice is excelled by few in this country, and she quite captivated the audience by the sweetness and strength of her singing. Her concert career has been short, but brilliant, for it has been attended with pronounced success wherever she has appeared. That she will be a favorite whenever she comes to this city again is assured, and the hearty reception she received last night, with several encores after each appearance, will cause her to be eager to come again. Her selections were well chosen to bring out the fine qualities and full power of her voice, and she charmed her audience with each selection. The first number, a concert aria, "The Complaint of Ariadne," by the French composer, Coquard, was brilliantly sung, and showed to excellent advantage the wide range of her vocal powers and the pure quality of her tones, while the second number, three songs with piano accompaniment, "Minnelied," "Mainacht" and "Staendchen," all by Brahms, formed a delightful little group which served to reveal new elements in her voice and to win added laurels and more fervid commendations from her hearers.

DAILY ADVERTISER
DECEMBER 5, 1908

The first of the two pension fund concerts that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives each season will take place at Symphony hall on next Sunday evening, Dec. 13. There has been some delay in announcing the programme of the concert, owing to negotiations that have been on with artists who were desired as soloists, but as none of these is available for that evening, the programme will be purely orchestral. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a list of works more than ordinarily attractive, the composers being Liszt, Wagner and Tschaikowsky, and the last half of the programme will be devoted entirely to the Russian composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MANY ATTEND CONCERT.

Society Hears Programme by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among those in the audience last night at the first Symphony concert in Infantry Hall were Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mrs. John R. Rathom, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Edward F. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Howard Sturges, Miss Dorothy Sturges, Miss Martha B. Willson, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Mr. Frank L. Hinckley, Mr. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Lester Bradner, Jr., Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Miss Alice Thurber, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Miss Edith Nichols, Messrs. Edward F. Child, Harold A. Waterman, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. William C. Loring, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary A. Carpenter, Miss Margarethe L. Dwight, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mr. Edward A. Greene, Miss Sarah F. Greene, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, the Misses Hall, Mrs. Elliott Flint, the Misses Sherman, Miss Vaughn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Jessie Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, Miss Gilman, Mr. Harry A. Slocomb, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. Edward D. Pearce, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Carrie S. Rand, Miss Annie M. Sumner, Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. Frederick S. Kinyon, Mr. Hugo Kinyon, Miss Agnes DeWolf, Mr. Carl Barus, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Annie S. Drown, Mr. Herbert F. Hinckley, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Miss Helen Kimball, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mrs. Edgar B. Smith, Mrs. Robert F. Noyes, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Mrs. John Street, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mrs. George R. Niven, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. Eleazer B. Homer, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister, Miss Caroline U. Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Frank Spencer, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin F. Arnold, Mrs. J. B. Jones, Mrs. Theodore H. Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. Charles P. Sisson, Mrs. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Alice Brown, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Mr. William Aldrich, Mrs. Dexter Brownell, Miss Mary A. Brownell, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. Albert Greene, Mrs. George H. Fowler, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Miss Amey L. Willson, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Edward C. Sanford, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George L. Shepley, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
NOV 28 1908

The Thursday programme of the Boston Symphony will have Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist. He will play Rachmaninoff's second concerto. The rest of the programme will include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" and Wagner's prelude and liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." Saturday afternoon Sauer will play Schumann's A minor concerto, and the rest of the offerings will be Tschaikowsky's Sixth symphony, Smetana's "The Moldau" and Weber's "Oberon."

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Brooklyn Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 28 1908

The lecture recital preliminary to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, like it, under the joint direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, will be given on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock in Music Hall, Academy of Music, by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with illustrations by Alfred De Voto, piano. Mr. Elson has appeared in previous years in this course. He is well known as conductor, composer, teacher, lecturer and writer on musical topics.

...er Cutting Bureau in the World
...
NOV 27 1908

...RGED DARKENING OF LYRIC DUR-ING SYMPHONY CONCERTS THERE

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL —Photo by Janvier.

Mr. Turnbull was active as a member of the committee which urged the lowering of lights at Symphony Orchestra concerts in this city.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
From
Address
NOV 28 1908
Date

The second Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 4, brings a programme of singular attractiveness. The principal number on it will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which is always warmly welcomed by lovers of the best in music. Although investigations of the last few years have destroyed the tragic story that it was consciously Tschaikowsky's swan song, inspired by his foreboding of the death which so soon was to take him away, it will be hard to disassociate in the minds of most people, the overwhelming grief embodied in the last movement of the symphony from the fate which so soon after its completion robbed the world of one of its greatest geniuses. We now know that Tschaikowsky's brother suggested the name "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky himself being at a loss for a title to the symphony. We now know that Tschaikowsky was full of plans for future work, and in better mental condition than he had been for years. For these reasons the tradition must be rejected, but the circumstances surrounding the writing of the symphony and its first performance in St. Petersburg will make it, in the minds of the public, always one of the tragic compositions in musical literature.

The first number on the programme will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." This was the second in the series of six symphonic poems that the Bohemian composer wrote in celebration of his much-beloved country. The titles of these poems were "Vysehrad," "The Moldau," "Sarka," "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," "Tabor" and "Blanik." In the music the composer has sought to delineate the great river which is so famous in Bohemian history, and the various parts are entitled as follows: "The Source," "The Hunt," "The Rustic Wedding," "Moonlight and Dance of the Nymphs," "The St. John Rapids," "The Broad River," "Vysehrad Motive."

The last number on the programme will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the prominent Russian pianist, and he will play Liszt's second concerto for piano, in A major.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH,
Soloist for Next Week's Brooklyn Concert by Boston Orchestra.

LOWER LIGHTS WILL BURN DIMLY NOW

Victory Gained For Subduing Of Lamps At Symphony Concerts.

DULL ILLUMINATION FOR THE AUDIENCE

Boston Orchestra Agrees To Try The Plan At Request Of Baltimoreans.

Music lovers of Baltimore who belong to what is popularly known as the "lower light" faction are rejoicing today in a signal victory over the "calcium spots" who contend for thirty-third degree illumination of the scenes of melody-making.

The triumphal achievement is an agreement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to lower the lights at the next concert, which is to be given here next Wednesday, and which, by the way, is to be the one hundredth appearance of this musical organization in our midst.

The point of the "lower lights" was won through a petition sent to the management of the orchestra November 16, and which was signed by the most ardent devotees of harmony in the city, including musicians, business and professional men and clergymen, among the latter being Cardinal Gibbons, Rev. E. B. Niver and A. B. Kinsolving.

Music-Lovers' Petition.

The petition read:

To the Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

The undersigned believe that it would add greatly to the public enjoyment of the Boston Symphony concerts if a different arrangement could be made with regard to the lighting of Music Hall. The glaring chandeliers occasion discomfort to many persons in the galleries and the sidelights downstairs are also disagreeable for those in the audience. Inasmuch as these lights are entirely unnecessary and serve only to divert attention from the music, we respectfully request the management of the orchestra to permit the lights in question to be lowered during musical numbers, thus leaving the hall in a subdued light and concentrating the stage lights upon the orchestra, the lights to be turned on full during the intermission and before and after the concert.

Respectfully submitted,

Ernest Hutcheson,	George May,
J. C. Van Hulsteyn,	Miles Farrow,
Harold Randolph,	W. G. Owst,
B. Merrill Hopkinson, M. D.,	Pietro Minetti,
E. L. Turnbull,	O. B. Boise.
Frank Frick,	Geo. T. M. Gibson,
Albert Hildebrandt,	Gordon R. Thayer,
Fred. H. Gottlieb,	Philip Ogden,
G. Wright Nicols,	Fred. M. Colston,
Ira Remsen,	Thomas L. Shearer,
Fabian Franklin,	Edward H. Griffin,
Joseph S. Ames,	J. H. Johnson,
Cardinal Gibbons,	Hiram Woods,
Edwin B. Niver,	A. B. Kinsolving,
Robert Garrett,	Henry B. Jacobs,
Theodore Marburg,	Lawrason Riggs,
Edgar Allan Poe,	J. B. Noel Wyatt,
Wm. M. Ellicott,	Harvey Cushing,
Lawrence Turnbull,	M. Bloomfield,
	Wm. F. Lucas, Jr.

Will Try Scheme.

Today Mr. Turnbull, one of the signers, received the following letter from F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Dear Friend Turnbull—Just a quick line to say I have decided to try the style of lighting asked for, subject on trial to the approval of the majority of our patrons, whose interest we are always ready and glad to serve. Cordially yours,

FRED. R. COMEE.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 28 1908

The lecture recital preliminary to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, like it, under the joint direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, will be given on Thursday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, in Music Hall, Academy of Music, by Louis C. Elson of Boston, with illustrations by Alfred De Voto, piano. Mr. Elson has appeared in previous years in this course. He is well known as conductor, composer, teacher, lecturer and writer on musical topics.

...m
...ress ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
...e ... NOV 28 1908

The second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 4, brings a programme of that singular attractiveness for which Mr. Fiedler is rapidly becoming famous. The principal number on it will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which is always warmly welcomed by lovers of the best in music. Although investigations of the last few years have destroyed the tragic story that it was consciously Tschaikowsky's swan song, inspired by his foreboding of the death which so soon was to take him away, it will be hard to disassociate in the minds of most people, the overwhelming grief embodied in the last movement of the symphony from the fate which so soon after its completion robbed the world of one of its greatest geniuses. We now know that Tschaikowsky's brother suggested the name "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky himself being at a loss for a title to the symphony. We now know that Tschaikowsky was full of plans for future work and in better mental condition than he had been for years. For these reasons, the tradition must be rejected, but the circumstances surrounding the writing of the symphony and its first performance in St. Petersburg will make it, in the minds of the public, always one of the tragic compositions in musical literature. The first number on the programme will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." This was the second in the series of six symphonic poems that the Bohemian composer wrote in celebration of his much beloved country. The titles of these poems were "Vysehrad," "The Moldau," "Sarka," "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," "Tabor" and "Blanik." This particular work was begun in November, 1874, and completed three weeks later, and it was performed for the first time at Zofin, Bohemia, April 4, 1875. In the music the composer has sought to delineate the great river which is so famous in Bohemian history and the various parts are entitled as follows: "The source; the hunt;" the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive. The last number on the programme will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the prominent Russian pianist, and he will play Liszt's second concerto for piano, in A-major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Eagle,
From
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date ... 28 1908

The second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 4, brings a programme of that singular attractivenes sfor which Mr. Fiedler is rapidly becoming famous. The principal number on it will be Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, which is always warmly welcomed by lovers of the best in music. The first number on the programme will be Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau." This was the second in the series of six symphonic poems that the Bohemian composer wrote in celebration of his much beloved country. The titles of these poems were "Vysehrad," "The Moldau," "Sarka," "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," "Tabor," "Blanik." This particular work was begun in November, 1874, and completed three weeks later, and it was performed for the first time at Zofin, Bohemia, April 4, 1875. In the music the composer has sought to delineate the great river which is so famous in Bohemian history, and the various parts are entitled as follows: "The Source," "The Hunt," "The Rustic Wedding," "Moonlight and Dance of the Nymphs," "The St. John Rapids," "The Broad River," "Vysehrad Motive." The last number on the programme will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the prominent Russian pianist, and he will play Lisst's second concerto for piano, in A major.

NEW YORK HERALD,
BROOKLYN ED...
New York City.

Boston Orchestra

Will Give on Friday Evening, in Academy Opera House, Second of Philharmonic Concerts.

With a programme of uncommon interest the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Brooklyn for the second time next week. Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute the orchestra will give the second in the series of philharmonic concerts, with Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, on Friday evening in the opera house of Academy, and will be assisted by Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist. The programme will open with Smetana's symphonic poem, "Moldau," and it is a matter for general rejoicing that the symphony chosen is Tschaikowsky's sixth, better known as the "Pathetique."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will be heard with the orchestra in Liszt's concerto for the pianoforte in A major, and the concluding number will be the Vorspiel from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." On Thursday afternoon Mr. Louis C. Elson, of Boston, will give a lecture recital on the Friday pro-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 22 1908

Notes From the Musical World

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give First of Three Concerts in Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.---Organ Recital at Grace Church This Evening.---Other Notes.

The first of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Providence this winter takes place in Infantry Hall, on Tuesday night, at 8:15 o'clock. Rarely does a Symphony season in Providence open under such auspicious conditions. The success which Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, has had, excited a vast amount of interest among music lovers of this city and the season sale which has just finished shows a considerable increase over that of last year.

The patronage of the orchestra has been steadily growing for the last two of three years until now Providence is one of the best cities it has on the list. The conductors of the orchestra are as careful in their selection of programmes for Providence as they are for New York, and this unquestionably has had its share in the increased patronage that has been given to these concerts.

Mr. Fiedler seems to be particularly happy in his choice of programmes and he has won high praise wherever he has appeared with the orchestra.

The programme that he has chosen for the first Providence concert is one of the most attractive the orchestra has ever presented here. It opens with Rimsky-Korsakoff's extraordinarily brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which, although it has never been played here in Providence, has for a considerable time been one of the great "show pieces" of the orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, after Tschaikowsky, the greatest of Russian composers, died last June and while in matter, perhaps, his music will never take the extraordinarily high rank given to Tschaikowsky's symphonies, in manner he is unsurpassed. In other words, he was one of the greatest masters of the art of orchestration the world has ever known and, in addition to this, he had a gift for attractive melody. The suite of "Scheherazade" is based, as the title implies, on the Arabian Nights.

It is in four parts, the first being entitled "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship;" the second, "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince," the third, "The Young Prince and the Young Princess;" and the fourth, "Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion."

The music is frankly programmatic and gains not the least part of its charm from the high oriental colors that fill the score.

The second orchestral number will be three very charming dances which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl, from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procis." The first is "Tambourin," the second, "Menuet" and the third, "Gigue."

The final orchestral number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Miss Lilla Ormond, the soloist, comes to Providence with a reputation of being one of the finest mezzo-sopranos that this country has ever produced. Her career has been a short one because she is a very young woman, but its shortness has simply served to emphasize its brilliancy. Miss Ormond sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time last season. This year she will sing with the orchestra several times. Moreover, she was one of the principal soloists at the last Worcester festival and has sung in New York with great success. Her first number will be a concert aria, entitled "The complaint of Ariadne," by the French composer, Coquard. For her second number she will sing three songs with piano accompaniment, "Minnelied," "Mainacht" and "Staendchen," all by Brahms.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ss
NOV 28

Will Turn Lights Down.

Mr. E. L. Turnbull received a letter yesterday from Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consenting to have the lights in the Lyric Theater lowered while the musical numbers are being rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These lights have always been considered distracting to the mind, if not also bodily uncomfortable. But recently a move has been made to have the trouble remedied. Mr. E. L. Turnbull drew up a petition and succeeded in having it signed by a number of prominent musicians and music lovers.

Mr. Fred Gottlieb, the principal owner of the Lyric, says "there are excellent reasons for turning the lights down, beside those which are usually mentioned." At the present time the believers in low lights, if not in the majority, yet seem to have the weight of musical authority on their side. The lights were turned down at the last concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist for this concert will be Madame Marie Rappold, one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Rappold has lately sung with the orchestra in Boston, where she had a most notable success.

The feature of the programme will be Strauss' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Haldenleben." Mr. Fielder is regarded in Germany as the greatest interpreter of Strauss' music. He has for a long time been an intimate friend of Strauss, and he himself did much to bring forward this "music of the future" when Strauss was struggling for recognition.

In sharp contrast with this will be three exquisitely charming dances by the French composer, Gretry. They are a "Tambourin," "Menuet" and "Gigue," from the heroic ballet, "Cephalus and Procris." The ballet was written to be a part of the wedding festivities of Charles Philippe, of France, Count d'Artois, who married Princess Marie Theresa of Savoy, November 16, 1773, and it had its first performance in the Palace of Versailles before Louis XV on December 30 of this year. The arrangement of these dances for modern orchestra was made by Felix Mottl.

—o—

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening will have Mme. Marie Rappold, dramatic soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," as the orchestral feature of the program. Mme. Rappold will sing the aria, "Wie Nahte mie der Schlummer," from Weber's "Der Freischuetz," and a group of three songs with piano accompaniment. The orchestra will play, in addition to the Strauss number, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, "Three Dances" from "Cephale et Procris," heroic ballet, by Gretry, for the first time in Philadelphia, and Prelude and Love's Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner.

n TRIBUNE
ress New York City.
NOV 29 1908

CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer will be the soloists at the next pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon respectively. Mr. Gabrilowitsch on Thursday night will make his first appearance after an absence of a year.

The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Mr. Fiedler has just played it in Boston. Mr. Fiedler is a close friend of Strauss, and has studied the score with him, so that the performance should create a more than ordinary interest. On Saturday afternoon the principal offering will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in New York for seven years. Mr. Sauer will play Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra in A major.

The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont".....Beethoven
Tone poem, Ein Heldenleben.....Strauss
Concerto No. 2 in C minor.....Rachmaninow
Mr. Gabrilowitsch.
Vorsang, Finlandia }.....Sibelius

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

The Moldau, Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").....Smetana
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John's Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic".....Tschaikowsky
Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra.Schumann
Overture to the opera "Oberon".....Weber

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date NOV 29 1908

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn next Friday.

...adolf, New York, 1884

Boston Symphony's Next Concert Here Will Be Its 100th In 23 Years

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present series, to be given on next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock at the Lyric, will be the century concert of the Orchestra in this city, for it will make an even hundred concerts that have been given in Baltimore by the Orchestra since it first began to come here, 23 years ago.

Its first concert in Baltimore was in the Academy of Music. There were 80 performers, and Franz Kneisel of the well-known quartet was the first soloist in this city. The encouragement given was small, and, as the rent of the Academy was high, the organization moved to the old Concordia Opera House, on South Eutaw street, afterwards burned down, and later to the Music Hall, now called the Lyric, where it has played ever since.

Founded In 1881.

The Orchestra was founded in 1881 and the first conductor was George Henschel, the next William Gericke; then came Arthur Nikisch, and following him Emil Paur. Gericke returned, then came Dr. Muck and finally Mr. Fiedler. The great patron of the orchestra is Henry L. Higginson of Boston, a man of wealth and a devotee of music.

Madame Emma Eames of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of those attractive programs for which he is rapidly becoming famous.

The principal orchestra offering will be Tschaikowsky's Symphonie Pathetique No. 6, in B minor, possibly now the most popular of all modern works in symphonic form. Although the composer's brother, Modeste, has given a death blow to the fancifully tragic story that Tschaikowsky wrote this symphony under a premonition of approaching death and that thus it may be regarded as his "conscious" swan song, the tradition will endure for long in the popular mind.

Madame Eames' Songs.

Madame Eames has announced that next year she purposes remaining in Europe. Her two numbers will be the fascinating "Bolero," from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the "Prayer" from Puccini's "Tosca," an opera that she has made her own.

The entire program is as follows:

Symphonic poem "The Moldau" (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").....Smetana
Symphony No. 6, in B minor (pathetic).....Tschaikowsky
"Bolero" ("Sicilian Vespers").....Verdi
Madame Eames.
Three Dances from Heroic Ballet "Cephalus and Procris" (freely arranged by Felix Mottl).....Gretry
"Prayer" ("Tosca").....Puccini
Madame Eames.
Prelude and Love's Death ("Tristan and Isolde").....Wagner

SUN,
From
Address New York City.
Date NOV 29 1908

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer will be the soloists at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York on Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, respectively. Mr. Gabrilowitsch on Thursday night will make his first appearance after an absence of a year. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Ein Heldenleben." Mr. Fiedler has just played it in Boston. On Saturday afternoon the principal offering will be Tschaikowsky's Pathetic" symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in New York for seven years. Mr. Sauer will play Schumann's Concerto for piano and orchestra in A major. The full programmes are as follows:

Thurdday evening, December 3—Beethoven, overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84; Richard Strauss, tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," op. 40; Rachmaninow, concerto No. 2, in C minor, for pianoforte, op. 18; Sibelius, Spring Song, "Finlandia." Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

Saturday afternoon, December 5, at 2:30—Smetana, "The Moldau," symphonic poem; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, op. 74; Schumann, concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, op. 54; Weber, overture to the opera "Oberon." Soloist, Emil Sauer.

per Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 29 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Eames Soloist at Second Concert Next Week.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present series, to be given on next Wednesday evening at the Lyric, will be the centennial concert of the orchestra in this city. The soloist will be Madame Emma Eames, of the Metropolitan Opera House.

The principal orchestra offering will be Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," No. 6, in B Minor, possibly now the most popular of all modern works in symphonic form. Although the composer's brother, Modeste, has given a death blow to the fancifully tragic story that Tschaikowsky wrote this symphony under a premonition of approaching death, it will endure for long in the popular mind.

The first number of the program will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," the second of the six works of this kind that the Bohemian composer wrote to celebrate his country. Next on the list of orchestral numbers will be three exquisite Old World dances from Gretry's heroic ballet "Cephalus and Procris," freely arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl. The ballet was written as a part of the festivities attending the wedding of Charles Philippe, of France, Count d'Artois, and Princess Marie Theresa of Savoy and had its first performance in the Palace of Versailles before Louis XV. on December 30, 1773. The final number will be Sibelius' "Varsang" and "Finlandia."

Madame Eames has announced that next year she purposes remaining in Europe. Her two numbers will be the fascinating "Bolero" from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the "Prayer," from Puccini's "Tosca," an opera that she has made her own. The entire program follows:

Symphonic poem "The Moldau" (No. 2 of the Cycle "My Country").....Smetana
Symphony, No. 6, in B-Minor, "Pathetic".....Tschaikowsky
Bolero (Sicilian Vespers).....Verdi
Madame Eames.
Three dances from Heroic Ballet, "Cephalus and Procris" (Freely arranged by Felix Mottl)..Gretry
Prayer (Tosca).....Puccini
Madame Eames.
"Varsang" and "Finlandia".....Sibelius
(First time in Baltimore.)

From
Address
Date

The second Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, brings a programme of that singular attractiveness for which Mr. Fiedler is rapidly becoming famous. The principal number on it will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which is always warmly welcomed by lovers of the best in music. Although investigations of the last few years have destroyed the tragic story, that it was consciously Tschaikowsky's swan song inspired by his foreboding of the death which so soon was to take him away, it will be hard to disassociate in the minds of most people the overwhelming grief embodied in the last movement of the symphony from the fate which so soon after its completion robbed the world of one of its greatest geniuses. It is now known that Tschaikowsky's brother suggested the name "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky himself being at a loss for a title to the symphony. It is now known that Tschaikowsky was full of plans for future work, and in better mental condition than he had been for years. For these reasons the tradition must be rejected, but the circumstances surrounding the writing of the symphony and its first performance in St. Petersburg will make it, in the minds of the public, always one of the tragic compositions in musical literature.

The first number on the programme will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." This was the second in the series of six symphonic poems that the Bohemian composer wrote in celebration of his much-beloved country. The titles of these poems were "Vysehrad," "The Moldau," "Sarka," "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," "Tabor," "Blanik." This particular work was begun in November, 1874, and completed three weeks later, and it was performed for the first time at Zofin, Bohemia, April 4, 1875. In the music the composer has sought to delineate the great river which is so famous in Bohemian history, and the various parts are entitled as follows: "The Source," "The Hunt," "The Rustic Wedding," "Moonlight and Dance of the Nymphs," "The St. John Rapids," "The Broad River," "Vysehrad Motive."

The last number on the programme will be the prelude to "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the prominent Russian pianist, and he will play Liszt's second concerto for piano, in A major.

[100]

MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY

NOV 29 1908

GABRILOWITSCH TO PLAY HERE THURSDAY

Makes New York Reappearance as Soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer will be the soloists at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in this city on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Mr. Gabrilowitsch on Thursday night will make his first New York appearance after an absence of a year.

The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben." The work was first performed here by the Philharmonic Society under Emil Paur on December 8, 1900, and in the following season it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," and the prelude and "Love's Death" from "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play Rachmaninow's Concerto, No. 2, for piano in C minor, opus 18.

On Saturday afternoon the principal offering will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in New York for seven years. The other orchestral numbers will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Weber's overture, "Oberon." Mr. Sauer will play Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra in A major.

---

ess .....

.....

The lecture recital preliminary to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, like it, under the joint direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, will be given on Thursday afternoon next at 4 o'clock in Music Hall, Academy of Music, by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with illustrations by Alfred De Voto, piano. Mr. Elson has appeared in previous years in this course. He is well known as conductor, composer, teacher, lecturer and writer on musical topics. He became head of the Department of Musical Theory in the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, in 1882, and has continued in that position ever since. Among his many lectures have been two series (eighteen in all) before the Lowell Institute, Boston, the chief institution of its kind in America, possibly in the world; also correspondent and editorial writer for a large number of the best papers and magazines. Perhaps he is best known in this connection as musical editor of the Boston "Courier" and the Boston "Advertiser." Of his books that on "The History of German Song" won him the close friendship of Robert Franz. He is the author of the essay on "Music" in the "Encyclopedia Americana" and in the new "Standard Encyclopedia."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

One of the most interested spectators of our post-election festivities was Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is spending his first winter in this country. He was in Washington on election day, where the orchestra gave a concert in the afternoon. That evening he spent wandering about the streets with some friends watching the celebrations. "The most interesting part of it to me was," he said, "that there seemed to be no Republicans and no Democrats that night. Everybody seemed to be celebrating, and if there was any hard feeling over the result one saw no signs of it. And another thing that impressed me was the sobriety of the crowd. There were plentiful signs of high spirits, but I saw not a single drunken man. That would be impossible in England or Germany. A better natured lot of people I never saw in my life."

WORLD,

New York City.

NOV 29 1908

Max Fiedler wrote personally to Dr. Ludwig Wuellner asking him to recite "Das Hexenlied" (Wildenbruch-Schillings) with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 13. Dr. Wuellner's first concert in Chicago taking place on Dec. 12 the offer had to be reluctantly refused, but will give another recital at Mendelssohn Hall on Dec. 18.

WORLD,

New York City.

NOV 29 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer will be the soloists at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mr. Gabrilowitsch on Thursday night will make his first appearance after an absence of a year.

The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Ein Heldenleben." Mr. Fiedler has just played it in Boston. The work was first performed here by the Philharmonic Society, under Emil Paur on Dec. 8, 1900, and in the following season it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. Mr. Fiedler is a close friend of Strauss, and has studied the score with him, so that the performance should create a more than ordinary interest. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont" and two symphonic poems by Sibelius, "Varsang" and "Finlandia," the former being new to New York. Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play Rachmaninow's concerto No. 2, for piano, in C minor, opus No. 18.

On Saturday afternoon the principal offering will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in New York for seven years. The other orchestral numbers will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau;" Weber's overture, "Oberon." Mr. Sauer will play Schumann's Concerto for piano and orchestra in A major.

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date .....

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer will be soloists of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The feature on Thursday will be Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Ein Heldenleben." The work was first performed here by the Philharmonic Society under Paur, in 1900, and in the following season it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke. A close friend of Strauss, Fiedler, has studied the score with him. The performance should create a more than ordinary interest. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Overture "Egmont," and two compositions by Sibelius, "Finlandia," which already has been heard in New York, and "Varsang," unknown here. Gabrilowitsch will play Rachmaninow's Concerto, No. 2, for piano, in C Minor, Opus 18.

On Saturday afternoon the principal offering will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in New York for seven years. The other orchestral numbers will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Weber's overture, "Oberon." Sauer will play Schumann's Concerto for piano and orchestra in A major.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 29 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer will be the soloists at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York on Thursday evening, Dec. 3, and Saturday afternon, Dec. 5. Mr. Gabrilowitsch on Thursday night will make his first appearance after an absence of a year.

The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Ein Heldenleben." Mr. Fiedler has just played it in Boston. The work was first performed here by the Philharmonic Society under Emil Paur on Dec. 8, 1900, and in the following season it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. Mr. Fiedler is a close friend of Strauss and has studied the score with him so that the performance should create a more than ordinary interest. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont" and Sibelius's two symphonic works, "Varsang," (first time in New York,) and "Finlandia." Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play Rachmaninow's Concerto No. 2, for piano, in C minor, Opus 18.

On Saturday afternoon the principal offering will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played in New York for seven years. The other orchestral numbers will be Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." Mr. Sauer will play Schumann's Concerto for piano and orchestra in A major.

---

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

Orchestra with five a recital here soon.
—C. A. Ellis, of Boston, the American manager of Paderewski, has received a cable dispatch from the pianist, saying that he will sail for this country about the middle of January. He will be here only a few weeks. As already announced he will have seven appearances in the East with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Chicago with the Chicago Orchestra and one each in St. Paul and Minneapolis with the orchestras of those cities. He will give not more than ten recitals and not more than one recital in any city. He will bring with him his symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, February 12, and Saturday evening, February 13.

Ex

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

* * *

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The soloist for this concert will be Madame Marie Rappold, one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Rappold has lately sung with the orchestra in Boston, where she had a notable success.

The feature of the program will be Strauss' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Admirers of this great modern German genius will look forward with more than ordinary interest to this performance, because Mr. Fiedler is regarded in Germany as the greatest interpreter of Strauss' music. He has for a long time been an intimate friend of Strauss and he himself did much to bring forward this "music of the future" when Strauss was struggling for recognition. Strauss himself has said that he has never heard "Ein Heldenleben" played as it has been played by Fiedler in Hamburg.

In sharp contrast with this will be three exquisitely charming dances by the French composer, Gretry. They are a "Tambourin," "Menuet" and "Gigue," from the heroic ballet "Cephalus and Procris." The ballet was written to be a part of the wedding festivities of Charles Philippe of France, Count d'Artois, who married Princess Marie Theresa of Savoy, November 16, 1773, and it had its first performance in the palace of Versailles before Louis XV on December 30 of that year. The arrangement of these dances for modern orchestra was made by Felix Mottl.

The entire program is as follows:—

Beethoven ..... Overture, "Egmont"
Richard Strauss. Tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben"
Weber—Aria, "Wie Nahte mir der Schlummer" from "Der Freischutz"
Gretry. Three Dances from "Cephale et Procris" (first time in Philadelphia)
Songs with pianoforte accompaniment:—
(a) Richard Strauss ..... "Allerseelen"
(b) Mozart ..... "Das Veilchen"
(c) Grieg ..... "Ein Traum"
Wagner. Prelude and Love's death, from "Tristan and Isolde"

* * *

From PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address .....

Date NOV 29 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Madame Marie Rappold, one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Rappold has lately sung with the orchestra in Boston, where she had a notable success.

The feature of the program will be Strauss' monumental tone-poem "Ein Heldenleben." Conductor Fiedler is regarded in Germany as the greatest interpreter of Strauss music. Fiedler has for a long time been an intimate friend of Strauss and did much to bring forward this "music of the future." Strauss himself has said that he has never heard "Ein Heldenleben" played as it has been played by Fiedler in Hamburg. "Ein Heldenleben" is huge in idea, huge in execution and huge in proportions. In sharp contrast with this will be three charming dances by the French composer, Gretry. They are a "Tambourin," "Menuet" and "Gigue," from the heroic ballet, "Cephalus and Procris." The ballet was written to be a part of the wedding festivities of Charles Philippe, of France, Count d'Artois who married Princess Marie Theresa, of Savoy, November 16, 1773, and it had its first performance in the Palace of Versailles berore Louis XV on December 30 of that year. The arrangement of these dances for modern orchestra was made by Felix Mottl.

MARIE RAPPOLD.

Madame Rappold will sing "Wie Nahte Mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischuetz," by Weber, and "Allerseelen," Richard Strauss; "Das Veilchen," Mozart, and "Ein Traum," Grieg. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the prelude and love's death from "Tristan und Isolde," Wagner, are also on the program.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

ss .....

NOV 24 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will bring the first soloist of the season, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch returns to this country after an absence of a year, and his coming to Washington will be welcomed by all lovers of the piano.

The principal offering on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's stunning Oriental symphonic suite entitled "Scheherazade." There is a certain sentimental interest attached to the performance of the works of this great Russian composer on account of his recent death. Rimsky-Korsakoff became the leader of the so-called "Neo-Russian school," in distinction from the school which was headed by Tschaikowsky and Rubinstein, which the most ardent patriots refused to accept as typical of their country. He began his career as an officer in the navy, but in his early thirties gave that up to devote himself entirely to music. It is an interesting fact that he was an officer on the famous Russian squadron which came to this country in the '60's, when the North and South were in the midst of the civil war.

The suite is one of the most gorgeous things, from an instrumental color point of view, in the whole literature of orchestral music. It is a work which demands utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra, and since it was first performed, in Boston in 1897, it has been one of the "show" pieces of the orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler, from his close connection with Russia and his intimacy in St. Petersburg with the leading Russian composers, including Rimsky-Korsakoff, is peculiarly fitted to give this work as the composer intended, and he has had great success with it, both in Boston and New York. The last number on the programme will be Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme in full is as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff—Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Opus 35.
Rachmaninow—Concerto No. 2, in C minor, for piano, Op. 18.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio sostenuto.
III. Allegro scherzando.
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Newspaper Cutting ...

n .....

ress .....

.....

MARIE RAPPOLD
To sing with Boston Symphony.
(Copyright by A. Dupont).

Il Re ..... M. Rossi
Un Messagiero ..... M. Dada
Incidental dances by Mlle. Torriani and corps de ballet.
(Her first appearance.)
Conductor ..... Mr. Arturo Toscanini

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist for this concert will be Madame Marie Rappold, one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Rappold has lately sung with the orchestra in Boston, where she had a most notable success. The program is as follows: Overture "Egmont," Beethoven; Tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," Richard Strauss; Aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" from "Der Freischutz," Weber; Three Dances, from "Cephale et Procris Heroic Ballet," Gretry; first time in Philadelphia.

Songs with pianoforte accompaniment; (a). "Allerseelen," Richard Strauss; (b) "Das Veilchen," Mozart; (c) "Ein Traum," Greig; Prelude and Love's—Death from "Tristan und Isolde," Wagner.

---

[101]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 29 1908

Boundry Items.

Among those in the audience on Tuesday night at the first Symphony concert in Infantry Hall were Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mrs. John R. Rathom, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen F. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Edward F. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Miss Dorothy Sturges, Miss Martha B. Willson, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Mr. Frank L. Hinckley, Mr. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Lester Bradner, Jr., Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Miss Alice Thurber, Mrs. Charles A. Nichols, Miss Edith Nichols, Messrs. Edward F. Child, Harold A. Waterman, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. William C. Loring, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary A. Carpenter, Miss Margarethe L. Dwight, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mr. Edward A. Greene, Miss Sarah F. Greene, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, the Misses Hall, Mrs. Elliott Flint, the Misses Sherman, the Misses Vaughn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Jessie Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, Miss Gilman, Mr. Harry A. Slocomb, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. Edward D. Pearce, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Carrie S. Rand, Miss Annie M. Sumner, Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. Frederick S. Kinyon, Mr. Hugo Kinyon, Miss Agnes DeWolf, Mrs. Carl Barus, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mr. Herbert F. Hinckley, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Miss Helen Kimball, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mrs. Edgar B. Smith, Mrs. Robert F. Noyes, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Mrs. John Street, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mrs. George R. Niven, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. Eleazer B Homer, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister, Miss Caroline U. Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Frank G. Spencer, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin F. Arnold, Mrs. J. B. Jones, Mrs. Theodore H. Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. Charles P. Sisson, Mrs. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Alice Brown, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Mr. William F. Aldrich, Mrs. Dexter L. Brownell, Miss Mary A. Brownell, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. Albert Greene, Mrs. George H. Fowler, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Miss Amey L. Willson, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Edward C. Sanford, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George L. Shepley, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell, Mrs. F. Dale Westland and Mr. Frank G. Spencer, Jr.

The Ways of Concert-Goers in Boston.

The audience of the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon in Boston, says the Transcript of that city, is acquiring a new habit and lapsing into an old. The new is the removal of the obstructing hats; the old is the dribbling through the doors at each pause in a symphony when such music happens to end the concert, or at any interval in the closing items of the program. The management of the orchestra has not pressed its objections to the hats, since its unexpected foray of three weeks ago. The placards asking that they be removed still remain, but there is no fresh distribution of warning cards to the careless or the obstinate. The results of the original descent upon the offending still abide. They offend no longer, and the habit of offense is dwindling within them. Hat after hat came off yesterday afternoon as mechanically as they do in a well-governed theater, among spectators willing to be courteous to each other and to those who would give them pleasure from the stage. There is little lifting now of the voice of protest or petulance. A few fortunate reforms advance of themselves, once they are set in motion, and of such seems the removing of hats on Friday afternoons in Symphony hall. The stern-faced dowagers, who as some have it set the agitation afoot, may look complaisantly now upon their work. The other habit is as old as the Symphony concerts. Each succeeding conductor probably hears that it is the custom of a part of the audience on Friday afternoons to drift away in the final half-hour of the concert, and for a few weeks each conductor believes no less that he is breaking the habit. Mr Fiedler has been more fortunate than some of his predecessors. For a month at least he kept his audiences, perhaps by the interest that his novel ways stirred, perhaps by the brilliant overtures with which he oftenest ended his programs. He has ceased to be a new sensation now; his hearers are becoming used to him. A week ago even so brilliant an overture as Beethoven's to "Egmont" would not hold the whole audience. Beethoven's symphony of the dance was no more potent yesterday. The exodus has begun, and each Friday it renews itself; Mr Fiedler deigns not to notice it and thereby is he wise. "I never go out with Beethoven," snapped one of the dowagers yesterday, in audible warning to her neighbors, but some of them went as of old.

REPUBLICAN
NOV 29 1908

Mr Fiedler in Providence.

The Boston Transcript says:—

Mischance befel the Symphony orchestra in its concert at Providence last night, where Mr Fiedler was conducting for the first time. The program originally announced began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," in which the first bassoon tells the tale of the Kalendar prince. Unfortunately, Mr Sadony was ill, and Mr Fiedler wisely decided not to risk the piece with a player unpracticed in the difficult part for the first bassoon. Beethoven's seventh symphony was played instead—a piece in which Mr Fiedler conducts to much less advantage. Consequently, probably, Providence received him less warmly than did Springfield a few weeks ago.

Is it not more probable that Providence was a little frightened by the terrible things metropolitan critics have been saying about Mr Fiedler? Springfield had a first chance at him, and saw that he was good. New York likes Safanoff, but it cannot comprehend Boston except as frappe. Chaste refinement is all New York asks from Boston, and mighty little of that; the symphony orchestra under the admirable Mr Gericke could count on somewhat tepid praise whenever it visited the metropolis. Mr Fiedler is a very different sort of dynamo, and the change is rather staggering. As to his artistic ability it is still too early to be sure; by the end of the season we shall know more about that. But he is certainly a man of power and of temperament, and it is probable that his engagement has been a good thing for Boston; certainly he is admirably qualified to reach the larger public.

TIMES, WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 29 1908

CONCERT TUESDAY.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will bring the first soloist of the season—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch returns to this country after an absence of a year, and his coming to Washington will be welcomed by all lovers of the piano. Of the younger men who practice this branch of the art, Gabrilowitsch ranks easily the first. He will play Rachmaninow's "Concerto, No. 2," in C minor.

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental symphonic suite, entitled "Scheherazade." There is a certain sentimental interest attached to the performance of the works of this great Russian composer on account of his recent death. Rimsky-Korsakoff became the leader of the so-called "Neo-Russian School" in distinction from the school which was headed by Tschaikowsky and Rubinstein which the more ardent patriots refused to accept as typical of their country.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Kommende Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden am Abend des 3. und am Nachmittag des 5. Dezember in Carnegie Hall unter Mitwirkung der Herren Ossip Gabrilowitsch und Emil Sauer als Solisten statt. Das Programm für den Donnerstag Abend lautet: Beethoven, „Egmont"-Ouverture; Richard Strauß, „Ein Heldenleben", Wagner, Vorspiel und Liebestod aus „Tristan und Isolde" und Rachmaninow, 2. Klavier-Konzert (Solist: Herr Gabrilowitsch). Das Samstag Nachmittags-Konzert weist folgendes Programm auf: Smetana, „Die Moldau"; Tschaikowsky, „Pathetique"; Weber, „Oberon"-Ouverture und Schumann, A-Moll-Konzert (Solist: Herr E. Sauer).

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

Paderewski Coming and Other Announcements of Interest.

C. A. Ellis of Boston, the American manager of Paderewski, has received a cable dispatch from the great pianist saying that he will sail for this country about the middle of January, the exact date to be decided later. He will be here only a few weeks. As already announced he will have seven appearances in the East with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Chicago with the Chicago Orchestra, and one each in St. Paul and Minneapolis with the orchestras of those cities. He will give not more than ten recitals and not more than one recital in any city. This will bring down his appearances to a few of the larger cities.

He will bring with him his symphony which will have its first performances in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Feb. 12, and Saturday evening, Feb. 13. It is likely that the symphony will be played in New York and some other of the cities which the orchestra visits. It is also outlined for performance by the Theodore Thomas Or-

---

PUBLIC LEDGER
Address
NOV 29 1908

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist for this concert will be Marie Rappold, one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Rappold has lately sung with the orchestra in Boston, where she had a most notable success.

The feature of the programme will be Strauss's monumental tone-poem "Ein Heldenleben." Strauss himself has said that he has never heard "Ein Heldenleben" played as it has been played by Conductor Fiedler in Hamburg.

When it is possible to get a proper prospective of the work of Richard Strauss, it is likely that "Ein Heldenleben" will be pointed out as the greatest of his achievements in orchestral music. It is huge in idea, huge in execution and huge in proportions. It has excited probably more controversy than any modern work, but today it needs no defender any more than does its composer, for it has taken its place securely among the greatest of modern classics. In sharp contrast with this will be three exquisitely charming dances by the French composer Gretry. They are a "Tambourin," "Menuet" and "Gigue," from the heroic ballet "Cephalus and Phocris."

Marie Rappold.

The ballet was written to be part of the wedding festivities of Charles Philippe of France, Count d'Artois, who married Princess Marie Theresa of Savoy November 16, 1773, and it had its first performance in the Palace of Versailles before Louis XV on December 30 of that year. The arrangement of these dances for modern orchestra was made by Felix Mottl.

The programme:

Beethoven, Overture, "Egmont."
Richard Strauss, Tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben."
Weber, Aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischutz."
Gretry, Three dances from "Cephale et Procris" (Heroic Ballet).
(First time in Philadelphia.)
Songs with pianoforte accompaniment:
a. Richard Strauss, "Allerseelen."
b. Mozart, "Das Veilchen."
c. Grieg, "Ein Traum."
Wagner, Prelude and Love's Death from "Tristan und Isolde."

* * *

RUSSIAN WORKS FEATURED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard in Rimsky-Korsakoff Suite.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will be given in the New National on next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will bring the first soloist of the season—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch returns to this country after an absence of a year, and his coming to Washington will be welcomed by all lovers of the piano. He will play Rachmaninoff's concerto, No. 2, in C minor.

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky Karsakoff's Oriental symphonic suite entitled "Scheherazade." There is a certain sentimental interest attached to the performance of the works of this great Russian composer on account of his recent death. Rimsky-Korsakoff became the leader of the so-called "Neo-Russian School" in distinction from the school headed by Tschaikowsky and Rubinstein, which the more ardent patroits refused to accept as typical of their country.

"Scheherazade," as the name [illegible] was inspired by four different stories in the "Thousand and One Nights," better known as the "Arabian Nights."

The suite is one of the most gorgeous things from an instrumental color point of view in the whole literature of orchestral music. It is a work which demands utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra, and since it was first performed in Boston in 1897, it has been one of their "show" pieces.

Mr. Fiedler, from his close connection with Russia, and his intimacy in St. Petersburg with the leading Russian composers, including Rimsky-Korsakoff, is peculiarly fitted to give this work as the composer intended. He has had great success with it both in Boston and New York. The last number of the program will be Wagner's prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

AT SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In the audience at the first concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday night were President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Miss Dorothy Sturges, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Merwin White, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Virginia Shepley, Miss Edith Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Caroline Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Lister, Mrs. Walter B. Jacobs, Mrs. Lapham, Rev. and Mrs. James E. Connell, Miss M. J. Atwood, Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, Mr. William C. Loring, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess, Mrs. Fred W. Allen, Master Richmond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan W. Littlefield, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. Charles R. Fry, Rev. and Mrs. Lester Bradner, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic N. Luther, Mr. Frank L. Hinckley, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Horace G. Belcher, Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Thurston, Mr and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Douglas Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Rider, Miss Annie S. Brown, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mr. Albert Claflin, Mrs. E. B. Smith, Mrs. Robert F. Noyes, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Miss Margaret L. Dwight, Miss Agnes DeWolf, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Sarah A. Greene, Mrs. Elisha Howard, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Lindsey Cummings, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin F. Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore H. Bliss, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Dempster, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mrs. George L. Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mr. Edward Aborn Greene, Miss Sarah A. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, the Misses Vaughn, Mr. and Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, Miss Jessie Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Elliott Flint, Mr. Harold Waterman, the Misses Sherman, Prof. and Mrs. Albert K. Potter.

ANNOTATION.

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.
NOV 29 1908

MUSIC NOTES.

MR. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, pianist, will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. He will play Rachmaninoff's second concerto. The orchestral feature will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), first given here in 1900 by the Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Emil Paur. Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, is a close friend of the composer and has studied the score with him.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the tone poem "Finlandia," by Sibelius, will complete the programme.

At the second concert of the Boston Orchestra this week, in Carnegie Hall, on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Fiedler will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, in which this orchestra has not been heard here for some years. Other numbers will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The soloist on this occasion will be Mr. Emil Sauer, who will play Schumann's piano concerto.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, as soloist. The program is Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35; Rachmaninow, concerto, No. 2, in C-minor, for piano, op. 18; I, Allegro moderato; II, Adagio sostenuto; III, Allegro scherzando; Wagner, prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

[102]

NOV 29

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Boston Symphony To Give Centennial Concert With Lights Dimmed.

The announcement made by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that, at the request of a number of well-known Baltimore patrons and music lovers, the lights in the main auditorium of the Lyric will be dimmed during the concert Wednesday evening, has been received with much gratification. For a long time it has been contended that the elimination of the glare from the large chandeliers in the Lyric and the lights on the sides would aid in a great measure in the better concentration of attention to the music and musicians.

Several weeks ago a petition urging that the lights be dimmed was sent to the orchestra management, and the latter a few days ago sent word to this city that the request would be granted. Among the signers of the petition were three prominent clergymen—Cardinal Gibbons, Rev. Dr. A. B. Kinsolving and Rev. Dr. Edwin B. Niver.

The coming performance will be the centennial concert of the orchestra in this city, it being the hundredth since the organization has been coming to Baltimore—23 years.

The soloist will be Mme. Emma Eames.

The principal orchestra number will be Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," No. 6, in B minor, possibly now the most popular of all modern works in symphonic form.

The first number on the program will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," the second of the six works of this kind that the Bohemian composer wrote to celebrate his country. Next on the list of orchestral numbers will be three exquisite Old-World dances from Gretry's heroic ballet, "Cephalus and Procris," freely arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl.

Gretry has been described as the "Watteau of music," a most felicitous comparison. The ballet was written as a part of the festivities attending the wedding of Charles Philippe of France (Count d'Artois) and Princess Marie Theresa of Savoy, and had its first performance in the Palace of Versailles before Louis XV on December 30, 1773. The three dances are a tambourin, menuet and gigue. The final number on the program will be the prelude and "Love's Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

Mme. Eames has recently announced that next year she purposes remaining in Europe, so that the appearance here with the Boston Symphony of that distinguished singer gains much interest thereby. Her two numbers will be the fascinating "Bolero," from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the "Prayer," from Puccini's "Tosca," an opera that she has made her own.

Alexander Petschnikoff, a great favorite with Baltimore audiences, and one of the greatest living violinists, will be heard in the sixth of the present series of Peabody recitals next Friday afternoon. Petschnikoff is a Russian by birth, the son of lowly peasants; the grandson of serfs; so his brilliant career seems all the more remarkable. Fortunately for him he happened early in life to fall under the notice of Princess Oursoroff, who took him in charge and made the way clear for him. Among other benefactions she presented him with the famous "Laub" violin, which is said to be the most valuable instrument of its kind in existence. At his last appearance here, two years ago, he was assisted by his wife, a young American woman, whose violin playing was scarcely less remarkable than his own. His program follows:

Sonata	P. Locatelli
Second Concerto	Wieniawski
Cavatina	Cesar Cui
Norwegian Dance	Halvorsen
Melodie	Tschaikowsky
Russian Dance	Petschnikoff

Mr. Hutcheson On Piano

TO LOWER THE LYRIC LIGHTS

The Effect Will Be Tried At Boston Symphony Concert.

Because of the new lighting arrangement at the Lyric, music-lovers have shown much interest in the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given at the Lyric Wednesday night.

Those who believe that music should be absorbed soulfully have gained a great point by having the lights "dimmed." This lowering of the big electric lamps, they affirm, will cause the hearer to be transported into higher realms of feeling than he might otherwise reach with the full glare of the lights.

Mme. Emma Eames, who, it is rumored, may remarry Julian Story, the artist, will be the soloist.

Frau Marie Rappold, die geschätzte Sängerin, war durch einen Unfall — die Dame glitt auf dem Wege zur Probe aus und erlitt eine leichte Verletzung — leider an der Mitwirkung im gestrigen Sonntagskonzerte im Metropolitan Opera House verhindert, hofft jedoch, bereits heute Abend in einem Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Philadelphia wieder auftreten zu können.

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 1- 1903

MME. RAPPOLD SOLOIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Soprano's Powerful, Resonant Tones Heard to Advantage at the Academy.

SINGS CHARMING LYRICS

By William R. Lester

ME. MARIE RAPPOLD, soprano, from the Metropolitan Opera, sang Agatha's scena and aria from "Der Freischuetz" at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening in the Academy of Music, and, in addition, three songs with piano accompaniment — charming lyrics by Mozart, Grieg and Richard Strauss. When unforced in its upper register, Mme. Rappold's voice is of traditional "vocal velvet" quality—resonant, suave and powerful, of refreshing purity of intonation, and disclosing elusive overtones that blended in delightful harmony with the string orchestra, and lent rare lyric beauty to her songs with piano.

Instead of a symphony, Conductor Fiedler presented a dynamic and furious interpretation of Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life), which for ten years past has caused much avidity among ink-pots and amazing activity among critical analyists.

Hence no end of punkish program writing, despite the dictum of Strauss himself, who said, when asked: "There is no need of a program. It is enough to know that there is a hero fighting his enemies."

The composer's remark was the keynote of Conductor Fiedler's rendering through his orchestra—a brilliant and impressive interpretation of a masterwork in modern music.

Three dainty bits of dance music from Gretry's heroic ballet, "Cephalus and Procis," new to this public, were played in lightsome spirit and almost frolicsome outpouring of quaint harmonies—with all the instrumental virtuosity inherent in the great band.

Other numbers were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, rendered in familiar style, and the prelude and Isolde's death, sang from "Tristan und Isolde," the latter a welcome substitution for the "Meistersinger" overture.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Programme Badly Balanced, but Excellently Played by Organization.

MARIE RAPPOLD

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the second concert of the present season at the Academy of Music with Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano of the Metropolitan forces, as soloist. As is almost always the case with this well-nigh perfect organi- beyond criticism; its tone was superb both in quality and quantity, its coloring and phrasing impeccable and its response to its leader so nearly ideal as to make it practically one instrument for the true and complete expression of his musical ideas. Conductor Max Fiedler makes, on his reappearance, an even more satisfactory impression than on his debut here. He is strong and sane and "big" in every sense; he has quiet charm and dignity, modest but firm authority and perfect poise. There is about him nothing of superficial brilliancy nor glitter. His appeal is manly and strong and his readings of scores are the interpretation of a thoroughly grounded and well balanced musician. But his programme last night was very badly chosen. It was, as it were, pitchforked together with no apparent continuity or consistency and, in spite of the splendid work done by both leader and men, the concert for this reason left an impression of unpreparedness and carelessness.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 1- 1903

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mme. Rappold the Soloist—Variety of Instrumental Pieces.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84
Richard Strauss—
Tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," op. 40
Weber—
Scene, "How Tranquilly," and aria, "Softly Sighing," from "Der Freischutz."
Gretry—
Three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris."
Songs with pianoforte—
(a) Richard Strauss.....("Allerseelen"
(b) Mozart.....("Das Veilchen"
(c) Grieg .....("Ein Traum"
Wagner—
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"

Last night's concert of the great Boston Orchestra at the Academy, while it left little, if anything, to be desired as an exhibit of virtuosity and technical perfection, was two hours in length, which exceeds the proper duration of a symphony concert by 15 or 20 minutes. Especially was this true in view of the fact that Strauss loomed large in the programme—and Strauss is not easy to listen to for the unacclimatized ear. Goethe's "Egmont" is hardly a magnum opus of the master, despite the interesting fanfare of the climax, with the piccolo shrilling against the bassoons and the brass and rest of the orchestra—a full-throated effect to which Herr Fiedler's players abundantly did justice.

The Strauss Heldenleben—"Hero Life"—is as the sounding brass or the tinkling cymbal—sometimes one is tempted to apply to it Macbeth's phrase, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Admitting the consummate skill of the orchestration, the question is whether occasional lucid intervals atone for the promiscuous welter of the harmony and the chaotic dissonances. Willy Hess played the love theme on the solo violin admirably and imperturbably, and just enough was heard of Longy's luscious oboe to make one wish for more of his incomparable playing.

Mme. Marie Rappold, the soloist of the evening, was cordially received in the Weber numbers, which in their simplicity and easily flowing melody afforded a grateful contrast to the Strauss cacophonies. And it is true that the Strauss song, "Allerseelan," with its broad cantabile air against more of the composer's typical dissonances, was one of the most appreciated numbers of the evening. Mme. Rappold has not a powerful voice; she does not quite "find you where you live" with her message, and her effort to reach her higher notes is a little too plainly apparent, but her singing gives pleasure because of her artistic restraint and refinement and unerring fidelity to the key.

The dancing measures of Gretry, played by the orchestra, were entirely delightful, and the Gigue, with its obvious rhythm, gave the audience more pleasure apparently than anything else the programme had to offer. The Liebstod, beloved of opera-goers, was played superbly by way of a suitable conclusion.

BOSTON AND STRAUSS

Fiedler Reads the Noisy Tone-Poem, a "Hero's Life."

Beethoven's "Egmont," Weber's aria from "Der Freischutz," Gretry's delightful dances and a group of songs by Strauss, Mozart and Grieg, with Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde," made up a stirring program at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening and took the bad taste out of the mouth caused by a rather noisy reading of Strauss' very noisy, muddy and vainglorious tone poem, "A Hero's Life."

Marie Rappold was the soloist, but was not in her best voice or at ease. Fiedler seemed less furious in his gestures and in accompanying Madame Rappold at the piano was as amiable and mild as a cooing dove. The orchestra gave out a glorious tone and volume, but was hampered by the tone poem, for this epic of Strauss himself belongs more to the barnyard than to elysian realms. It is a huge musical joke perpetrated in colossal vanity and execrable taste. There are some reassuring moments, but these merely lure one as jack-o-lanterns into the nether swamps of noise and confusion worse confounded. The orchestra fought nobly and so did Fiedler, but what of it?

Musical Notes.

With interesting ceremonies and in the presence of a distinguished gathering, the cornerstone was laid yesterday afternoon for the new Boston Opera House, which is designed to take front rank among the temples of music in America. This structure is being built at Huntington avenue and Opera place on a site adjoining that of Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The cornerstone exercises were attended by Gov. Guild, Mayor Hibbard and other persons of prominence, including a party of opera singers and musicians from New York. A bronze box was placed in the cornerstone, containing phonographic records of the voices of Mmes. Nordica, Eames, Nielsen and other distinguished singers, and copies of music written by the foremost American composers.

[103]

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 1- 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert of the Season at The Academy Last Night.

Beethoven, Grieg, Mozart, Eighteenth Century Gletry, von Weber, Richard Strauss, the Small, and Richard Wagner, the Great—what wider range of musical thought and technique can a symphony concert audience ask than was given last night at the Academy by Max Fiedler and the Boston Orchestra? Mme. Marie Rappold, of the Metropolitan forces, was the soloist.

The orchestra, always artistic, always pleasing, did what it could with Strauss's blaring, grating study of dynamics and desonances, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life"), and if the audience did not become enthusiastic it was not the fault either of the organization's splendid musicians nor of Mr. Fiedler, but of Strauss himself.

Strauss has said that Fiedler is the man who best handles "Ein Heldenleben," and that he never realized what was in it until he hard it under Fiedler's baton. It is quite certain that the conductor got out of it all that was in it, but it is equally certain that the work is not destined to popularity among our audiences.

Mme. Rappold, in "Der Freyschutz" scene, and aria, "Softly Sighing," won generous praise. She has a good, clear, pleasing soprano, velvety and rich in middle and lower registers, but which will not stand much forcing on the high notes. She was decidedly at her best in the three songs composing her last number—"Allerseelen," Strauss; "Das Vielchen," Mozart, and "Ein Traum," Grieg. Mr. Fiedler accompanied the singer at the piano most sympathetically. The number was truly enjoyable.

Gretry's Eighteenth Century dance music from "Cephalus and Procris," heard for the first time here, was interesting. It was full of charming melody and the dance spirit, all of which made up for its lack of the modern color and tone. The last number was the one in which the orchestra truly shone—the Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." The musicians seem to feel that here at least they were back on familiar musically ground and played Wagner's stirring measures in splendid form.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, three dances from Gretry's "Cephale et Procris" ballet, and Richard Strauss' symbolical tone poem in six sections entitled "Ein Heldenleben," which, being translated, means "A Hero Life," it being understood that the composer is himself the hero whose experiences, emotions, meditations, tribulations and achievements the score is supposed to describe. There may be those who like that kind of thing, and some of them may have been in last night's audience, but it is a pretty safe guess that the great majority of the people present were sadly bored. One must have a special education to appreciate and enjoy Strauss' cacophonies, prolixities and complications, and for most of us life is too short to acquire it.

The program quotes the comment of a well-known critic, who wrote that "those who wish to understand the poetic purposes of the composer of this work must yield to him not only the right to try to express the simpler feelings, which are generally conceded to be in the province of absolute music, but to publish a great variety of emotional phrases, and to do so by giving arbitrary significance to the themes out of which the work is woven." But what's the use? Music which does not speak for itself, but which needs to be heard and studied with a guide-book in hand, is not music at all, properly speaking, but a kind of puzzle or problem in sounds which may interest the erudite, but which most people would prefer to skip. The thing was wonderfully played, and Mr. Willy Hess contributed a beautiful violin obligato, but one could not help regretting that so much effort and skill had been expended to so little purpose so far as the general enjoyment was concerned.

The assisting artist was Mme. Marie Rappold, who seemed none the worse for her recent accident and who was heard with pleasure and to advantage in the well-known air from "Der Freischutz," and, with pianoforte accompaniment tastefully played by Conductor Fiedler, in Strauss' "Allerseelen," Mozart's "Violet" and Grieg's "Dream." A splendid rendering of the Prelude and "Liebstode" from "Tristan und Isolde" brought the concert to a close.

Theatre
NEW YORK CITY

Before the opera auditorium was flooded with music, the concert halls of this tone-ridden city were doing yeoman service housing one concert after another and catering to the tastes of the musical multitudes.

Who shall be first and who last in the mention? It really matters little, as the welter allows the playing of few favorites. From the standpoint of novelty let the Boston Symphony head the list. This organization has a new conductor this year. He is Max Fiedler, and he is no stranger to New York as he was invited to come here three seasons ago and lead the Philharmonic Society. Now he stands at the head of the famous Boston Band, and he leads it exactly as though he had fallen heir to a magnificent orchestral instrument and was so delighted in playing upon it that he forgot much else. This does not, is not intended to, signify that Fiedler is a poor conductor, for he is not. He is a well routined man, knows many of his scores by heart, and thus conducts "with the score in his head and not his head in the score." And how he dotes on climaxes! His readings are broad and frequently brusque, for he is a virile conductor. Of infinite interest he is not, and his readings did not set the world by the ear. In attitudes and gestures he has been compared to Emil Paur, and this seems a just comparison, for he is one of the energetic school of conductors, but his beat is decisive and broad. It goes without saying that the men from Boston followed their conductor into the thick of every climax, and they played probably louder than they have for years. This comes rather as a surprise and a disappointment to those who love the finesse of this incomparable orchestra; but on the other hand, it will doubtless please those who love the roar of honest and musical brass, and of these there seemed to be a lot, for the new conductor had a hearty reception.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
DEC 2- 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Brilliant Concert at the National Attracts Washington Music Lovers.

Society was out in force yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater to the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it was rewarded with a programme that has been excelled in brilliancy and beauty by no concert this season. It opened with Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after the "Thousand and One Nights." The suite is divided into four movements, "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," and "Festival at Bagdad." Through all the movements run the central theme of "Scheherazade," a florid melodic phrase in triplets.

It was played yesterday afternoon by Willy Hess, the first violin. Through all four movements runs, more or less sharply defined, the sea motive, with its rising and falling arpeggio figure, leading to the chief tonality, E major, when the sea motive is sounded by the full orchestra. The suite follows the fortunes of the enchanted ship, which sails too close to the loadstone rock, and is dashed to pieces when, as Philip Hale says, "the trombones roar out the sea motive against the billowy wave motive in the strings, allegro non troppo e maestoso, C major, 6-4, and there is modulation to the tonic E major as the tempest rages. The storm dies. Clarinets and trumpets scream once more on the march theme of the second movement. There is a quiet ending, with development on the sea and wave motives. The tales are told. Scheherazade, the narrator, who lived with Shahyar in all the pleasure and solace of life and its delights, till they took them the destroyer of delights and the severer of societies, the desolator of dwelling-places and garnerer of graveyards, and they were translated to the truth of Almighty Allah—fades with the vision and the final note of her violin."

The soloist of the concert was Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who played Rachmaninow's "Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2," a wonderfully colorful piece of music in three movements. It was played in a masterly way, so that at its close several of the more enthusiastic in the audience cheered it as well as applauded.

The concert ended with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, that overture of which a critic once wrote: "It is a kind of music which does not treat you fairly, but bullies you, as it were, by its superior noise of bulk, as physically big men are prone to do who can so easily displace you on the sidewalk." The full beauty and strength of this overture was made manifest by the orchestra, and it was a fitting close to a [illegible] concert.

PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 1- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiedler Gives Superb Reading of a Strauss? Tone Poem.

At the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening, Conductor Max Fiedler added immensely to the favorable impression he made on his first appearance here. The program he offered was rich in variety and was well-balanced in arrangement. The soloist was Mme. Marie Rappold, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The principal interest of the evening from a musician's standpoint was the stupendous tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," of Richard Strauss. This is, perhaps, the composer's greatest orchestral work, and represents the intricacy and technique in instrumentation of the great genius at his best. Although Strauss is foremost of the school of so-called program music writers, he has gone on record as asserting that "There is no need of a program" for this work. "It is enough to know there is a hero fighting his enemies." Yet some one has supplied the deficiency, and indicated, in this instance with some regard for the subject matter, that the "Poem" may be divided clearly into six sections. "Ein Heldenleben" is said to be an autobiographical work, and this is made evident and clear by the introduction into the last section of a number of themes from his earlier works—"Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklaerung," etc.

The work is a masterpiece of orchestration, grand in conception and superbly carried out, but like most of Strauss' music it is so complex, so abstract and so full of harmonic clashes that it is doubtful if it will always be given a reading sufficiently clear and incisive to make plain all the composer intended. In Fiedler, the "poem" has an unusual interpreter. Nothing could have been more exquisite than the solo violin work of Mr. Hess in the amorous episode and the entire "poem" was given a powerful reading. The audience appeared very restive during the last two movements, but recovered sufficiently to bestow a generous approval.

Mme. Rappold delighted with the freshness and beauty of her voice's suggesting Gadski at her best. The Mozart number, "Das Veilchen," was better adapted to the singer's range than her other offerings and for that reason was the most enjoyable. Fiedler proved to be an unusually capable and artistic accompanist.

The Gretry dance pieces were vastly enjoyed.

At Other Houses

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 2- 1908

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Roosevelt Attends The Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Dec. 1.—Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, was in a box at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fielder conducting and Ossip Gabrilowitch soloist, this afternoon in the National Theatre. Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Metcalf and Count von Moltke, Minister from Denmark, accompanied her. In the opposite box were Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; the Viscountess de Martel, Mrs. Leiter and Mrs. Hitt. Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, Mme. de Blanpre, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce were others in boxes. In the audience were Mrs. Garfield, Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Coolidge and Miss Coolidge, the Consul-General to London and Miss Ida Wynne, Mrs. Arthur Lee, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Theodore Noyes and Mrs. Hunt Slater.

Baroness Bode, sister of the military attache of the Russian Embassy, entertained at a small luncheon today in their home on S street.

Mr. and Mrs. George Howard were dinner hosts this evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 2- 1908

Mrs. Roosevelt was in a box at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Felder, conducting, and Ossip Gabrilowitch, soloist, yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the former Secretary of the Navy, and Count von Moltke, Minister from Denmark, accompanied her. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; the Viscountess de Martel, Mrs. Leiter, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, Mme. de Blanpre, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, and Mrs. Kutchin were others in boxes. In the audience were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Wright, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Mrs. Coolidge and Miss Coolidge, wife and daughter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; the Consul General to London and Miss Ida Wynne; Mrs. Arthur Lee, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Theodore Noyes, and Mrs. Hunt Slater.

TIMES,
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 2- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Second Program of the Season Draws an Enthusiastic Audience.

"SCHEHERAZADE" IS CHIEF PIECE

Story of Thousand and One Tales Told by Four Unusually Good Movements in Music.

The Boston Symphony's second program of the season—yesterday afternoon at the National—included a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a concerto for the piano by Rachmaninow, tenderly played, if not forcefully, by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers." It drew to the theater an audience of unusual size and social brilliance, the applause was frequent, and for the orchestra more than hearty. For Mr. Gabrilowitsch the favor took the form of cheers.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff work is named "Scheherazade," after that Sultana who saved her life by interesting her lord in the thousand and one tales, and the four movements are musical interpretations of the stories of "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Princess," and "The Festival at Bagdad," where the ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a brass warrior.

The motif, a brilliant and characteristic wave theme, is played for the most part by Willy Hess, first violinist, but is transferred now and then to the wood and wind, and has a singular and appealing beauty.

Color Is High.

The color of the orchestration is high, and the theme, though almost constantly used, and given a similar tranquillity at the close of each movement, is never monotonous. The selection of this suite—in memory of the composer, who died last June—proved a source of general pleasure to this audience.

The Rachmaninow concerto (No. 2, in C minor, Op. 18) took Mr. Gabrilowitsch into the field of forcefulness and power. With all this pianist's sentiment and skill, the venture did not justify itself. He is never a forceful performer. His is the temperament which sacrifices dramatic effect to sentiment. He is of the school of emotionalists, and to delicacy rather than power was due the interest manifested yesterday. In the second movement of the concerto he took almost a romantic turn, and it seemed as if some beautiful love story was being related; as each note died away it became almost a whisper trembling in the air.

Audience Enthused.

The audience was so enthusiastic as not only to applaud a great deal, but cheer as well.

It was unfortunate for those in the rear that the accompanient of the orchestra was not more softly played. At times the audience could only see the movements of the pianist's body, and could not hear a sound of the piano.

The concert ended with the prelude to "The Mastersingers." In liveliness, beauty, and strength it proved a fitting ending to an extremely interesting concert.

From THE EVENING TELEGRAM
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date DEC 1 - 1908

MAX FIEDLER, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was deeply impressed, so he tells me, with the scenes on election night. He spent election evening wandering about the streets of Washington. "The most interesting part of it to me was that there seemed to be no Republicans or Democrats that night. Everybody seemed to be holding high festival, and if there were hard feelings over the result, there were no signs of it," he said.

"Another thing that impressed me was the sobriety of the crowd. There was plenty of high spirits, but I never noticed a drunken man. That would be impossible in England or Germany. A better-natured crowd than the American crowd I have never seen."

Theatre

Before the opera auditorium was flooded with music, the concert halls of this tone-ridden city were doing yeoman service housing one concert after another and catering to the tastes of the musical multitudes.

Who shall be first and who last in the mention? It really matters little, as the welter allows the playing of few favorites. From the standpoint of novelty let the Boston Symphony head the list. This organization has a new conductor this year.

He is Max Fiedler, and he is no stranger to New York as he was invited to come here three seasons ago and lead the Philharmonic Society. Now he stands at the head of the famous Boston Band, and he leads it exactly as though he had fallen heir to a magnificent orchestral instrument and was so delighted in playing upon it that he forgot much else. This does not, is not intended to, signify that Fiedler is a poor conductor, for he is not. He is a well routined man, knows many of his scores by heart, and thus conducts "with the score in his head and not his head in the score." And how he dotes on climaxes! His readings are broad and frequently brusque, for he is a virile conductor. Of infinite interest he is not, and his readings did not set the world by the ear. In attitudes and gestures he has been compared to Emil Paur, and this seems a just comparison, for he is one of the energetic school of conductors, but his beat is decisive and broad. It goes without saying that the men from Boston followed their conductor into the thick of every climax, and they played probably louder than they have for years. This comes rather as a surprise and a disappointment to those who love the finesse of this incomparable orchestra; but on the other hand, it will doubtless please those who love the roar of honest and musical brass, and of these there seemed to be a lot, for the new conductor had a hearty reception.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

DEC 2- 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Brilliant Concert at the National Attracts Washington Music Lovers.

Society was out in force yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater to the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it was rewarded with a programme that has been excelled in brilliancy and beauty by no concert this season. It opened with Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after the "Thousand and One Nights." The suite is divided into four movements, "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," and "Festival at Bagdad." Through all the movements run the central theme of "Scheherazade," a florid melodic phrase in triplets.

It was played yesterday afternoon by Willy Hess, the first violin. Through all four movements runs, more or less sharply defined, the sea motive, with its rising and falling arpeggio figure, leading to the chief tonality, E major, when the sea motive is sounded by the full orchestra. The suite follows the fortunes of the enchanted ship, which sails too close to the loadstone rock, and is dashed to pieces when, as Philip Hale says, "the trombones roar out the sea motive against the billowy wave motive in the strings, allegro non troppo e maestoso, C major, 6-4, and there is modulation to the tonic E major as the tempest rages. The storm dies. Clarinets and trumpets scream once more on the march theme of the second movement. There is a quiet ending, with development on the sea and wave motives. The tales are told. Scheherazade, the narrator, who lived with Shahyar in all the pleasure and solace of life and its delights, till they took them the destroyer of delights and the severer of societies, the desolator of dwelling-places and garnerer of graveyards, and they were translated to the truth of Almighty Allah—fades with the vision and the final note of her violin."

The soloist of the concert was Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who played Rachmaninow's "Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2," a wonderfully colorful piece of music in three movements. It was played in a masterly way, so that at its close several of the more enthusiastic in the audience cheered it as well as applauded.

The concert ended with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, that overture of which a critic once wrote: "It is a kind of music which does not treat you fairly, but bullies you, as it were, by its superior noise of bulk, as physically big men are prone to do who can so easily displace you on the sidewalk." The full beauty and strength of this overture was made manifest by the orchestra, and it was a fitting close to a remarkable concert.

ss

DEC 2- 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiedler Gives Superb Reading of a Strauss' Tone Poem.

At the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening, Conductor Max Fiedler added immensely to the favorable impression he made on his first appearance here. The program he offered was rich in variety and was well-balanced in arrangement. The soloist was Mme. Marie Rappold, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The principal interest of the evening from a musician's standpoint was the stupendous tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," of Richard Strauss. This is, perhaps, the composer's greatest orchestral work, and represents the intricacy and technique in instrumentation of the great genius at his best. Although Strauss is foremost of the school of so-called program music writers, he has gone on record as asserting that "There is no need of a program" for this work. "It is enough to know there is a hero fighting his enemies." Yet some one has supplied the deficiency, and indicated, in this instance with some regard for the subject matter, that the "Poem" may be divided clearly into six sections. "Ein Heldenleben" is said to be an autobiographical work, and this is made evident and clear by the introduction into the last section of a number of themes from his earlier works—"Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklaerung," etc.

The work is a masterpiece of orchestration, grand in conception and superbly carried out, but like most of Strauss' music it is so complex, so abstract and so full of harmonic clashes that it is doubtful if it will always be given a reading sufficiently clear and incisive to make plain all the composer intended. In Fiedler, the "poem" has an unusual interpreter. Nothing could have been more exquisite than the solo violin work of Mr. Hess in the amorous episode and the entire "poem" was given a powerful reading. The audience appeared very restive during the last two movements, but recovered sufficiently to bestow a generous approval.

Mme. Rappold delighted with the freshness and beauty of her voice's suggesting Gadski at her best. The Mozart number, "Das Veilchen," was better adapted to the singer's range than her other offerings and for that reason was the most enjoyable. Fiedler proved to be an unusually capable and artistic accompanist.

The Gretry dance pieces were vastly enjoyed.

At Other Houses

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Roosevelt Attends The Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Dec. 1.—Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, was in a box at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fielder conducting and Ossip Gabrilowitch soloist, this afternoon in the National Theatre. Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Metcalf and Count von Moltke, Minister from Denmark, accompanied her. In the opposite box were Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; the Viscountess de Martel, Mrs. Leiter and Mrs. Hitt. Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, Mme. de Blanpre, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce were others in boxes. In the audience were Mrs. Garfield, Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Coolidge and Miss Coolidge, the Consul-General to London and Miss Ida Wynne, Mrs. Arthur Lee, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Theodore Noyes and Mrs. Hunt Slater.

Baroness Bode, sister of the military attache of the Russian Embassy, entertained at a small luncheon today in their home on S street.

Mr. and Mrs. George Howard were dinner hosts this evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

ress

DEC 2- 1906

Mrs. Roosevelt was in a box at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Felder, conducting, and Ossip Gabrilowitch, soloist, yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the former Secretary of the Navy, and Count von Moltke, Minister from Denmark, accompanied her. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; the Viscountess de Martel, Mrs. Leiter, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, Mme. de Blanpre, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Mr., and Mrs. Lisner, and Mrs. Kutchin were others in boxes. In the audience were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Wright, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Mrs. Coolidge and Miss Coolidge, wife and daughter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; the Consul General to London and Miss Ida Wynne; Mrs. Arthur Lee, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Theodore Noyes, and Mrs. Hunt Slater.

TIMES,

DEC 2- 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Second Program of the Season Draws an Enthusiastic Audience.

"SCHEHERAZADE" IS CHIEF PIECE

Story of Thousand and One Tales Told by Four Unusually Good Movements in Music.

The Boston Symphony's second program of the season—yesterday afternoon at the National—included a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a concerto for the piano by Rachmaninow, tenderly played, ff not forcefully, by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers." It drew to the theater an audience of unusual size and social brilliance, the applause was frequent, and for the orchestra more than hearty. For Mr. Gabrilowitsch the favor took the form of cheers.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff work is named "Scheherazade," after that Sultana who saved her life by interesting her lord in the thousand and one tales, and the four movements are musical interpretations of the stories of "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Princess," and "The Festival at Bagdad," where the ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a brass warrior.

The motif, a brilliant and characteristic wave theme, is played for the most part by Willy Hess, first violinist, but is transferred now and then to the wood and wind, and has a singular and appealing beauty.

Color Is High.

The color of the orchestration is high, and the theme, though almost constantly used, and given a similar tranquillity at the close of each movement, is never monotonous. The selection of this suite—in memory of the composer, who died last June—proved a source of general pleasure to this audience.

The Rachmaninow concerto (No. 2, in C minor, Op 18) took Mr. Gabrilowitsch into the field of forcefulness and power With all this pianist's sentiment and skill, the venture did not justify itself. He is never a forceful performer. His is the temperament which sacrifices dramatic effect to sentiment. He is of the school of emotionalists, and to delicacy rather than power was due the interest manifested yesterday. In the second movement of the concerto he took almost a romantic turn, and it seemed as if some beautiful love story was being related; as each note died away it became almost a whisper trembling in the air.

Audience Enthused.

The audience was so enthusiastic as not only to applaud a great deal, but cheer as well.

It was unfortunate for those in the rear that the accompanient of the orchestra was not more softly played. At times the audience could only see the movements of the pianist's body, and could not hear a sound of the piano.

The concert ended with the prelude to "The Mastersingers." In liveliness, beauty, and strength it proved a fitting ending to an extremely interesting concert.

From

Address

Date 1906

MAX FIEDLER, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was deeply impressed, so he tells me, with the scenes on election night. He spent election evening wandering about the streets of Washington. "The most interesting part of it to me was that there seemed to be no Republicans or Democrats that night. Everybody seemed to be holding high festival, and if there were hard feelings over the result, there were no signs of it," he said.

"Another thing that impressed me was the sobriety of the crowd. There was plenty of high spirits, but I never noticed a drunken man. That would be impossible in England or Germany. A better-natured crowd than the American crowd I have never seen."

[104]

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 1- 1908

HUNDREDTH CONCERT HERE

Mr. Turnbull Discusses Boston Symphony's Artistic Excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which returns to Baltimore on Wednesday evening, with the added attractions of Mme. Eames and "dim lights," has now begun the twenty-eighth season since its founding by generous Mr. Higginson, who must enjoy the satisfaction of knowing that he has done more for the cause of orchestral music than any man in the world. For has he not established the finest orchestra the world has known?

I hear that Dr. Muck told a friend last summer, who inquired how he liked returning to German orchestras, that the Boston Orchestra had "spoiled him for everything else." For 24 seasons now this incomparable body of musicians has honored Baltimore with its visits, playing in divers places—the Lyceum Theatre, the old Concordia Opera House, the Academy of Music and finally the present Music Hall, which was opened with a brilliant concert by the orchestra. Once, when we were threatened with a possible loss of the concerts because of inadequate support, public-spirited citizens tided over the crisis in our musical history with a guarantee fund, which, it is pleasant to record, was never called upon, so well did the public respond. Since that time the audiences have been steadily growing in numbers and appreciation, until Baltimore has come to be regarded by the orchestra and its genial manager, Mr. Comee, as one of their best stands.

Tomorrow evening marks the one hundredth concert here. The symphony chosen for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic," of which the great composer naively said, "Now I have composed a new symphony which I shall certainly not tear up."

The real romance of Tschaikowsky's life is woven about the glorious music of his Fourth Symphony, which the Philadelphia Orchestra played so well at its first concert this season. The score bears the simple dedication, "A mon meilleur ami." And this "best friend" was a wealthy Moscow widow, some nine years older than Tschaikowsky and rejoicing in the formidable name of Nadeshda Filaretowna von Meck. She also had 11 children, but was evidently not so completely absorbed by these family cares of no mean proportion as to be unable to indulge her admiration for Tschaikowsky's genius. She has been described as a "proud and energetic woman, of strong convictions, with the mental balance and business capacity of a man; absolutely free from sentimentality in her relations with others, yet capable of deep feeling and of being completely carried away by what was lofty and beautiful."

Mme. von Meck, hearing of the financial straits in which Tschaikowsky, after the manner of geniuses, was immersed, insisted upon making him an annual allowance of $3,000, so that he might compose in peace. How much the world owes her for that generous deed! In conferring this gift she exacted of him a promise that he would never seek a personal acquaintance. "The more you fascinate me," she wrote, "the more I shrink from knowing you." And he gallantly replied, "Nadeshda Filaretowna, every note which comes from my pen in future is dedicated to you."

For 13 years this curious romance flourished through correspondence, but they never met, except once by accident, and then they passed as strangers. Finally Mme. von Meck fell ill and unceremoniously cut off both the allowance and the correspondence.

Tschaikowsky's own description of the symphony he had dedicated to her tells us that the music was meant to portray Fate, that "fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness from gaining the goal." The finale contains a word of encouragement, however, and is intended to be a picture of a "folk holiday." In the words of the composer, "If you find no pleasure in yourself, look about you. Go to the folk. They neither see nor feel that you are lonely and sad. How they enjoy themselves! And will you maintain that everything in the world is sad and gloomy? Rejoice in the happiness of others—and you can still live."

The great composer was inconsolable over the change of heart of his benefactress, and when he died, two years later, her name was constantly upon his lips in his last delirium. She survived him by only two months. Thus ended a singular romance.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
DEC 3- 1908

Gabrilowitsch, who will play the Rachmaninoff concerto to-night with the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the assisting artist at the next Kneisel concert, to be given December 15. With Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Willeke the Russian pianist will give the trio in B flat major by Schubert. Mr. Kneisel and his associates will play Schumann's quartet in A major and Grieg's unfinished quartet in G minor.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 2- 1908

The British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce occupied a box at the National Theater yesterday for the Boston Symphony concert, entertaining Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and Miss Perkins. Mrs. Charles A. Williams had with her in her box Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Miss Gwynn, and Miss Williams. Mrs. Leiter had in her box Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador; Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. George Cabot Lodge, Mrs. J. R. Williams, and Miss Clapperton.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Jeffrey Parsons were in another box, and had, among their guests, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Scott Smith and Mr. Herbert Putnam.

In the audience were Mrs. James Garfield, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Huntington Wilson, Mrs. Robert Mason, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Julian James; Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover; Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Andenried; Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard; Mrs. Robert Hinkley, Mrs. Ferney, of Philadelphia; Mr. and Mrs. William Eno, Mr. Reginald Huidekoper, Mme. de Blanpre, Baroness Preusschen von und zu Liebenstein, Viscount de Sainte Phalc, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. Alfred Dietrick, Mrs. Violet Blair Janin; Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, the consul general to London, Mr. Robert J. Wynne, and Miss Ida Wynne; the Swedish minister and Mme. de Lagercrantz, and the Misses de Lagercrantz, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Thomas Gaff, Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Harlan, the Misses Harlan, Mrs. John E. Wilkie, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Henry Butler, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt, Mrs. Philip Hichborn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Mrs. John Rodgers, and Mrs. James Lowndes.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 3- 1908

Emil Sauer, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday afternoon, will play the Schumann piano concerto. This pianist's farewell recital will be given Wednesday at Mendelssohn hall. Sauer has prepared a very remarkable programme, including five Scarlatti sonatas, the Liszt sonata, a group of three Chopin numbers, three of his own compositions and the concert paraphrase of motifs from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin," by Pabst. Sauer will withdraw entirely from the concert stage and live quietly in his Dresden home.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES

THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS

BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR,
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.

ON THE MUSICAL WORLD

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony with which Mr. Fiedler won so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto, in A Major.

From JOURNAL OF COMMERCE,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 4 1908

The Hess-Schroeder Quartette, it is announced, will give three concerts on January 14, February 10 and March 3 at Mendelssohn Hall. The quartette is under the leadership of Professor Willy Hess, at present concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who received his honorary title from the German Emperor. He is as well known in Europe as in this country. He has been engaged in quartette work for a great part of his career. The first violin will be in his hands. The other members of the quartette are J. von Theodorowicz, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncello. There will be produced at least four works never before heard here, [illegible] Trio Caprice," Hugo [illegible] Quartette in C Major, [illegible] in E minor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra At The Lyric Last Evening.

An immense audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric yesterday evening when this famous organization gave its one hundredth performance in Baltimore. The following program was presented:

"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country") ..... Smetana

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74 ..... Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

Prayer from "Tosca" ..... Puccini

Three Dance Pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet. (First time in Baltimore) ..... Gretry
I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.
(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Mott.)
Felix Mottl.)

Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi

(a) A Song of "Spring," for Orchestra, Op. 16 (First time in Baltimore) ..... Sibelius
(b) "Finland"; Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7. (First time in Baltimore) ..... Sibelius

Soloist ..... Mme. Eames

Mr. Fiedler deserves our gratitude for the interesting novelties introduced at this concert. The "Three Dances," by Gretry, are graceful compositions, their arrangement for concert use by Mottl is musicianly, unpretentious, but extremely effective, and their rendering left nothing to be desired. The Menuet, in particular is full of delicate charm and displayed to perfection the exquisite finish of the wood-wind instruments. The two pieces by Jean Sibelius, however, are of much greater merit. The lyrical mood of the first is admirably sustained, the passionate patriotism of the second highly stirring. Sibelius is a composer of power and originality. His ideas are pregnant, his form coherent and his treatment of the orchestra sonorous and imaginative. Finland is justly proud of him and his fame is rapidly spreading.

Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau," is little known in this country. It begins most promisingly, but the working out is patchy and the climax weak, almost trivial.

It is unfortunately impossible to praise last night's performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony." In the first movement several of the wind instruments were noticeably out of tune. So astonishing an occurrence can only be explained by the recent violent changes of temperature. Doubtless the mishap had a disconcerting influence on conductor and players alike. Be this as it may, the symphony fell far short of its usual effect, many details of the score being lost or obscured. The second movement was taken at a tempo considerably slower than that prescribed by the composer and it suffered from the change.

Madame Emma Eames was the soloist of the occasion. Though her voice was not at its best, she sang the prayer from "La Tosca" beautifully. The Verdi Bolero aroused much enthusiasm among the public, but was less satisfactory to the musician. It is a composition of small artistic value.

E. H.

News Dec 3

HUNDREDTH CONCERT HERE

Mr. Turnbull Discusses Boston Symphony's Artistic Excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which returns to Baltimore on Wednesday evening, with the added attractions of Mme. Eames and "dim lights," has now begun the twenty-eighth season since its founding by generous Mr. Higginson, who must enjoy the satisfaction of knowing that he has done more for the cause of orchestral music than any man in the world. For has he not established the finest orchestra the world has known?

I hear that Dr. Muck told a friend last summer, who inquired how he liked returning to German orchestras, that the Boston Orchestra had "spoiled him for everything else." For 24 seasons now this incomparable body of musicians has honored Baltimore with its visits, playing in divers places—the Lyceum Theatre, the old Concordia Opera House, the Academy of Music and finally the present Music Hall, which was opened with a brilliant concert by the orchestra. Once, when we were threatened with a possible loss of the concerts because of inadequate support, public-spirited citizens tided over the crisis in our musical history with a guarantee fund, which, it is pleasant to record, was never called upon, so well did the public respond. Since that time the audiences have been steadily growing in numbers and appreciation, until Baltimore has come to be regarded by the orchestra and its genial manager, Mr. Comee, as one of their best stands.

Tomorrow evening marks the one hundredth concert here. The symphony chosen for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic," of which the great composer naively said, "Now I have composed a new symphony which I shall certainly not tear up."

The real romance of Tschaikowsky's life is woven about the glorious music of his Fourth Symphony, which the Philadelphia Orchestra played so well at its first concert this season. The score bears the simple dedication, "A mon meilleur ami." And this "best friend" was a wealthy Moscow widow, some nine years older than Tschaikowsky and rejoicing in the formidable name of Nadeshda Filaretowna von Meck. She also had 11 children, but was evidently not so completely absorbed by these family cares of no mean proportion as to be unable to indulge her admiration for Tschaikowsky's genius. She has been described as a "proud and energetic woman, of strong convictions, with the mental balance and business capacity of a man; absolutely free from sentimentality in her relations with others, yet capable of deep feeling and of being completely carried away by what was lofty and beautiful."

Mme. von Meck, hearing of the financial straits in which Tschaikowsky, after the manner of geniuses, was immersed, insisted upon making him an annual allowance of $3,000, so that he might compose in peace. How much the world owes her for that generous deed! In conferring this gift she exacted of him a promise that he would never seek a personal acquaintance. "The more you fascinate me," she wrote, "the more I shrink from knowing you." And he gallantly replied, "Nadeshda Filaretowna, every note which comes from my pen in future is dedicated to you."

For 13 years this curious romance flourished through correspondence, but they never met, except once by accident, and then they passed as strangers. Finally Mme. von Meck fell ill and unceremoniously cut off both the allowance and the correspondence.

Tschaikowsky's own description of the symphony he had dedicated to her tells us that the music was meant to portray Fate, that "fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness from gaining the goal." The finale contains a word of encouragement, however, and is intended to be a picture of a "folk holiday." In the words of the composer, "If you find no pleasure in yourself, look about you. Go to the folk. They neither see nor feel that you are lonely and sad. How they enjoy themselves! And will you maintain that everything in the world is sad and gloomy? Rejoice in the happiness of others—and you can still live."

The great composer was inconsolable over the change of heart of his benefactress, and when he died, two years later, her name was constantly upon his lips in his last delirium. She survived him by only two months. Thus ended a singular romance.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

[E105]

SUN,
New York City.
DEC 4 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Rachmaninow's Second Piano Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night gave Conductor Max Fiedler an opportunity to turn loose the full power of his instrumental forces in the tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss. As every one now knows, this work presents an epitome in music of the career of the composer as viewed by himself. He has ideals, he has critics, he has a love, he has a battle against all opposing forces, his victory is crowned by the love, and then he settles down in peace to write his great compositions, of which various themes are quoted so that we may know just what is going on.

Besides this imposing autobiography Mr. Fiedler conducted Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Sibelius's "Varsang" and "Finlandia." Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist and his number was the second piano concerto of Rachmaninow. We have heard a great deal of this concerto of late and most music lovers are at a loss to know why. It cannot of course be that when one pianist has failed to achieve a success with it another determines to show that he can succeed.

Pianists never indulge in petty rivalries. They are great artists. Nevertheless it is a pity that Mr. Gabrilowitsch, a pianist of singularly charming style, should waste his art on this dull and unfruitful composition. If he cannot find new pieces for his répertoire that are better than this, why does he not write one himself? Other pianists have tried it.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
New York City.
DEC 4 1908

With the Boston Symphony.

THERE was a wide variety in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. From Beethoven's Egmont overture to Strauss' "A Hero's Life," then to a Rochmaninow concerto, concluding with two delightful tone poems by Sibelius, there was a wealth of offerings, indeed.

It was in the Strauss symphonic poem, with its intensely modern depiction of a soldier's struggles, victories and love that the full resources of the great orchestra were revealed. While Mr. Fielder's reading of the work was more restrained than some readings previously heard in this city, his grasp of the work was masterly and inspiring, never for a moment becoming incoherent even in the wildest episodes of Strauss' fighting hero's experiences.

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist in the concerto, roused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. After the obvious strains of the Rochmaninow composition, the tone poems by Sibelius "Spring" and "Finland," came with a wholesome effect that was refreshing.

SUN.
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 1- 1908

HUNDREDTH CONCERT HERE

Mr. Turnbull Discusses Boston Symphony's Artistic Excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which returns to Baltimore on Wednesday evening, with the added attractions of Mme. Eames and "dim lights," has now begun the twenty-eighth season since its founding by generous Mr. Higginson, who must enjoy the satisfaction of knowing that he has done more for the cause of orchestral music than any man in the world. For has he not established the finest orchestra the world has known?

I hear that Dr. Muck told a friend last summer, who inquired how he liked returning to German orchestras, that the Boston orchestra had "spoiled him for everything else." For 24 seasons now this incomparable body of musicians has honored Baltimore with its visits, playing in divers places—the Lyceum Theatre, the old Concordia Opera House, the Academy of Music and finally the present Music Hall, which was opened with a brilliant concert by the orchestra. Once, when we were threatened with a possible loss of the concerts because of inadequate support, public-spirited citizens tided over the crisis in our musical history with a guarantee fund, which, it is pleasant to record, was never called upon, so well did the public respond. Since that time the audiences have been steadily growing in numbers and appreciation, until Baltimore has come to be regarded by the orchestra and its genial manager, Mr. Comee, as one of their best stands.

Tomorrow evening marks the one hundredth concert here. The symphony chosen for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic," of which the great composer naively said, "Now I have composed a new symphony which I shall certainly not tear up."

The real romance of Tschaikowsky's life is woven about the glorious music of his Fourth Symphony, which the Philadelphia Orchestra played so well at its first concert this season. The score bears the simple dedication, "A mon meilleur ami." And this "best friend" was a wealthy Moscow widow, some nine years older than Tschaikowsky and rejoicing in the formidable name of Nadeshda Filaretowna von Meck. She also had 11 children, but was evidently not so completely absorbed by these family cares of no mean proportion as to be unable to indulge her admiration for Tschaikowsky's genius. She has been described as a "proud and energetic woman, of strong convictions, with the mental balance and business capacity of a man; absolutely free from sentimentality in her relations with others, yet capable of deep feeling and of being completely carried away by what was lofty and beautiful."

Mme. von Meck, hearing of the financial straits in which Tschaikowsky, after the manner of geniuses, was immersed, insisted upon making him an annual allowance of $3,000, so that he might compose in peace. How much the world owes her for that generous deed! In conferring this gift she exacted of him a promise that he would never seek a personal acquaintance. "The more you fascinate me," she wrote, "the more I shrink from knowing you." And he gallantly replied, "Nadeshda Filaretowna, every note which comes from my pen in future is dedicated to you."

For 13 years this curious romance flourished through correspondence, but they never met, except once by accident, and then they passed as strangers. Finally Mme. von Meck fell ill and unceremoniously cut off both the allowance and the correspondence.

Tschaikowsky's own description of the symphony he had dedicated to her tells us that the music was meant to portray Fate, that "fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness from gaining the goal." The finale contains a word of encouragement, however, and is intended to be a picture of a "folk holiday." In the words of the composer, "If you find no pleasure in yourself, look about you. Go to the folk. They neither see nor feel that you are lonely and sad. How they enjoy themselves! And will you maintain that everything in the world is sad and gloomy? Rejoice in the happiness of others—and you can still live."

The great composer was inconsolable over the change of heart of his benefactress, and when he died, two years later, her name was constantly upon his lips in his last delirium. She survived him by only two months. Thus ended a singular romance.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
ss

Gabrilowitsch, who will play the Rachmaninoff concerto to-night with the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the assisting artist at the next Kneisel concert, to be given December 15. With Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Willeke the Russian pianist will give the trio in B flat major by Schubert. Mr. Kneisel and his associates will play Schumann's quartet in A major and Grieg's unfinished quartet in F major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
s
DEC 2-1908

The British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce occupied a box at the National Theater yesterday for the Boston Symphony concert, entertaining Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and Miss Perkins. Mrs. Charles A. Williams had with her in her box Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Miss Gwynn, and Miss Williams. Mrs. Leiter had in her box Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador; Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. George Cabot Lodge, Mrs. J. R. Williams, and Miss Clapperton.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Jeffrey Parsons were in another box, and had, among their guests, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Scott Smith and Mr. Herbert Putnam.

In the audience were Mrs. James Garfield, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Huntington Wilson, Mrs. Robert Mason, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Julian James; Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover; Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Andenried; Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard; Mrs. Robert Hinkley, Mrs. Ferney, of Philadelphia; Mr. and Mrs. William Eno. Mr. Reginald Huidekoper, Mme. de Blanpre, Baroness Preusschen von und zu Liebenstein, Viscount de Sainte Phalc, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. Alfred Dietrick, Mrs. Violet Blair Janin; Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, the consul general to London, Mr. Robert J. Wynne, and Miss Ida Wynne; the Swedish minister and Mme. de Lagercrantz, and the Misses de Lagercrantz, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Thomas Gaff, Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Harlan, the Misses Harlan, Mrs. John E. Wilkie, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Henry Butler, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt, Mrs. Philip Hichborn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Mrs. John Rodgers, and Mrs. James Lowndes.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date

Emil Sauer, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday afternoon, will play the Schumann piano concerto. This pianist's farewell recital will be given Wednesday at Mendelssohn hall. Sauer has prepared a very remarkable programme, including five Scarlatti sonatas, the Liszt sonata, a group of three Chopin numbers, three of his own compositions and the concert paraphrase of motifs from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin," by Pabst. Sauer will withdraw entirely from the concert stage and live quietly in his Dresden home.

The
Brooklyn Citizen

TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES

THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS

BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.

YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR,
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15. The principal number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony with which Mr. Fiedler won so notable a success in Boston last week. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Liszt's second concerto, in A Major.

om JOURNAL OF COMMERCE,
ldress New York City.
te

The Hess-Schroeder Quartette, it is announced, will give three concerts on January 14, February 10 and March 3 at Mendelssohn Hall. The quartette is under the leadership of Professor Willy Hess, at present concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who received his honorary title from the German Emperor. He is as well known in Europe as in this country. He has been engaged in quartette work for a great part of his career. The first violin will be in his hands. The other members of the quartette are J. von Theodorowicz, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncello. There will be produced at least four works never before heard here; Paul Juon's "Trio Caprice," Hugo Kaun's "Quartette in C Minor," Max Reger's Trio and Leone Sinigalia's "Serenade in D." The concerts are under the management of Henry

[105]

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra At The Lyric Last Evening.

An immense audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric yesterday evening when this famous organization gave its one hundredth performance in Baltimore. The following program was presented:

"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country") ..... Smetana

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74 ..... Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

Prayer from "Tosca" ..... Puccini

Three Dance Pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet. (First time in Baltimore) ..... Gretry
I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.
(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Mott.)
Felix Mottl.)

Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi

(a) A Song of "Spring," for Orchestra, Op. 16 (First time in Baltimore) ..... Sibelius

(b) "Finland": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7. (First time in Baltimore) ..... Sibelius

Soloist ..... Mme. Eames

Mr. Fiedler deserves our gratitude for the interesting novelties introduced at this concert. The "Three Dances," by Gretry, are graceful compositions, their arrangement for concert use by Mottl is musicianly, unpretentious, but extremely effective, and their rendering left nothing to be desired. The Menuet, in particular is full of delicate charm and displayed to perfection the exquisite finish of the wood-wind instruments. The two pieces by Jean Sibelius, however, are of much greater merit. The lyrical mood of the first is admirably sustained, the passionate patriotism of the second highly stirring. Sibelius is a composer of power and originality. His ideas are pregnant, his form coherent and his treatment of the orchestra sonorous and imaginative. Finland is justly proud of him and his fame is rapidly spreading.

Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau," is little known in this country. It begins most promisingly, but the working out is patchy and the climax weak, almost trivial.

It is unfortunately impossible to praise last night's performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony." In the first movement several of the wind instruments were noticeably out of tune. So astonishing an occurrence can only be explained by the recent violent changes of temperature. Doubtless the mishap had a disconcerting influence on conductor and players alike. Be this as it may, the symphony fell far short of its usual effect, many details of the score being lost or obscured. The second movement was taken at a tempo considerably slower than that prescribed by the composer and it suffered from the change.

Madame Emma Eames was the soloist of the occasion. Though her voice was not at its best, she sang the prayer from "La Tosca" beautifully. The Verdi Bolero aroused much enthusiasm among the public, but was less satisfactory to the musician. It is a composition of small artistic value.

E. Hutcheson

SUN,
New York City.
DEC 4 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Rachmaninow's Second Piano Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night gave Conductor Max Fiedler an opportunity to turn loose the full power of his instrmental forces in the tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss. As every one now knows, this work presents an epitome in music of the career of the composer as viewed by himself. He has ideals, he has critics, he has a love, he has a battle against all opposing forces, his victory is crowned by the love, and then he settles down in peace to write his great compositions, of which various themes are quoted so that we may know just what is going on.

Besides this imposing autobiography Mr. Fiedler conducted Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Sibelius's "Varsang" and "Finlandia." Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist and his number was the second piano concerto of Rachmaninow. We have heard a great deal of this concerto of late and most music lovers are at a loss to know why. It cannot of course be that when one pianist has failed to achieve a success with it another determines to show that he can succeed.

Pianists never indulge in petty rivalries. They are great artists. Nevertheless it is a pity that Mr. Gabrilowitsch, a pianist of singularly charming style, should waste his art on this dull and unfruitful composition. If he cannot find new pieces for his répertoire that are better than this, why does he not write one himself? Other pianists have tried it.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
New York City.
ss

With the Boston Symphony.

THERE was a wide variety in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. From Beethoven's Egmont overture to Strauss' "A Hero's Life," then to a Rachmaninow concerto, concluding with two delightful tone poems by Sibelius, there was a wealth of offerings, indeed.

It was in the Strauss symphonic poem, with its intensely modern depiction of a soldier's struggles, victories and love that the full resources of the great orchestra were revealed. While Mr. Fielder's reading of the work was more restrained than some readings previously heard in this city, his grasp of the work was masterly and inspiring, never for a moment becoming incoherent even in the wildest episodes of Strauss' fighting hero's experiences.

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist in the concerto, roused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. After the obvious strains of the Rochmaninow composition, the tone poems by Sibelius "Spring" and "Finland," came with a wholesome effect that was refreshing.

News Dec 3

HUNDREDTH CONCERT HERE

Mr. Turnbull Discusses Boston Symphony's Artistic Excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which returns to Baltimore on Wednesday evening, with the added attractions of Mme. Eames and "dim lights," has now begun the twenty-eighth season since its founding by generous Mr. Higginson, who must enjoy the satisfaction of knowing that he has done more for the cause of orchestral music than any man in the world. For has he not established the finest orchestra the world has known?

I hear that Dr. Muck told a friend last summer, who inquired how he liked returning to German orchestras, that the Boston orchestra had "spoiled him for everything else." For 24 seasons now this incomparable body of musicians has honored Baltimore with its visits, playing in divers places—the Lyceum Theatre, the old Concordia Opera House, the Academy of Music and finally the present Music Hall, which was opened with a brilliant concert by the orchestra. Once, when we were threatened with a possible loss of the concerts because of inadequate support, public-spirited citizens tided over the crisis in our musical history with a guarantee fund, which, it is pleasant to record, was never called upon, so well did the public respond. Since that time the audiences have been steadily growing in numbers and appreciation, until Baltimore has come to be regarded by the orchestra and its genial manager, Mr. Comee, as one of their best stands.

Tomorrow evening marks the one hundredth concert here. The symphony chosen for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic," of which the great composer naively said, "Now I have composed a new symphony which I shall certainly not tear up."

The real romance of Tschaikowsky's life is woven about the glorious music of his Fourth Symphony, which the Philadelphia Orchestra played so well at its first concert this season. The score bears the simple dedication, "A mon meilleur ami." And this "best friend" was a wealthy Moscow widow, some nine years older than Tschaikowsky and rejoicing in the formidable name of Nadeshda Filaretowna von Meck. She also had 11 children, but was evidently not so completely absorbed by these family cares of no mean proportion as to be unable to indulge her admiration for Tschaikowsky's genius. She has been described as a "proud and energetic woman, of strong convictions, with the mental balance and business capacity of a man; absolutely free from sentimentality in her relations with others, yet capable of deep feeling and of being completely carried away by what was lofty and beautiful."

Mme. von Meck, hearing of the financial straits in which Tschaikowsky, after the manner of geniuses, was immersed, insisted upon making him an annual allowance of $3,000, so that he might compose in peace. How much the world owes her for that generous deed! In conferring this gift she exacted of him a promise that he would never seek a personal acquaintance. "The more you fascinate me," she wrote, "the more I shrink from knowing you." And he gallantly replied, "Nadeshda Filaretowna, every note which comes from my pen in future is dedicated to you."

For 13 years this curious romance flourished through correspondence, but they never met, except once by accident, and then they passed as strangers. Finally Mme. von Meck fell ill and unceremoniously cut off both the allowance and the correspondence.

Tschaikowsky's own description of the symphony he had dedicated to her tells us that the music was meant to portray Fate, that "fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness from gaining the goal." The finale contains a word of encouragement, however, and is intended to be a picture of a "folk holiday." In the words of the composer, "If you find no pleasure in yourself, look about you. Go to the folk. They neither see nor feel that you are lonely and sad. How they enjoy themselves! And will you maintain that everything in the world is sad and gloomy? Rejoice in the happiness of others—and you can still live."

The great composer was inconsolable over the change of heart of his benefactress, and when he died, two years later, her name was constantly upon his lips in his last delirium. She survived him by only two months. Thus ended a singular romance.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

DECEMBER 3, 1908.

MUSIC'S SPELL AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony's 100th Performance A Triumph.

"LOW-LIGHT" PLAN IS TRIED

Large And Fashionable Audience Greets Mme. Eames And Director Fiedler.

Symphony orchestras have come to Baltimore and symphony orchestras have gone, but if received elsewhere as it was at its one hundredth performance in this city, last night at the Lyric, the Boston Orchestra seemingly bids well to go on forever.

Not since it appeared at the dedicatory performance at the Lyric—then the Music Hall—in 1894, has the orchestra played to such an appreciative house of the best music-lovers of Baltimore. Twenty-eight seasons ago the orchestra first appeared, and 24 years ago made its initial appearance in Baltimore, at the Academy of Music. When it first played at the Lyric there were 85 players; last night there were 97.

Long before the conductor, Max Fiedler, stepped to his stand and made the first motion with his baton Baltimore society and Baltimore music-lovers were passing into the foyer in a throng, which increased and increased until it was a veritable crush. The 2,400 persons filling nearly every seat and standing in the galleries had little time to watch the nervous, intermittent movements of the players as they sounded fleeting preliminary tuning-up notes and bars on violin, 'cello, bassoon, oboes and brass. The appearance of Max Fiedler hushed all, and the late comers were forced to wait without until the applause after the first number was hushed.

Naturally, the features of primary interest were the director and "the" Eames; but Mr. Fiedler modestly forced appreciation of his assistants when, after the first outburst, he called upon them also to rise to accept their proper share of the honors. Mme. Eames, the much-lauded artiste, also declined to accept all the approbation meted out to her, and upon each of her recalls bowed her homage to the director and the orchestra.

The performance also was a triumph, in part, for what have come to be known as the "low-lighters," since their appeal for subdued illumination was granted to the extent of 600 incandescents, which were snapped out with the first bars of "The Moldau," leaving lighted only 10 incandescents under the floor of the balcony, 2 globe lights at the rear and the wall clusters in the balcony, in addition to the 4 yellow-shaded chandeliers and 2 similarly shaded brackets over the stage.

Those who had asked this innovation expressed themselves as much pleased, and the orchestra's manager, Mr. F. R. Comee, said he was willing to continue to bow to the desire of the petitioners, among whom was Cardinal Gibbons, unless the "high-lighters" present a request with more numerous signers. Mr. Fiedler was willing to accept the change, provided there was plenty of light for his players. The orchestra lights were bright, and one or two eye shades were used by front-seat holders, but the general effect was pleasing to the majority.

Mr. Comee, in the intermission, expressed himself as delighted with the audience and its approbation.

FIEDLER A GREAT CONDUCTOR

Mme. Eames Sings Prayer From "Tosca" Effectively.

The second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Max Fiedler, with Madame Eames as soloist, was marked by the following program:

Smetana—"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").

The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vyschrad motive.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74.

I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Puccini—Prayer from "Tosca."

Gretry—Three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," heroic ballet. First time in Baltimore.

I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.

(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Motti.

Verdi—Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers."

Sibelius—

(a) A Song of "Spring" for Orchestra, Op. 16. First time in Baltimore.

(b) "Finland": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7. First time in Baltimore.

Public interest, which has always been deeply in sympathy with the Boston orchestra, has now become more intensely aroused, partly by the beauty of the program offered and partly by the advent of a director who is sincerely in earnest, who is musicianly and sympathetic with his audience, who is a master in the art of conducting and who knows well how to prepare a program that contains works of art which appeal to a music-loving public.

The first of this year's concerts was well attended, it is true, but upon that occasion many were attracted by curiosity to know what manner of man Mr. Fiedler was, and with what success he would occupy the place left vacant by his eminent predecessor. To paraphrase a classic saying, "He came, he conducted, he conquered."

Last night's work proved many things which were in doubt after the first hearing: That Mr. Fiedler has the capacity for controlling an orchestra, for never has the finesse of orchestral playing been more strongly in evidence; that he has a wonderful conception of the works given, and knows how to make his men respond to his every thought, for were not the smaller fragments of the thematic construction—the substrata, as it were—of the compositions brought to light and emphasized in a striking manner, thus placing before his hearers little points that none but those who had previously studied the works would know existed? He laid bare the composers' very souls, and by means of the dynamic effects and those beautiful nuances that are too often overlooked opened up the pictures conceived in the composers' minds and presented them in their true colors.

What could be more characteristic or beautiful than Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," with its slight tinge of national coloring, and how thoroughly Mr. Fiedler appreciated the composer's peculiar vein, the enthusiasm of the audience attested.

The Tschaikowsky symphony was a marvel of beauty under Mr. Fiedler's baton, the members of the orchestra themselves playing as if impressed with the interpretation. Tschaikowsky sometimes stoops to melodic cheapness—becomes, in fact, almost commonplace, although never for long. But in this symphony—perhaps his greatest work, and certainly his noblest symphony—never for one moment does he descend from the high ideals that actuated him throughout the composition.

Rarely, if ever, have Baltimoreans heard a more perfect performance of the work than that of yesterday, from the first movement, passing through the "Allegro con grazia"—the best example of five-four time known—the "allegro motto vivace," to the last strange and impressive finale. Every word was understood and interpreted—the forceful, the graceful, the light, airy and almost playful, and finally the somber—each and all the varying shades of color were depicted, and Tschaikowsky, at the supremest height of his art, stood brilliantly revealed. Truly Mr. Feidler and his orchestra are an inspiration to each other.

Mme. Eames, the well-known singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist of the evening, and following the traditions of an opera singer, and also taking advantage of such fine orchestral support, the artist gave two operatic selections—"The Prayer," from Puccini's "Tosca," and "Bolero," from Verdi's little-known and still more rarely heard opera, "Sicilian Vespers."

Operatic arias when given on the concert stage, shorn as they are of all scenic surroundings, necessarily lose much of their value and attractiveness. While this applies in a general way to all works of a like character, it would seem to be more particularly the case with Puccini's music, doubtless because of the somewhat loose construction of his writing. Puccini is essentially an operatic composer and oftimes expresses as much in a few chords as a symphonic writer can in a lengthy and extended passage, and for the simple reason that he relies largely upon stage effects and scenic background for support. Bereft of these aids, the concert singer is entirely dependent upon his or her individual effort to create the atmosphere necessary to a true and correct interpretation of the operatic aria.

Now, Mme. Eames has achieved one of her greatest successes in this very opera, "Tosca," and consequently requires no extraneous assistance to enable her to give a perfectly artistic presentation of her selection. Her natural refinement, together with her wealth of vocal requirements, suffice to make her work attractive. To begin with, she possesses a voice which, if a trifle cold at times, is so pure in its quality and intonation that one cannot fail to admire. Last evening her singing of the "Tosca" number betrayed no coldness whatever, but was rather marked by an absolute conception of the prayer and of its place in the opera; in other words, the true artist was present. But the aria was all too brief.

In the dashing "Bolero" her style was changed and her flexibility of voice became prominent. There was such a spirit and dash about her singing that had the rule against encores not been strictly upheld she would have been compelled to yield to the unanimous demand of a delighted public.

Mme. Eames in all her varying moods is always the graceful and gracious artist.

W. G. O.

GRAND OPERA STAR WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MME. EMMA EAMES

nowhere is it more cordially welcomed or supported than here. In musical matters, as in others, the city is steadily going forward, and really good things do not appeal to the community in vain. The Boston Orchestra is regarded by many as the best in the world, and we know its merits. Of all the social pleasures of the winter there is none more thoroughly enjoyed than the symphony concerts—now an established institution.

News Editorial

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 4 1908

The Boston Symphony seems to be a personally conducted orchestra; at least, Max Fiedler seems to be always in keen touch with each man, and to weld all easily into a symphonic whole. Last night, at its second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, simple melody and stirring climax were executed with supert effect. Great training it took to produce effectively the bombardments and harmonic discords of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Heldenleben."

This composition, second in the bill, cost poor "Carmen" her critics during her best act downtown. There had been first an all-too-short excerpt from Beethoven, his overture to Goethe's "Egmont." The Strauss tone poem of all Strauss poems is this "Hero's Life." How it starts with piping birds, green meadows, and lives through romance, battle, the rhythmic march of Empires to the fight, the lesser turmoils of a lifetime and at last the returning softness of age, both Straussite and anti-Straussite know. Here was the modern, hypnotic power shown, a glance yet into the musical future.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, after a year away, was the soloist in the fine, fervent Rachmaninow concerto No. 2 in C minor, that his countrywoman, Tina Lerner, recently played, and Pugno before them both. There was great applause after the third movement, but no winning an encore.

Sibelius's "Song of Spring," op. 16, was heard for the first time here, a brilliant if simple melody, a folklore tale of the peasantry. A second, his familiar "Finland," closed the programme before 10:30 o'clock.

To-night in Brooklyn with Gabrilowitsch, and to-morrow with Sauer at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Fiedler turns his own attention to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

The Boston band prospers under Fiedler. On its entire previous trip, its audiences were within $50 of the corresponding trip with an established favorite last year.

The Strauss-fest was significant, looking backward eight years to that first huge "Heldenleben" under Paur. His Philharmonic men played the "Zarathustra" under Safonoff the other day.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S 100TH PERFORMANCE

The one hundredth performance in Baltimore of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight, which is in a way specially recognized by the appearance of Madame Eames, is an interesting event in the musical history of the city. It recalls the discouraging time when the orchestra appeared to very small audiences, indeed—first at the Academy of Music and later at the old Concordia Opera House, afterwards burned. Symphony music was not then understood or appreciated as much as it is at present, although later we had two symphony organizations of our own. Nevertheless, the mass of the public did not care for this stately form of composition, and there was but a small circle that could discern and enjoy its splendors.

Since that time there has been a change, and no other organization, musical or dramatic, that visits Baltimore is so generously and enthusiastically patronized as the famous one from Boston. There is annually an abundant subscription before the season opens and the hall is invariably crowded with a gathering that represents the culture and fashion of the city. The Boston Symphony visits many places during the winter, but

THE DA

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" Played —Ossip Gabrilowitsch as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Fiedler's conducting was in many ways more enjoyable than that in the first concert he gave; it was more restful to the eye, and he showed a firm and in some ways most remarkable grasp on the essentials in difficult tasks. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," with which the programme began, was played with nobility and tragic power. His most remarkable achievement was the performance of Strauss's huge tone poem, "A Hero's Life."

It is difficult to recall a performance of this work, which has repeatedly been played here, so enormously complicated in detail and so vast in its general scheme, that presented it in so clear a light, that made everything in it so plain, keeping the tangled skein of its polyphony so perspicuous, and so ameliorating the crass harshness of many of its reckless dissonances. For once, the mockery of the "critics'" section seemed to have some well-ordered plan, and the "battle" section was made to sound like something more than a mere piling up of ear-splitting noise. It was shown that the effect is attained by thematic means; and there was some opportunity for the listening ear to discern and disentangle the themes.

The finer and more beautiful passages were played with ardor and with an evident conviction of their beauty. Such a performance presents Strauss's work in its true light. Yet with all that was done for it, there was little essentially to be changed in the riper judgment of it. There are many beautiful things in the composition. An enormous skill, an enormous talent have gone to the making of it. But it is skill and talent misapplied. The more Strauss's conception of programme music is made familiar, the more futile and impossible it seems. What, to take the more obvious things, is more childish than the attempt to illustrate "feminine caprice" by the freakish ecentricities of the solo violin solo in the midst of its melodies.

Do the rumbling fifths in the tubas show the earthly sluggish nature of inappreciative critics? Do the "diminutions" of the heroic themes give a clear idea of how these critics belittle the hero's greatness? These and other fantasies of the same kind may be heard, and they may be explained to the listened, but they make no impression on him even when he is told, because it is not in the nature of music to do what Strauss thinks he is doing with it. The really fine passages of the work, the broad and eloquent sections, are marred and ruined by these disfigurements. As Ernest Newman puts it, it is as if the composer now and again stuck his own face through the canvas he is painting and leered and grimaced at the spectators.

If "Ein Heldenleben" cannot secure any but a much qualified assent from a musical audience, it is not because it is not understood. Particularly in so lucid a performance as Mr. Fiedler gave, it is only too well understood, and admiration for its strong features is in large measure invalidated by its crying improprieties and stupidities.

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch reappeared for the first time in New York at this concert, after his absence, and was gladly welcomed. He is an artist, who has steadily grown greater since his first coming to this city some years ago, and his art is now bearing its full fruition. He played Rachmaninoff's second concerto; but it was rather a heavy tribute for him to pay to his Russian compatriot, and to the desire to lengthen the short list of concertos that present-day virtuosos find available. Even so artistic a performance as he gave of it, one full of power, of delicacy, of all imaginable contrast, one so admirably seconded by the orchestra, could not make the composition interesting.

The programme was brought to an end with two pieces by Sibelius a short "Song of Spring" that was heard for the first time in New York, and the "Finlandia," tone poem, known from previous performances here.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN.

Strauss's Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben," Artistically Rendered.

Only the presence of the Egmont overture on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night prevented the second concert of that organization from being entirely modern in its composition.

The big feature was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenl ben" ("A Hero Life"), of which Mr. Fiedler and his men gave an exposition that held the keenest interest of a large audience and aroused its eager enthusiasm. Mr. Fiedler brought out the contrasts of the score most effectively, and in the fortissimo passages the band responded with a splendid precision and sonority of tone. The Beethoven overture was also played in fine balance and beautiful utterance.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the solo performer, played with his usual technical skill and facility.

[106]

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

DEC 4 - 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY REVIVES STRAUSS

To a house that packed Carnegie Hall—and that means about 3,000 persons—the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night the second concert for this season. Despite the fact that the children of Father Knickerbocker are among the most devout admirers of the imported musical talent of the capital of the Massachusetts Commonwealth, the Symphony managers have been most niggardly in their "productions" in New York. Other cities have heard the latest works of this and that master for the first time, while New York has listened—with pleasure—to old friends.

Last night, however, the programme not only revived Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben" (a Hero Life), which has not been heard here for several years, but gave, for the first time, Sibelius s "Varsang" (Spring Song).

The solo feature of the evening was Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the piano. In the great quartette of Russian pianists, the other three being Rosenthal, Paderewski and Lhevinne, it is rather difficult to place Maestro Ossip. In previous concerts when he has played here his musicianship and technique have been acknowledged, but he was found rather given to over-accentuation—the mechanism of his playing was too apparent. Last night, however, in his share of Rachmaninoff's exacting, but entrancing, Concerto No. 2, in C minor, he showed that while he preserves the firmness of his outlines he is doing better work in the filling in of the pictures.

The Strauss number was used in Boston as the test of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor in handling the modern German descrptive cult. In its presentation here last night he and his orchestra proved they had, at any rate, mastered the tremendous intricacies of "Ein Heldenleben." It is a massive example of the ability of the Viennese in discovering strange concords of sounds, and any orchestra that can play it with precision should be complimented thereon. The audience gave it reverent and expectant attention.

To-morrow afternoon Conductor Fiedler will carry the musical war into the Safonoff camp by making Tschaikowsky's pathetic symphony the feature of his programme.

From ...YORK PRESS,

Address ... New York City.

Date DEC 4 1908

Fiedler Revives Heldenleben.

By his performance of Strauss's "Heldenleben" last night in Carnegie Hall Max Fiedler rose several inches in estimation. Of course, he had the Boston Symphony Orchestra at his command, and that means a great deal. But the way he guided his musicians through the labyrinths of Strauss's masterful score showed not only deep sympathy with and understanding of the music, but a virtuoso's grasp of its intricacies. Fiedler and his men laid bare the innermost riddles of this composition with the utmost ease. To the ear was presented as finely etched a succession of tone combinations as the pages of the score presented to the trained eye. It was a wonderfully lucid reading and never ran into mere noise.

Not even in the battle scene was there any nerve-entangling din. Only it must be said that Fiedler at times sacrificed spirit for clarity; for instance, in that beautiful portion of the score in B major, marked No. 8 in the score, which the conductor came far from interpreting "with great energy and enthusiasm," as the composer dictates. Fiedler took some of his tempos, as toward the close of the work, at a remarkably slow pace. But what a wonderful creator of genius is this "Heldenleben"! It is the master work of Strauss. All honor to Fiedler for bringing it once more into public notice, and so eloquently.

The soloist of the concert was Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who appeared for the first time this season and played Rachmaninoff's fine concerto in C minor, opus 18. Gabrilowitsch has grown in artistic stature with every return to New York, and last night again he proved that he belongs to those who never stand still. Technically crisp and brilliant, his performance of the concerto was also pregnant with emotional vitality. Gabrilowitsch seldom has played here with so much temperamental spirit and passion as he did last night. But there was no loss of refinement in phrasing. Evidently he was in an inspired mood. The audience was quick to appreciate that, and recalled Gabrilowitsch many times, though there was no chance of encore.

The programme, which opened with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, closed with two pieces of Sibelius, "A Song of Spring," opus 16, and "Finland," opus 26, No. 7. The first of these was presented for the first time in New York.

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

From TRIBUNE

Address ... New York City.

Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra listened last evening at Carnegie Hall to Beethoven's "Egmont" overture; Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben"; the second of Rachmaninow's pianoforte concertos, played by Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and two pieces by Sibelius, one of them a novelty, "A Song of Spring," and the other his familiar "Finlandia." Mr. Max Fiedler was the conductor, and the audience dealt cordially with him, especially when, after the Strauss performance, he bade the orchestral players rise to share honors with him. This was, indeed, a tribute from the conductor to his associates that was well deserved, for there was at least as much to praise in the orchestra's clean-cut and brilliant instrumental work as in the interpretation of the music as a whole by the leader. There doubtless seemed to many hearers something prodigious about "Ein Heldenleben" when it was first presented in this city some eight years ago by Mr. Paur and the Philharmonic Society. Their thunderous proclamation of the hero's theme and the huge din of the combat between Strauss's imaginary personage and his enemies helped to convey an impression of fabulous and overwhelming power, which subsequent performances have not been able to confirm. The energy that Mr. Fiedler and the Boston men infused into their presentation of this score last evening was carefully regulated, and the instrumental voices were deftly balanced, but this nicety of treatment served rather to reveal the frequent banalities of the music and its lack of convincing emotional force than to glorify what Strauss's admirers regard as perhaps his strongest work. The spirit of shrewd and witty caricature in the section depicting the hero's enemies was capitally brought out.

Touching the Rachmaninow pianoforte concerto, there need be little added to what was said here after its two previous New York performances, by Mr. Pugno and Miss Tina Lerner, respectively, with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. The concerto has not much to say that is of serious import, despite the melodic sincerity of its third movement, an allegro scherzando. Mr. Gabrilowitsch played with skilful hands and a willing spirit, but he could do little to make it interesting. The Sibelius "Song of Spring" proved to be in the mood of his other early music, and its lyric beauty is not to be gainsaid, but it does not sound the note of high significance.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN ENJOYABLE CONCERT

Mr. Max Fiedler Leads and Obtains Fine Results with His Well Known Body of Musicians.

In a programme of unusual length presented at last night's Boston Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall Mr. Max Fiedler gave a somewhat fuller display of his powers with the baton than he has hitherto afforded local concertgoers. He also strikingly exploited the virtuosity of his men, who were brought to their feet more than once by the audience to share the honors with the conductor. A pleasant feature of the evening was the local re-entry of Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch as the soloist of the occasion.

The programme, while maintaining a romantic mood, was one of sharp contrasts. Opening in classic dignity with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the list introduced successively the gaudily descriptive "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss, the polite commonplaces of Rachmaninow's second pianoforte concerto, and finally the bracing atmosphere of a pair of Sibelius tone poems, "Spring" and "Finland."

In his interpretations Mr. Fiedler met the diverse demands of this programme admirably. His Beethoven playing, beginning with almost labored deliberation, ended in a fine blaze of orchestral glory, the Sibelius music was given with both grace and vigor and the concertos accompaniment he handled with sufficient suavity. It was, however, in the Strauss tone poem that the evening's climax was reached. What Mr. Fiedler accomplished was to give this extraordinary score one of the most lucid interpretations it has had here. He made even the thick of the battle scene intelligible, the instruments vying with each other in accomplishing the impossible.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch's playing in the concerto was worthy of a better vehicle, yet he could not disguise the dryness of the composition with either taste or technique. He delighted the judicious by treating the work as an enlarged piece of chamber music, never obtruding the piano's part. The audience repeatedly recalled him with applause.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

Monmouth

1908

MACDOWELL'S LAMIA

"Lamia," a symphonic poem, based upon Keats' tragic poem of that name, by the late and much regretted, Edward MacDowell, was rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, New York, November 7. This work is one of the early compositions by MacDowell and is pronounced by an eminent musical critic to display "fancy and color," and to give evidence of having been "written with the enthusiasm of youth." The composer had often expressed his unwillingness to have it played or permit its publication until after he had revised it. Death intervened and the revision was never undertaken. In consequence, there are those of his friends who regard its recent publication and performance as ill-advised and fraught with the possibility of doing injury to the late composer's reputation. I doubt this, for the reason that they who love the works of a master are more than desirous of the opportunity to become acquainted with him in every phase of his career and to note his development as the years rolled by. It was notably so in the case of Mendelssohn and other masters. One has yet to learn that the juvenilities characteristic of many of their earlier works (which we all love), detracted in any way from the fame accruing to them as the result of those composed in maturity. It is as unreasonable, to assume such derogation, as it would be say the memory of the sturdy sapling detracted from the flavor and value of the apple that, as a well grown tree, it now bears.

The reasons why "Lamia" was so long deferred in presentation have been written by Mrs. MacDowell, the composer's widow, and published in the programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are interesting, and, for that reason, here reproduced:

"It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary, nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

When we came to America, he ran up against the fact that it would be impossible for him to get any orchestra to try over a composition for him in a rehearsal unless it were going to be played in a concert. He never wanted to publish a work unheard, and in Germany it had been a simple and easy thing to accomplish. I can see, as if it were yesterday, the kindly faces of the members of different orchestras in Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Frankfort, so willing to help out the young American by trying over his compositions. As I think of it now, it seems quite wonderful, the ease with which all this came. For instance, the 'Hamlet and Ophelia,' I think, was tried over at least once. The only grumble I ever heard was over the voice parts. I copied most of them, and the early ones must have been awful! I can hear an old musician say under his breath, 'Schrecklich copiert,' until he saw my look of distress and guessed the truth! Then he gave me a kindly nod, as much as to say, 'You will improve.'

When the money was there for the necessary expense, or when he might have been able to have it printed for nothing, it was too late. Edward felt then that the 'Lamia' belonged to a period quite different from the work he was doing, and he was most critical about work he had finished. I think I do not exaggerate when I say, I doubt whether he would have published any of his compositions if they had been laid aside for even three or four years. He was merciless in his judgment of himself. But as it chanced, he never had any trouble in finding a publisher for all he wrote, though with the orchestral things, as I said before, he helped pay for all the early compositions.

As the years rolled on, newer music pushed 'Lamia' aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, 'When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change.' This he said of his printed works as well."

* * * *

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Keystone

...s

MASSACHUSETTS.---Boston.—Of course everyone who attended the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new director was in critical mood, and this is a fair resume of the general impression. Max Fiedler is demonstrative, and perhaps he felt he must be so in order to impress a strange audience. It will be well for him to understand that the most intelligent American audiences are not impressed chiefly by the gestures of a conductor, and that it is a mistake to give way to the exaggeration of superfluous action. He conducted without notes, and gave the impression of being a man of thorough knowledge of his craft and with more temperamental enthusiasm than any conductor the orchestra has had since Emil Paur. The splendid qualities of the orchestra were most agreeably set forth, yet not in any way to give a new light upon the subject. Herr Fiedler is a nervy man. He flatly declined to begin his concert the other day until every woman in the audience had removed every trace of hat, bonnet, toque, pill-box or Merry Widow that she had about her person. It took half an hour, we read, for him to carry his point, and small wonder. No lady spends $80 of her husband's money for something to hold on her knee, where nobody can see it. Too, the removal of a hat unassisted by a mirror is generally believed by the fair sex to have a depressing effect upon coiffures. Mr. Fiedler's announcement was peculiarly original in that it assumed that women go to concerts to see the vrtuosos, not each other. The question of hearing the music seems to bea secondary consideration. It is evident that a lady can drink in an oratorio entirely independent of the millinery in front of her. That is, theoretically. Practically, world-wisdom suggests that the spectacle of superior plumes, ribbons, aigrettes or what not might have a spiritual effect so disturbing that the art of a Paderewski or Caruso itself could not soothe it. This, perhaps, is the true inwards of Mr. Fiedler's seemingly obtuse confusion of auriculars and visualizers. Or, again, the seating capacities of the Boston hall may be so unmodern as not to permit of two women, hatted in the mode, to sit abreast without provoking animosities, recrimination and civil war. But whatever Mr. Fiedler's motives, or whether he had any motives, the male patrons of his concerts will doubtless rise to call him blessed. Man tolwing, only because his women cry for it and will accept no substitute. His inner nature revolts from it. He scarcely places the hoop-skirt beyond it in absurdity, and to such a comparison no word can be added. It is reported Mr. Ysaye, the violinist, has been doing unusual things in his recent concerts in London. In one of them, for

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S 100TH PERFORMANCE

The one hundredth performance in Baltimore of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight, which is in a way specially recognized by the appearance of Madame Eames, is an interesting event in the musical history of the city. It recalls the discouraging time when the orchestra appeared to very small audiences, indeed—first at the Academy of Music and later at the old Concordia Opera House, afterwards burned. Symphony music was not then understood or appreciated as much as it is at present, although later we had two symphony organizations of our own. Nevertheless, the mass of the public did not care for this stately form of composition, and there was but a small circle that could discern and enjoy its splendors.

Since that time there has been a change, and no other organization, musical or dramatic, that visits Baltimore is so generously and enthusiastically patronized as the famous one from Boston. There is annually an abundant subscription before the season opens and the hall is invariably crowded with a gathering that represents the culture and fashion of the city. The Boston Symphony visits many places during the winter, but, nowhere is it more cordially welcomed or supported than here. In musical matters, as in others, the city is steadily going forward, and really good things do not appeal to the community in vain. The Boston Orchestra is regarded by many as the best in the world, and we know its merits. Of all the social pleasures of the winter there is none more thoroughly enjoyed than the symphony concerts—now an established institution.

[167]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 8- 1906

To Sing At The Lyric Tonight

MME. EMMA EAMES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its one hundredth concert in Baltimore tonight at the Lyric, and it will be noteworthy from the presence of Madame Emma Eames as the soloist. The organization first appeared here more than 20 years ago at the Academy of Music, and afterward at the old Concordia Opera House, later destroyed by fire. Public support was then not very generous, but of late years it has been all that could be desired. In fact, the Lyric is now always crowded at the concerts, and they are among the most fashionable events of the winter.

The two numbers by Madame Eames will be the fascinating "Bolero," from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the "Prayer" from Puccini's "Tosca," an opera that she has made her own.

The entire program is as follows:

Symphonic poem, "The Moldau" (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").....Smetana
Symphony No. 6, in B minor (pathetic).....Tschaikowsky
"Bolero" ("Sicilian Vespers")..Verdi
Madame Eames.
Three Dances from Heroic Ballet "Cephalus and Procris" (freely arranged by Felix Motti)....Gretry
"Prayer" ("Tosca").....Puccini
Madame Eames.
Prelude and Love's Death ("Tristan and Isolde").....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 9- 1906

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra At The Lyric Last Evening.

An immense audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric yesterday evening when this famous organization gave its one hundredth performance in Baltimore. The following program was presented:

"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").....Smetana
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74.....Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Prayer from "Tosca".....Puccini
Three Dance Pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet. (First time in Baltimore).....Gretry
I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.
(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Mott.)
Felix Mottl.)
Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
(a) A Song of "Spring," for Orchestra, Op. 16 (First time in Baltimore).....Sibelius
(b) "Finland": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7. (First time in Baltimore).....Sibelius
Soloist.....Mme. Eames

Mr. Fiedler deserves our gratitude for the interesting novelties introduced at this concert. The "Three Dances," by Gretry, are graceful compositions, their arrangement for concert use by Mottl is musicianly, unpretentious, but extremely effective, and their rendering left nothing to be desired. The Menuet, in particular is full of delicate charm and displayed to perfection the exquisite finish of the wood-wind instruments. The two pieces by Jean Sibelius, however, are of much greater merit. The lyrical mood of the first is admirably sustained, the passionate patriotism of the second highly stirring. Sibelius is a composer of power and originality. His ideas are pregnant, his form coherent and his treatment of the orchestra sonorous and imaginative. Finland is justly proud of him and his fame is rapidly spreading.

Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau," is little known in this country. It begins most promisingly, but the working out is patchy and the climax weak, almost trivial.

It is unfortunately impossible to praise last night's performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony." In the first movement several of the wind instruments were noticeably out of tune. So astonishing an occurrence can only be explained by the recent violent changes of temperature. Doubtless the mishap had a disconcerting influence on conductor and players alike. Be this as it may, the symphony fell far short of its usual effect, many details of the score being lost or obscured. The second movement was taken at a tempo considerably slower than that prescribed by the composer and it suffered from the change.

Madame Emma Eames was the soloist of the occasion. Though her voice was not at its best, she sang the prayer from "La Tosca" beautifully. The Verdi Bolero aroused much enthusiasm among the public, but was less satisfactory to the musician. It is a composition of small artistic value. E. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

FEELING the need of a little spiritual uplift and the ordinary resources of Broadway having failed for once, I dropped in the other night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. I say dropped in, but that is a mere facon de parler, for as a matter of fact, the house was crowded upstairs and down, and it took me all my time to effect entrance and get a seat.

My own attitude toward music is that of Charles Lamb, who, you remember, was "sentimentally disposed to harmony, but organically incapable of a tune." And especially I am organically, or, by reason of the blackness of my ignorance, incapable of following the Boston Symphonists into the height whither they are led by Herr Fiedler or Herr Muck or Herr Constantinopolitanischerdudelsackpfeiffer, or whatever imported tsar happens to be wielding the imperial baton. But I take a sensuous delight in sweet sounds, and therein am able to get the worth of my money. Time and again I have remained awake during an entire Symphony concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 9- 1906

MME. EAMES IS WELL RECEIVED

Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra at at Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its one hundredth concert in Baltimore at the Lyric last evening. The audience was the largest the orchestra ever had in this city since its first concert here—April 12, 1886—with a single exception, that occasion being the opening of the Lyric, then called Music Hall, in November, 1893. Last evening both the fashionable and the musical elements of Baltimore were out in force.

The following very modern program was presented:

Smetana—
"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vyschrad motive.
Tschaikowsky (Died November 6, 1893.)—
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor. Op. 74.
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Puccini—
Prayer from "Tosca."
Gretry—
Three Dance Pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet. First time in Baltimore.
I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.
(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Mottl.)
Verdi—
Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers."
Sibelius—
(a) A Song of "Spring" for Orchestra, Op. 16. First time in Baltimore.
(b) "Finland": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra. Op. 26, No. 7. First time in Baltimore.

It is now well understood, not only in Baltimore, but all over the musical world, that no orchestra plays better than the Boston Symphony, and it is a great satisfaction to know that whatever compositions may be presented, there can be no doubt about the way the Boston Orchestra plays it. Last evening almost everything performed was novel, and certain to be more enjoyed at a second hearing. The Tscharkowsky symphony has been heard here before, but however much admired by its composer, it is not likely to become as popular as his fourth, which was given last year. The meaning of the sixth was intended to be mysterious, and beyond the program indications, it is hard to understand. It was the musical expression of the composer's own musical moods, but he desired the public to guess at what he meant.

The work was written after his trip to America, when he visited Baltimore and directed his own piano concerts, but he died a few months after completing the work. Baltimore music-lovers always feel grateful for every presentation of a Tschaikowsky work. The three dances by Gretry were excellent illustrations of the older dance forms, as they are characteristic and true to name. The two numbers by Jean Sibellius are in the best vein of modern composition, and although late on the program, were highly enjoyed.

Mme. Emma Eames was the soloist, and her magnificent stage presence drew a burst of applause from the audience before she began to sing. The Prayer from the tragic opera "La Tosca" is not effective apart from the opera itself, and the audience applauded Mme. Eames more than it did the song, although she was several times recalled.

For her second number she sang the well-known bolero from Verdi's Sicilian Vesper, and was again roundly applauded. But the singing was in a French translation instead of the original Italian, and the bolero lost by it.

The experiment of turning down the lights was tried, but the result seemed to leave the matter in doubt as to whether it is an improvement. Further experiments will be tried before the best way is fully decided upon. Prima donnas will certainly insist on brilliant lights while they sing, and audiences will probably agree with them.

—Copyright, Falk, New York.

MME. EMMA EAMES

Who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Lyric tonight.

Paper Calling Purchasers the World
AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 3- 1908

LARGE AUDIENCE HEARS ORCHESTRA

EMMA EAMES SHARES HONORS AT THE LYRIC.

Boston Symphony Plays to Largest House It Has Ever Had In This City, With One Exception—Popular Soloist Given a Great Reception, and She Sings in Very Fine Style.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its one hundredth concert in Baltimore at the Lyric last evening. The audience was the largest the orchestra ever had in this city since its first concert here—April 12, 1886—with a single exception, that occasion being the opening of the Lyric, then called Music Hall, in November, 1893. Last evening both the fashionable and the musical elements of Baltimore were out in force.

The following very modern program was presented:

Smetana—
"The Moldau." Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.

Tschaikowsky (Died November 6, 1893,)—
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor. Op. 74.
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

Puccini—
Prayer from "Tosca."

Gretry—
Three Dance Pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet. First time in Baltimore.
I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.
(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Mottl.)

Verdi—
Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers."

Sibelius—
(a) A Song of "Spring" for Orchestra, Op. 16. First time in Baltimore.
(b) "Finland": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra. Op. 26, No. 7. First time in Baltimore.

Orchestra Does Well.

It is now well understood, not only in Baltimore, but all over the musical world, that no orchestra plays better than the Boston Symphony, and it is a great satisfaction to know that whatever compositions may be presented, there can be no doubt about the way the Boston Orchestra plays it. Last evening almost everything performed was novel, and certain to be more enjoyed at a second hearing. The Tscharkowsky symphony has been heard here before, but however much admired by its composer, it is not likely to become as popular as his fourth, which was given last year. The meaning of the sixth was intended to be mysterious, and beyond the program indications, it is hard to understand. It was the musical expression of the composer's own musical moods, but he desired the public to guess at what he meant.

The work was written after his trip to America, when he visited Baltimore and directed his own piano concerts, but he died a few months after completing the work. Baltimore music-lovers always feel grateful for every presentation of a Tschaikowsky work. The three dances by Gretry were excellent illustrations of the older dance forms, as they are characteristic and true to name. The two numbers by Jean Sibelius are in the best vein of modern composition, and although late on the program, were highly enjoyed.

Mme. Eames the Soloist.

Mme. Emma Eames was the soloist, and her magnificent stage presence drew a burst of applause from the audience before she began to sing. The Prayer from the tragic opera "La Tosca" is not effective apart from the opera itself, and the audience applauded Mme. Eames more than it did the song, although she was several times recalled.

For her second number she sang the well-known bolero from Verdi's Sicilian Vesper, and was again roundly applauded. But the singing was in a French translation instead of the original Italian, and the bolero lost by it.

The experiment of turning down the lights was tried, but the result seemed to leave the matter in doubt as to whether it is an improvement, as the audience desired a better view of the soloist while she sang. Further experiments will be tried before the best way is fully decided upon. Prima donnas will certainly insist on brilliant lights while they sing, and audiences will probably agree with them.

SUN
DEC 3- 1908

MUSIC'S SPELL AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony's 100th Performance A Triumph.

"LOW-LIGHT" PLAN IS TRIED

Large And Fashionable Audience Greets Mme. Eames And Director Fiedler.

Symphony orchestras have come to Baltimore and symphony orchestras have gone, but if received elsewhere as it was at its one hundredth performance in this city, last night at the Lyric, the Boston Orchestra seemingly bids well to go on forever.

Not since it appeared at the dedicatory performance at the Lyric—then the Music Hall—in 1894, has the orchestra played to such an appreciative house of the best music-lovers of Baltimore. Twenty-eight seasons ago the orchestra first appeared, and 24 years ago made its initial appearance in Baltimore, at the Academy of Music. When it first played at the Lyric there were 85 players; last night there were 97.

Long before the conductor, Max Fiedler, stepped to his stand and made the first motion with his baton Baltimore society and Baltimore music-lovers were passing into the foyer in a throng, which increased and increased until it was a veritable crush. The 2,400 persons filling nearly every seat and standing in the galleries had little time to watch the nervous, intermittent movements of the players as they sounded fleeting preliminary tuning-up notes and bars on violin, 'cello, bassoon, oboes and brass. The appearance of Max Fiedler hushed all, and the late comers were forced to wait without until the applause after the first number was hushed.

Naturally, the features of primary interest were the director and "the" Eames; but Mr. Fiedler modestly forced appreciation of his assistants when, after the first outburst, he called upon them also to rise to accept their proper share of the honors. Mme. Eames, the much-lauded artiste, also declined to accept all the approbation meted out to her, and upon each of her recalls bowed her homage to the director and the orchestra.

The performance also was a triumph, in part, for what have come to be known as the "low-lighters," since their appeal for subdued illumination was granted to the extent of 600 incandescents, which were snapped out with the first bars of "The Moldau," leaving lighted only 10 incandescents under the floor of the balcony, 2 globe lights at the rear and the wall clusters in the balcony, in addition to the 4 yellow-shaded chandeliers and 2 similarly shaded brackets over the stage.

Those who had asked this innovation expressed themselves as much pleased, and the orchestra's manager, Mr. F. R. Comee, said he was willing to continue to bow to the desire of the petitioners, among whom was Cardinal Gibbons, unless the "high-lighters" present a request with more numerous signers. Mr. Fiedler was willing to accept the change, provided there was plenty of light for his players. The orchestra lights were bright, and one or two eye shades were used by front-seat holders, but the general effect was pleasing to the majority.

Mr. Comee, in the intermission, expressed himself as delighted with the audience and its approbation.

FIEDLER A GREAT CONDUCTOR

Mme. Eames Sings Prayer From "Tosca" Effectively.

The second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Max Fiedler, with Madame Eames as soloist, was marked by the following program:

Smetana—"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle "My Country").
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.
Tschaikoway—Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74.
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Puccini—Prayer from "Tosca."
Gretry—Three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," heroic ballet. First time in Baltimore.
I. Tambourin.
II. Menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana").
III. Gigue.
(Freely arranged for concert use by Felix Mottl.
Verdi—Bolero from the "Sicilian Vespers."
Sibelius—
(a) A Song of "Spring" for Orchestra, Op. 16. First time in Baltimore.
(b) "Finland": Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7. First time in Baltimore.

Public interest, which has always been deeply in sympathy with the Boston orchestra, has now become more intensely aroused, partly by the beauty of the program offered and partly by the advent of a director who is sincerly in earnest, who is musicianly and sympathetic with his audience, who is a master in the art of conducting and who knows well how to prepare a program that contains works of art which appeal to a music-loving public.

The first of this year's concerts was well attended, it is true, but upon that occasion many were attracted by curiosity to know what manner of man Mr. Fiedler was, and with what success he would occupy the place left vacant by his eminent predecessor. To paraphrase a classic saying, "He came, he conducted, he conquered."

Last night's work proved many things which were in doubt after the first hearing. That Mr. Fiedler has the capacity for controlling an orchestra, for never has the finesse of orchestral playing been more strongly in evidence; that he has a wonderful conception of the works given, and knows how to make his men respond to his every thought, for were not the smaller fragments of the thematic construction—the substrata, as it were—of the compositions brought to light and emphasized in a striking manner, thus placing before his hearers little points that none but those who had previously studied the works would know existed? He laid bare the composers' very souls, and by means of the dynamic effects and those beautiful nuances that are too often overlooked opened up the pictures conceived in the composers' minds and presented them in their true colors.

What could be more characteristic or beautiful than Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," with its slight tinge of national coloring, and how thoroughly Mr. Fiedler appreciated the composer's peculiar vein, the enthusiasm of the audience attested.

The Tschaikowsky symphony was a marvel of beauty under Mr. Fiedler's baton, the members of the orchestra themselves playing as if impressed with the interpretation. Tschaikowsky sometimes stoops to melodic cheapness—becomes, in fact, almost commonplace, although never for long. But in this symphony—perhaps his greatest work, and certainly his noblest symphony—never for one moment does he descend from the high ideals that actuated him throughout the composition.

Rarely, if ever, have Baltimoreans heard a more perfect performance of the work than that of yesterday, from the first movement, passing through the "Allegro con grazia"—the best example of five-four time known—the "allegro motto vivace," to the last strange and impressive finale. Every word was understood and interpreted—the forceful, the graceful, the light, airy and almost playful, and finally the somber—each and all the varying shades of color were depicted, and Tschaikowsky, at the supremest height of his art, stood brilliantly revealed. Truly Mr. Feidler and his orchestra are an inspiration to each other.

Mme. Eames, the well-known singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist of the evening, and following the traditions of an opera singer, and also taking advantage of such fine orchestral support, the artist gave two operatic selections—"The Prayer," from Puccini's "Tosca," and "Bolero," from Verdi's little-known and still more rarely heard opera, "Sicilian Vespers."

Operatic arias when given on the concert stage, shorn as they are of all scenic surroundings, necessarily lose much of their value and attractiveness. While this applies in a general way to all works of a like character, it would seem to be more particularly the case with Puccini's music, doubtless because of the somewhat loose construction of his writing. Puccini is essentially an operatic composer and oft-times expresses as much in a few chords as a symphonic writer can in a lengthy and extended passage, and for the simple reason that he relies largely upon stage effects and scenic background for support. Bereft of these aids, the concert singer is entirely dependent upon his or her individual effort to create the atmosphere necessary to a true and correct interpretation of the operatic aria.

Now, Mme. Eames has achieved one of her greatest successes in this very opera, "Tosca," and consequently requires no extraneous assistance to enable her to give a perfectly artistic presentation of her selection. Her natural refinement, together with her wealth of vocal requirements, suffice to make her work attractive. To begin with, she possesses a voice which, if a trifle cold at times, is so pure in its quality and intonation that one cannot fail to admire. Last evening her singing of the "Tosca" number betrayed no coldness whatever, but was rather marked by an absolute conception of the prayer and of its place in the opera; in other words, the true artist was present. But the aria was all too brief.

In the dashing "Bolero" her style was changed and her flexibility of voice became prominent. There was such a spirit and dash about her singing that had the rule against encores not been strictly upheld she would have been compelled to yield to the unanimous demand of a delighted public.

Mme. Eames in all her varying moods is always the graceful and gracious artist.

W. G. O.

GRAND OPERA STAR WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MME. EMMA EAMES

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 5 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Two seasons ago the Russian conductor Safonoff was engaged by the New York Philharmonic largely because of his magnificent interpretations of the music of his countrymen, particularly that of perhaps the greatest genius of any country or age—Tschaikowsky. His rendering of the latter's fifth and sixth symphonies, the sixth known as the "Pathetique," was so superior to anything that had gone before, so sympathetic, vital and stirring, that Manhattan packed Carnegie Hall to the doors. He was immediately annexed at a large salary, and after that the last thing you could find on the programme of the subscription concerts was the music of Tschaikowsky or any other notable Russian, not even Wagner—it was all a return to the older classics, handled much more effectively by other conductors, with Safanoff's specialties tacked on to an extra concert at the end of the season. Subscribers were furious, many wrote violent protests to the newspapers, some went so far as to give up their boxes, but whatever the cause of the idiosyncrasy, whether lodged in the conductor or the Philharmonic, the thing went on just the same, even up to last week's pair of concerts; and it comes about that if you want to hear the Pathetique, or any other Slav music that stirs your blood and is peculiarly adapted to the complex modern orchestra, you must go to the Boston, the Russian Symphony, or even the philanthropic "People's." The Boston, since Nikisch, has been accounted conservative with a big lean towards those old classics which sound just as well, if a conductor knows how, with a band of fifty as one hundred and ten. It has remained for Fiedler, merely a plain, quiet German, without specialties, a good all-round man, to give us the music we have longed for, and as well as we could ask.

Certainly the "Pathetique," under his hands last night at the Academy of Music, was a thing of life, a thing of glory. Nobody save Safonoff can get out of that march movement quite all there is in it, and he gets so much that possibly he throws the whole symphony out of gear, making the Adagio Lamentoso which follows and closes the wonderful composition almost anti-climax. Under Fiedler the great funeral music, probably the greatest ever written, came into its own again, as the highest sublimity in a master work reaching to the stars. The first two movements were played in a mood very much subdued, perhaps a trifle ostentatiously so, in order to effect a tremendous contrast toward the last. For even conductors are human.

While the "Pathetique" was the great event of the evening, there were other interesting things, novel and attractive. Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Moldau," a musical depiction of Bohemia's noble river, had charming phases, with its suggestion of woods and water, though it must be confessed that the most alluring passages seemed, as the best of so many composers do seem these days, reminiscent of the Rhine melodies in Wagner's "Ring." This opened the programme, while it was closed by the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," with that conclave of all instruments its marvelous polyphonic measures so well employ.

There was a piano soloist, Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, an artist with a soul, who proved persona grata even to those who dread to have the splendor of the orchestra interrupted by any lesser musical force. He played not the Liszt concerto, which had been advertised, but something entirely new here, by Rachmaninow—his concerto No. 2 in C minor, opus 18. The modesty of the piano part, interpreted with the utmost clearness, skill and feeling, was reinforced in every way by the importance given to the orchestra. There was about it a great deal of "atmosphere," if not perhaps a plethora of marked ideas, but in music who cares so much for mere "ideas" in the presence of rare beauty and color? A sunset is not celebrated for ideas, yet it can be enjoyed most keenly. Mere sensuous loveliness makes a legitimate appeal. This concerto certainly was a bright spot in a programme somewhat long, the Symphony itself taking a full hour, yet one would be at a loss to decide the number to be omitted.

The audience was large and enthusiastic, a typical Brooklyn audience, where everybody knew everybody else and visited during the intermission.

aper Cutting Bureau in the World

y Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 5 1908

MUSICAL.

Second Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Ossip Gabrilowitsch as Soloist.

A splendid programme was offered at the second concert in the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night and in the measure of satisfaction it gave the listener was an impressive contrast to the programme of the first concert of the series last month. There was more than usual scope in last night's offering, which was received with glad acclaim by an audience that crowded the opera house from top to bottom. The attendance and interest manifested seem to give a more than ordinary intimation of the high place these concerts hold in the esteem of those who appreciate the best in music.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic) in B minor, was the principal orchestral number, being preceded by "The Moldau," the second movement of Smetana's "My Country" cycle, and followed by the Rachmaninow Concerto No. 2 in C minor, played by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." This list presented not only colorful variety, but also the essence of charm in quality that was irresistible and was given an enthusiastic reception. The Smetana number, picturing life along the river for which it is named, is graciously pleasing in lucidity and frankness, and was a welcome introduction to the more grandiose style represented by the symphony. The interpretation of this work gave the new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, an opportunity he did not have at the first concert, to show wherein lies his forte as a leader. The energizing vitality of his temperament took hold of this symphony, often heard here, in a way that was new to Brooklyn listeners, and the performance was particularly effective in the first and third movements, which were made vivid with decisive contrasts and wealth of tone. There was unusual applause for the rendering of each movement of the symphony.

The Rachmaninow concerto is a novelty with pronounced points of interest, yet somewhat indefinite in its appeal. It has passages of great beauty and delicacy, but is too vaguely soaring to be directly impressive. Mr. Gabrilowitsch brought a most skillful execution to bear upon every point of excellence in the work, which is more than ordinarily trying in contrasting elements. The pianist's performance was marked by a serenity and exquisite delicacy worthy of the highest commendation.

TRIBUNE
ess New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It would almost seem as if the suggestion several times made in a playful mood in reviews of orchestral concerts in this journal touching the value and need of a sort of musical clearing house would have to be taken seriously. Early in this season there were no fewer than four performances in rapid succession of the same violin concerto. Now the orchestras have begun to play Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, and it will probably endure to the end of the season. The Boston Orchestra played it yesterday, though it had already figured on a local programme. The same band played Smetana's symphonic poem "Ultava," which is set down for the concerts of the Philharmonic Society next Friday and Saturday. Some years ago every orchestral organization, local and visiting, that gave a concert in New York played Brahms's second symphony. About the same time every one of six or seven conductors invited to direct a pair of concerts by the Philharmonic Society included the "Pathetic" symphony in the programme which he sent in to the directors. In this case there was a simple and obvious explanation, for there is nothing easier in the world for a conductor than to make an effect with this peculiarly subjective work. Perhaps the greatest merit of yesterday's performance lay in the fact that Mr. Fiedler did not attempt any sensational tricks with it, but let his band disclose its splendid sonority, euphony and precision in a normal reading.

The solo feature of the concert was Schumann's pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. Emil Sauer—somewhat drily, on the whole, but with splendid dash in the finale.

NEW YORK PRESS,
ss New York City.

performance and was received favorably.

Fiedler Exaggerates Russian Music.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" was the principal symphonic offering at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, and Emil Sauer supplied the solo feature in Schumann's piano concerto in A minor. Fiedler's performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony came as a disappointment. It was a reading of exaggerated contrasts.

Sauer gave a brilliant performance of Schumann concerto; but though the revealed much nervous intensity ed extremely little depth of feel- playing was as clear as crystal

STAATS ZEITUNG,
rom New York City.
ddress
ate

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Das am Donnerstag Abend in der ganz gefüllten Carnegie Hall abgehaltene Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters hatte einen ganzen Erfolg. Es zeigte das unvergleichliche Orchester von seiner besten Seite und ergab die erfreuliche Thatsache, daß Herr Fiedler, der neue Dirigent der Bostoner, sich mit seinem Instrument schon recht vertraut gemacht hat.

Manches von den Ausetzungen, zu denen man nach den ersten Konzerten veranlaßt worden war, muß man diesmal zurücknehmen. Namentlich ist es uns aufgefallen, daß diesmal von der früher beobachteten Gewaltthätigkeit in der Tongebung nur mehr wenig zu merken war. Der Orchesterklang prangte häufig in alter Schöne, und es war nicht zu verkennen, daß der neue Dirigent den Tonkörper bei aller ihm eigenen Energie recht sanft behandelte.

Das zeigte sich namentlich in Fiedler's bedeutender Ausgestaltung von Strauß' „Heldenleben", die Klarheit und Uebersichtlichkeit mit einem überaus glänzenden Orchesterkolorit vereinigte. Es war eine sehr schöne Leistung.

Nicht minder aus einem Guß war der Vortrag von Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture. Poetisch und in zarter Ausführung brachte das Orchester Sibelius „Ein Lied vom Frühling" als Novität. Desselben Komponisten „Finlandia" beendete das gelungene Konzert.

WORLD,
om
dress New York City.
e

MATINEE CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Emil Sauer was the soloist, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" the symphony, and a symphonic poem, "The Moldau," an effective and original bit of descriptive musical writing by Smetana—No. 2 of the cycle "My Country"—a feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

It was evident from his work at this concert that the well established traditions of the Boston Orchestra had already begun to exert an influence in the methods and theories of their new conductor, for it was a much tempered Mr. Fiedler, as it seemed to me, that I heard yesterday.

His reading of Tschaikowsky's mighty work was entirely lucid, in the main well balanced, sympathetic and impressive, if at times the ineffable pathos of this poignant cry of a lost soul sounded somewhat turbulent and stressful. If Mr. Fiedler read too much pathos into and most of the lightness and grace out of the allegro con grazia, and rather forced the climax of the march of the third movement, both the first and last movements were played with great artistic appreciation and undeniable power.

Herr Sauer too seemed in restrained mood yesterday, and played the lovely Schumann A minor concerto with unusual continence and sympathetic feeling, and with his usual brilliancy of style and technique.

The Smetana number was effectively rendered, and Weber's "Oberon" overture closed a programme which did not make me ask myself, as I did at the first concert, Is this really the Boston Orchestra I have known and loved, lo these many years?

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.
s

Boston Orchestra Concert.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another enjoyable concert. Smetana's "The Moldau" and Weber's overture to "Oberon" had their places at the top and bottom of the programme, and between came Tschaikowsky's famous "Pathetic" Symphony and Schumann's A minor piano concerto.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is a familiar work to concert audiences of this city and its performance yesterday served but to strengthen its hold upon the public, for Mr. Fiedler and his men gave a lucid and effective interpretation of the emotional score. The audience applauded heartily, compelling both conductor and orchestra players to bow their acknowledgement.

Mr. Emil Sauer was the soloist, playing the Schumann concerto. He has been heard here before this season and his playing yesterday was again marked by crisp beauty of tone and by admirable clarity. It was a fine performance of a delightful work, and the pianist was recalled many times at the close.

SUN,
s New York City.
DEC 6 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Emil Sauer, the Pianist, Plays the Beautiful Concerto of Schumann.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday was attended by a numerous assembly. The programme offered by Conductor Max Fiedler consisted of Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau," Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique," Schumann's piano concerto and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The pianist was Emil Sauer. It was a good concert, but none the less not one to excite the hardened observer to grave or lengthy comment. The compositions were all old friends, and it was not to be expected that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would fail to play them with beauty of tone and finished technic.

If, therefore, any one was waiting for the revelation of a new gospel according to Fiedler he waited in vain, for there was nothing in the readings of the works to challenge or to woo. Mr. Fiedler is a competent conductor who does not obtrude sensational interpretations upon his audience, and for this at all hazards he must be thanked. Doubtless many hearers would also thank him for a little more temperament in his interpretations and a little less anxious insistence on the rhetorical pause, the sweeping contrasts between light and dark and the other accentuations which often seem to constitute a reading, but do not always do so.

The "Pathetic" symphony was well performed, but there was nothing in its presentation to call for especial remark. Mr. Sauer played the piano part of Schumann's beautiful concerto with understanding, with delightful rhythm, with exquisite clarity in the finger work and with no little temperament in parts; but it cannot be said that he brought to the interpretation the full measure of luscious tone or significant variety of tone color.

TIMES
1
ess New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Afternoon Concert in Carnegie Hall—Emil Sauer Soloist.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday brought forward an agreeable programme. It was pleasant to hear again Smetana's tone poem, "Vltava," one of his cycle called "My Fatherland," "programme music" in the older sense that endeavored not to represent minutiae, but to quicken the fancy and fire the imagination with suggestions, and presented at the same time a well-ordered and coherent piece of music that give delight as music. "Vltava" is a fresh and vigorous piece, in which the composer's inspiration came spontaneously and broadly, if not deeply. It was played in that spirit and with a fine sonority and delicacy.

In Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, which followed, Mr. Fiedler took some of the tempos of the first movement a little mre deliberately than they have been heard here recently, and as he made it seem, properly. It was a carefully wrought performance, in which no details were slighted, and the contrasting sombreness and reflective spirit of the first movement, the breathless feverishness of the scherzo, the profoundly tragic spirit of the last were given a fitting and convincing expression.

Mr. Emil Sauer played Schumann's piano concerto with much clarity and fleetness of finger, but he did not penetrate deeply into the tender poetry of either the first movement or the entrancing simplicity of the intermezzo. They were set forth in a clear and rather dry light. In the finale he gave a richer view of the musical content of the movement. There were a finely elastic spirit and a clear-cut rhythm in his playing, which sparkled with a delicate brilliancy, and the recurring theme which is couched in the thoroughly Schumannesque syncopations he played with a delightful grace.

The concert closed with Weber's overture to "Oberon."

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date DEC

At Carnegie hall the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second matinee concert Saturday afternoon with Emil Sauer as soloist. A very large audience was present and applauded vigorously Mr. Fiedler's readings of Smetana's "The Moldau," given with a charming light quality; Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony in which Mr. Fiedler did not infuse the glow and passion the work demands; Weber's "Oberon" overture and Schumann's concerto played by Mr. Sauer. This was a splendid performance and showed the highest qualities of the pianist.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
s New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "Pathetic" symphony was the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Multiplicity of performances under a variety of leaders has not dulled public interest in this most popular of modern symphonies. Its wealth of sensuous and clearly defined melody wins for it hearers that might otherwise be repelled by the shamelessness with which the music (so far as music can be said to do anything so specific) lays bare the plague spots of the soul. A large number of persons heard the symphony Saturday with rapt attention and applauded it as if they loved it.

The performance under the direction of Mr. Fiedler was as a whole admirable. The orchestra played with its accustomed technical excellence. A slower tempo than usual for some passages of the first movement made them uncommonly effective. Like an agonized shriek was the upward rush of the violins in the lyric episode. To the second movement Mr. Fiedler gave a sort of blear-eyed melancholy. The march has been played here more excitingly. In the finale Mr. Fiedler abstained from hurrying the pace, and the interpretation was impressive.

After the symphony came Emil Sauer in Schumann's piano concerto. Since Mr. Sauer's recital on Wednesday is announced as positively his last appearance in New York for all time, this must have been his last appearance here with orchestra. In the first movement of the Schumann concerto his playing was rather dry and unsympathetic. In the intermezzo he entered more into the spirit of the work, and dynamically his tone was beautifully adjusted to the accompaniment. In the finale, hard for any pianist to make effective, he accomplished much through clarity of execution and justness of accent.

The concert opened with Smetana's melodious and picturesque tone picture of the Moldau River, and closed with Weber's "Oberon" overture. The slow introduction to the overture gained by being played not too slowly, and the pianissimo before the celebrated fortissimo chord was not so faint as to let the listener forget that music was being played at all. Any one who feared that the Boston orchestra might be falling away from its old standards of euphony and finish must have been especially reassured by the polished performance of this overture. Altogether in the two concerts of last week Mr. Fiedler has bettered the impression he made here a month ago.

J. P. S.

rom EVENING POST,
ldress New York City.
ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Saturday matinée programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra consisted principally of "old favorites." The opening number, however, Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," has been played before, but not often. It is programme music of the musical sort, rather than the realistic kind. It is beautiful as music, listened to apart from its programme as all good programme music is, including most of Wagner's so-called "scenic" music. The second number was Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, so often heard at our own Philharmonic concerts under the Russian Safonoff. Mr. Fiedler's interpretation had less of the Cossack in it—as a matter of course, but it was a strong and virile performance nevertheless. Mr. Fiedler wisely followed the custom of having the bass clarinet continue the crescendo of the clarinet in the first movement—Tchaikovsky's "PPPPPP" on the lower notes of the bassoon is impossible—as MacDowell used to say, "it sounds like a megatherium with a cold." There is a somewhat similar decrescendo given to the bassoon in the last movement, and the question occurs: why is not the same plan followed here? Mr. Fiedler, by the way, conducted without a score.

Mr. Sauer played the Schumann concerto sweetly, but without sounding the depths or reaching the heights of this, one of the most beautiful of all concertos. It was a good virtuoso performance, however.

The last number, the "Oberon" overture, was good to hear. Its beautiful melodies, clear form, and clever orchestration are still potent, and the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler gave it one of the most enchanting performances ever heard here—it is fairy music, and must enchant if played as it was Saturday.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

ss New York City.

DEC 7—1908

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Smetana's symphonisches Poëm „Die Moldau" eröffnete das Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Carnegie Hall am verflossenen Samstag Nachmittag unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler. Das frische, kräftige Stück fand eine durchaus lobenswerthe Wiedergabe. Das berühmte Orchester konnte seine ganze Farbenkunst zeigen, und der Dirigent ließ keine Gelegenheit unbenutzt, um Effekt, Effekt im guten Sinn, zu machen.

Etwas zahmer war Fiedler's Wiedergabe von Tschaikowsky's „Pathétique". Wir haben dieses große Werk während der letzten Jahre in allen Tunken genossen, straff, poetisch, maßvoll, überhitzt, theatralisch, künstlerisch. Es ist daher nicht leicht, uns darin etwas Neues zu bringen, ja, wir möchten geradezu sagen, daß nur Nuancenkrämerei schlechtesten Geschmacks dies versuchen könnte

Herr Fiedler gab uns eine ernste, gesammelte, wohlthuend einfache Darstellung der Seelentragödie des großen Russen, er vertheilte Licht und Schatten auf das Feinste und Abgetönteste, doch enthielt er sich aller Gewaltsamkeiten und milderte das vielfach Theatralische der Musik namentlich im ersten Satz mit künstlerischer Feinfühligkeit, wodurch er sich allerdings theilweise um die populäre Wirkung brachte. Auf dem schwankenden Boden des heiklen Fünfviertel-Takts des zweiten Satzes erblühte unter seiner Leitung liebenswürdige Schelmerei. Das Ersterben in den Tiefen des Orchesters am Schluß der Symphonie brachte er mit erschütternder Wirkung. Der Beifall klang aufrichtig.

Als Solist wirkte Herr Emil Sauer mit, und zwar spielte er mit dem Orchester Schumann's schönes A-Moll-Konzert, op. 54. Es war ein erfreuliches Zusammenspiel des schwierigen Werks, in dem Orchester und Piano thematisch ineinanderfließen. Dieses Konzert ist bei den Pianisten als „undankbar" verschrien, weil es nicht viel Gelegenheit zu bravouröser Technikentfaltung bietet, aber Herr Sauer hat gezeigt, wie man derlei künstlerisch und bravourös gleichzeitig gestalten kann, selbst wenn man auf die rein äußerliche, blendende Wirkung verzichtet.

Im ersten Satz brachte er die glänzenden anstürmenden Sextenpassagen mit großem Elan, nicht minder die kräftig abrollenden Oktaven im Wiederstreit des Orchesters und des Solisten; die Kadenz gestaltete er intensiv mit gewaltiger Steigerung. Das „Intermezzo" nahm er leicht, lieblich, bewegt, und das in flottestem Tempo vorgetragene Allegro vivace strahlte von Munterkeit und Frohsinn. Ueberaus glänzend brachte Sauer das reiche Passagen- und Figurenwerk. Der Künstler wurde sehr lebhaft gefeiert.

H.

TIMES,

HARTFORD, CONN.

DEC 9—1908

Fiedler and the Bonnets.

The American woman's independence is seriously threatened in Boston, where the hat question has been threshed out with victory on the side of the stronger sex. It is stated that Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the symphony orchestra, refused at one of the concerts to begin the program until the last hat had been removed. There is no doubt that the ladies whose headgear obscured the vision are exceedingly inconsiderate, but until there is an ordinance enforcing removal, Mr. Fiedler may find that arbitrary measures will only tend to create unpopularity for him. The office he fills is no sinecure and is largely dependent on the good will of the fraller sex, which is the main support of music in America. (so declares the composer, Arthur Whiting, after considerable study of conditions in this country.) At a symphony concert where there is no soloist presented, hats may possibly offer some interesting diversion, since the conductor is not there for spectacular purposes, but for obtaining the best there is to tickle the aural nerves. In Chicago things are done differently; a courteous request is usually met with considerate response. It is only the woman from Podunk, and to whom a new hat is a rarity, that will insist upon inconveniencing her neighbors.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 11 1908

A PLEA FOR THE PERMANENT ORCHESTRA.

The proposition to reorganize the Philharmonic Society upon the basis of a permanent, endowed orchestra is one which might well appeal to wealthy patrons of music. That this step would be better than to establish a body entirely new, probably most people who are interested will agree. For one thing, it would preserve to the reorganized orchestra the prestige of the Philharmonic Society, due to its sixty-seven years of active life.

Through the generosity of Henry L. Higginson the Boston Symphony Orchestra was established in permanency in 1881. About its value to music and to the city of its home there has never arisen any doubt. Since 1896 the Symphony players have visited New York for annual concert series and have not failed of metropolitan appreciation.

At home the Boston orchestra gives twenty-four subscription concerts each season, and every concert is preceded the night before by a public rehearsal. The players practise daily, being able to give their whole season's time to the organization.

For a million dollars, it is stated, the Philharmonic Society can be put upon the new basis in New York. Among the metropolitan possibilities to follow the change one may think of great public rehearsals in such a hall of the people as the Madison Square Garden.

From LIFE

Address N. Y.

Date DEC 12 1908

THE second of this season's Boston Symphony Concerts in the opera house of the Academy of Music, last week Friday evening, attracted if anything a larger audience than the first, at all events efforts to detect a vacant seat failed. The program was one calculated to charm all classes of music lovers above the grade of the Philistine, who cannot soar above the realms of Victor Herbert or Reginald De Koven. Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," an exquisitely melodious lyrical composition, was rendered with marvelous perfection of rhythm in response to Fiedler's magic wand. The sad but beautiful Tschaikowsky Symphony Pathetique was the chief number on the program and was doubtless the chief attraction to the great audience. It was superbly rendered, though probably everyone familiar with it had heard it differently interpreted and drew a contrast favorable or otherwise to Mr. Fiedler. The triumphant third movement was not given with the spirit and energy with which Safonoff or even Karl Muck invested it. It was inspiring, but not overwhelming; but, perhaps, as the symphony is an expression of the profoundest pessimism, Fiedler is correct in not exaggerating the exultant note preceding the final end of human hopes and ambition. Rachmaninow's pianoforte concerto in C minor was played by the soloist Ossip Gabrilowitsch in masterly style accompanied by the orchestra. As one of the musical critics calls it a "dull and unfruitful" composition and another a "fine and fervent" piece of work, it may perhaps be safe to compare it with the curate's boiled egg, which he assured the bishop was excellent in parts. The final number was the "Vorspiel" to "Die Meistersinger," which, of course, was splendid. A few who could be recognized in the large audience were Miss Katharine and Miss Dorothea Dreier, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mr. and Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Deming Sherman, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Dudley D. Roberts, Miss Marion Litchfield, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Mr. John S. Praeger, Miss Brinsmade, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Harmon, Mr. Robert B. Woodward, the Misses Merritt, Miss Marion Terry, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Jewell, Miss Mary Hathaway Baldwin, Miss Benson, Miss Thyrza Benson, Mr. Percival S. Dudley, Miss Gieser, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hinman, the Misses Hunter, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Mr. John G. Underhill, Dr. Jaques C. Rushmore, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mr. and Mrs. William Berri, Mr. Rufus Chase, Mr. George D. Hapgood and Mr. Frank H. Hutton.

* * *

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

DEC 4- 1908

Last night there was an audience of enthusiasm and numbers at Carnegie hall to greet the Boston Symphony orchestra at its second visit and to welcome Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. Mr. Fiedler offered a programme built upon original lines, and carried it out with fidelity to the highest ideals which he has established for himself. After the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, Mr. Fiedler turned to the extremely modern, and gave a vivid, splendid reading of Strauss's complicated and lengthy "Heldenleben," which awakened at once admiration and surprise.

It has often figured on our programmes, but never has its context been so clearly revealed, and never has it seemed so much like music. The violin obligato, played by Prof. Hess, was in itself the [illegible]

Gabrilowitsch selected Rachmaninoff's Second concerto in which to present himself for the fourth time in America, and it proved a work of extreme interest under hs magical fingers, and earned for him some nine or ten recalls. With more frequent hearings it opens new lines of beauty, especially under a reading so wonderfully lucid, brilliant and impressive. He has come back with more polish and more depth than ever, and the poetry in his playing is of the most manly and sincere, yet spiritual type.

The reading of the second movement was a triumph, for it has been held as dull, long and uninteresting. There was not a moment, there was not a note which Gabrilowitsch did not make pregnant with all the gloom known to the Russian composer and to the pianist of the same nationality who know how to sound depths. These depths were sounded last night, and they won their way by the sheer simplicity through which the pianist revealed the most marvelous singing tone conceivable. It was great playing, such as is seldom heard.

[illegible]

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ss New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

THE programme performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, at Carnegie Hall last evening, differed in the final number from the programme announced originally for the concert. Instead of the prelude and "Love-death" from "Tristan und Isolde," "A Song of Spring," and "Finlandia" by the Finnish composer Jean Sibelius brought the concert to a close. "A Song of Spring" was played here for the first time. The other numbers on the programme were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto. The soloist was Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

The feature of the concert was the performance of "Ein Heldenleben." This work had been heard here last at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 10 and 11, 1905. Willem Mengelberg of Amsterdam, to whom the score is dedicated, was the conductor. Mr. Mengelberg is an enthusiastic admirer of the music of Richard Strauss; but so is Mr. Fiedler, and he conducted "Ein Heldenleben" yesterday con amore.

The performance of this much discussed work served to reveal anew its many noble and impressive pages. The opening section is truly heroic. The love music, after the coquetries of the solo violin have been silenced, is of memorable beauty. The contemplative music toward the close has been compared not without reason to the serene elevation of Beethoven at his best. Of imposing grandeur are the final measures.

Of course the passages lampooning the Hero's critics and the section depicting the Hero's battlefield are still condemned as not being music. Perhaps they are not; but on the other hand, do they not succeed in producing adequately the effect the composer seeks—be it music or be it din? And it is risky business, this determining what is and what is not music. For proof one need not refer to the battle over Wagner. Consider contemporaneous judgments on Mozart, Rossini, Gounod, and Bizet. Certainly Mr. Fiedler conducted "Ein Heldenleben" as if he entertained not the slightest doubt about its being music, and the orchestra rewarded his confidence with a superb performance. Mr. Hess played the important violin solos in a delicate and finished manner.

The following extract from Philip Hale's programme notes is of importance in considering the novelty by Sibelius, "A Song of Spring": "The score of 'Varsang' was copyrighted in 1903. The title page bears these titles: 'Varsang,' 'Frühlingslied,' 'La Tristesse du Printemps.' I do not know whether the French title is the composer's or the publisher's. Mrs. Newmarch in her biographical sketch of Sibelius says: 'The second title of this work, "The Sadness of Spring," seems to indicate that it is not so much a glad and triumphant vernal mood which this music is intended to express, as some subjective feeling not easy to define. Perhaps the dryness of heart which follows upon some corroding embittering sorrow, for which the swift, magic beauty of the northern spring bears a message of mockery rather than of hope. But this is left to our imagination, as also the meaning of the strange peal of bells and the impassioned coda at the close of the work.' The music, one continuous song, romantic and gradually increasing in passion, requires no analysis."

There is little to add to Mr. Hale's words, except to record that last night the piece did not make a marked impression and was received by the audience coldly. "Finlandia," on the other hand, is indisputably a work of genuine inspiration and power.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch was applauded long and enthusiastically for his playing of the Rachmaninoff concerto, and he deserved the applause, for he played exceedingly well. But why good playing should be wasted on this empty and tiresome composition is hard to understand. Raoul Pugno played it here three years ago. Miss Tina Lerner played it here last month, and now Mr. Gabrilowitsch has played it here. Surely more is not needed to disclose the quality of the work. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is a more ingratiating interpreter of modern music than Raoul Pugno, and he had the advantage of playing to the accompaniment of the wonderful band from Boston, but even this auspicious combination failed to demonstrate that the concerto in question belongs elsewhere than on the shelf.

J. P. S.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

ss New York City.

DEC 7 - 1908

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Smetana's symphonisches Poëm „Die Moldau" eröffnete das Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Carnegie Hall am verflossenen Samstag Nachmittag unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler. Das frische, kräftige Stück fand eine durchaus lobenswerthe Wiedergabe. Das berühmte Orchester konnte seine ganze Farbenkunst zeigen, und der Dirigent ließ keine Gelegenheit unbenutzt, um Effekt, Effekt im guten Sinn, zu machen.

Etwas zahmer war Fiedler's Wiedergabe von Tschaikowsky's „Pathétique". Wir haben dieses große Werk während der letzten Jahre in allen Tunken genossen, straff, poetisch, maßvoll, überhitzt, theatralisch, künstlerisch. Es ist daher nicht leicht, uns darin etwas Neues zu bringen, ja, wir möchten geradezu sagen, daß nur Nuancenrieckerei schlechtesten Geschmacks dies versuchen könnte

Herr Fiedler gab uns eine ernste, gesammelte, wohlthuend einfache Darstellung der Seelentragödie des großen Russen, er vertheilte Licht und Schatten auf das Feinste und Abgetönteste, doch enthielt er sich aller Gewaltsamkeiten und milderte das vielfach Theatralische der Musik namentlich im ersten Satz mit künstlerischer Feinfühligkeit, wodurch er sich allerdings theilweise um die populäre Wirkung brachte. Auf dem schwankenden Boden des heiklen Fünfviertel-Takts des zweiten Satzes erblühte unter seiner Leitung liebenswürdige Schelmerei. Das Ersterben in den Tiefen des Orchesters am Schluß der Symphonie brachte er mit erschütternder Wirkung. Der Beifall klang aufrichtig.

Als Solist wirkte Herr Emil Sauer mit, und zwar spielte er mit dem Orchester Schumann's schönes A-Moll-Konzert, op. 54. Es war ein erfreuliches Zusammenspiel des schwierigen Werks, in dem Orchester und Piano thematisch ineinanderfließen. Dieses Konzert ist bei den Pianisten als „undankbar" verschrien, weil es nicht viel Gelegenheit zu bravouröser Technikentfaltung bietet, aber Herr Sauer hat gezeigt, wie man derlei künstlerisch und bravourös gleichzeitig gestalten kann, selbst wenn man auf die rein äußerliche, blendende Wirkung verzichtet.

Im ersten Satz brachte er die glänzenden anstürmenden Sextenpassagen mit großem Elan, nicht minder die kräftig abrollenden Oktaven im Wiederstreit des Orchesters und des Solisten; die Kadenz gestaltete er intensiv mit gewaltiger Steigerung. Das „Intermezzo" nahm er leicht, lieblich, bewegt, und das in flottestem Tempo vorgetragene Allegro vivace strahlte von Munterkeit und Frohsinn. Ueberaus glänzend brachte Sauer das reiche Passagen- und Figurenwerk. Der Künstler wurde sehr lebhaft gefeiert.

H.

T

HARTFORD, CONN.

s

Fiedler and the Bonnets.

The American woman's independence is seriously threatened in Boston, where the hat question has been threshed out with victory on the side of the stronger sex. It is stated that Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the symphony orchestra, refused at one of the concerts to begin the program until the last hat had been removed. There is no doubt that the ladies whose headgear obscured the vision are exceedingly inconsiderate, but until there is an ordinance enforcing removal, Mr. Fiedler may find that arbitrary measures will only tend to create unpopularity for him. The office he fills is no sinecure and is largely dependent on the good will of the frailer sex, which is the main support of music in America (so declares the composer, Arthur Whiting, after considerable study of conditions in this country.) At a symphony concert where there is no soloist presented, hats may possibly offer some interesting diversion, since the conductor is not there for spectacular purposes, but for obtaining the best there is to tickle the aural nerves. In Chicago things are done differently; a courteous request is usually met with considerate response. It is only the woman from Podunk, and to whom a new hat is a rarity, that will insist upon inconveniencing her neighbors.

From WORLD.

Address New York City.

Date DEC 1 1908

A PLEA FOR THE PERMANENT ORCHESTRA.

The proposition to reorganize the Philharmonic Society upon the basis of a permanent, endowed orchestra is one which might well appeal to wealthy patrons of music. That this step would be better than to establish a body entirely new, probably most people who are interested will agree. For one thing, it would preserve to the reorganized orchestra the prestige of the Philharmonic Society, due to its sixty-seven years of active life.

Through the generosity of Henry L. Higginson the Boston Symphony Orchestra was established in permanency in 1881. About its value to music and to the city of its home there has never arisen any doubt. Since 1890 the Symphony players have visited New York for annual concert series and have not failed of metropolitan appreciation.

At home the Boston orchestra gives twenty-four subscription concerts each season, and every concert is preceded the night before by a public rehearsal. The players practise daily, being able to give their whole season's time to the organization.

For a million dollars, it is stated, the Philharmonic Society can be put upon the new basis in New York. Among the metropolitan possibilities to follow the change one may think of great public rehearsals in such a hall of the people as the Madison Square Garden.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

THE second of this season's Boston Symphony Concerts in the opera house of the Academy of Music, last week Friday evening, attracted if anything a larger audience than the first, at all events efforts to detect a vacant seat failed. The program was one calculated to charm all classes of music lovers above the grade of the Philistine, who cannot soar above the realms of Victor Herbert or Reginald De Koven. Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," an exquisitely melodious lyrical composition, was rendered with marvelous perfection of rhythm in response to Fiedler's magic wand. The sad but beautiful Tschaikowsky Symphony Pathetique was the chief number on the program and was doubtless the chief attraction to the great audience. It was superbly rendered, though probably everyone familiar with it had heard it differently interpreted and drew a contrast favorable or otherwise to Mr. Fiedler. The triumphant third movement was not given with the spirit and energy with which Safonoff or even Karl Muck invested it. It was inspiring, but not overwhelming; but, perhaps, as the symphony is an expression of the profoundest pessimism, Fiedler is correct in not exaggerating the exultant note preceding the final end of human hopes and ambition. Rachmaninow's pianoforte concerto in C minor was played by the soloist Ossip Gabrilowitsch in masterly style accompanied by the orchestra. As one of the musical critics calls it a "dull and unfruitful" composition and another a "fine and fervent" piece of work, it may perhaps be safe to compare it with the curate's boiled egg, which he assured the bishop was excellent in parts. The final number was the "Vorspiel" to "Die Meistersinger," which, of course, was splendid. A few who could be recognized in the large audience were Miss Katharine and Miss Dorothea Dreier, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mr. and Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Deming Sherman, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Dudley D. Roberts, Miss Marion Litchfield, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Mr. John S. Praeger, Miss Brinsmade, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Harmon, Mr. Robert B. Woodward, the Misses Merritt, Miss Marion Terry, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Jewell, Miss Mary Hathaway Baldwin, Miss Benson, Miss Thyrza Benson, Mr. Percival S. Dudley, Miss Gieser, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hinman, the Misses Hunter; Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Mr. John G. Underhill, Dr. Jaques C. Rushmore, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mr. and Mrs. William Berri, Mr. Rufus Chase, Mr. George D. Hapgood and Mr. Frank H. Hutton.

* * *

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

s

Last night there was an audience of enthusiasm and numbers at Carnegie hall to greet the Boston Symphony orchestra at its second visit and to welcome Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. Mr. Fiedler offered a programme built upon original lines, and carried it out with fidelity to the highest ideals which he has established for himself. After the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, Mr. Fiedler turned to the extremely modern, and gave a vivid, splendid reading of Strauss's complicated and lengthy "Heldenleben," which awakened at once admiration and surprise.

It has often figured on our programmes, but never has its context been so clearly revealed, and never has it seemed so much like music. The violin obligato, played by Prof. Hess, was in itself the achievement of a great artist.

Gabrilowitsch selected Rachmaninoff's Second concerto in which to present himself for the fourth time in America, and it proved a work of extreme interest under hs magical fingers, and earned for him some nine or ten recalls. With more frequent hearings it opens new lines of beauty, especially under a reading so wonderfully lucid, brilliant and impressive. He has come back with more polish and more depth than ever, and the poetry in his playing is of the most manly and sincere, yet spiritual type.

The reading of the second movement was a triumph, for it has been held as dull, long and uninteresting. There was not a moment, there was not a note which Gabrilowitsch did not make pregnant with all the gloom known to the Russian composer and to the pianist of the same nationality who know how to sound depths. These depths were sounded last night, and they won their way by the sheer simplicity through which the pianist revealed the most marvelous singing tone conceivable. It was great playing, such as is seldom heard.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER.

ss New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

THE programme performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, at Carnegie Hall last evening, differed in the final number from the programme announced originally for the concert. Instead of the prelude and "Love-death" from "Tristan und Isolde," "A Song of Spring," and "Finlandia" by the Finnish composer Jean Sibelius brought the concert to a close. "A Song of Spring" was played here for the first time. The other numbers on the programme were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto. The soloist was Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

The feature of the concert was the performance of "Ein Heldenleben." This work had been heard here last at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 10 and 11, 1905. Willem Mengelberg of Amsterdam, to whom the score is dedicated, was the conductor. Mr. Mengelberg is an enthusiastic admirer of the music of Richard Strauss; but so is Mr. Fiedler, and he conducted "Ein Heldenleben" yesterday con amore.

The performance of this much discussed work served to reveal anew its many noble and impressive pages. The opening section is truly heroic. The love music, after the coquetries of the solo violin have been silenced, is of memorable beauty. The contemplative music toward the close has been compared not without reason to the serene elevation of Beethoven at his best. Of imposing grandeur are the final measures.

Of course the passages lampooning the Hero's critics and the section depicting the Hero's battlefield are still condemned as not being music. Perhaps they are not: but on the other hand, do they not succeed in producing adequately the effect the composer seeks—be it music or be it din? And it is risky business, this determining what is and what is not music. For proof one need not refer to the battle over Wagner. Consider contemporaneous judgments on Mozart, Rossini, Gounod, and Bizet. Certainly Mr. Fiedler conducted "Ein Heldenleben" as if he entertained not the slightest doubt about its being music, and the orchestra rewarded his confidence with a superb performance. Mr. Hess played the important violin solos in a delicate and finished manner.

The following extract from Philip Hale's programme notes is of importance in considering the novelty by Sibelius, "A Song of Spring": "The score of 'Varsang' was copyrighted in 1903. The title page bears these titles: 'Varsang,' 'Frühlingslied,' 'La Tristesse du Printemps.' I do not know whether the French title is the composer's or the publisher's. Mrs. Newmarch in her biographical sketch of Sibelius says: 'The second title of this work, "The Sadness of Spring," seems to indicate that it is not so much a glad and triumphant vernal mood which this music is intended to express, as some subjective feeling not easy to define. Perhaps the dryness of heart which follows upon some corroding embittering sorrow, for which the swift, magic beauty of the northern spring bears a message of mockery rather than of hope. But this is left to our imagination, as also the meaning of the strange peal of bells and the impassioned coda at the close of the work.' The music, one continuous song, romantic and gradually increasing in passion, requires no analysis."

There is little to add to Mr. Hale's words, except to record that last night the piece did not make a marked impression and was received by the audience coldly. "Finlandia," on the other hand, is indisputably a work of genuine inspiration and power.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch was applauded long and enthusiastically for his playing of the Rachmaninoff concerto, and he deserved the applause, for he played exceedingly well. But why good playing should be wasted on this empty and tiresome composition is hard to understand. Raoul Pugno played it here three years ago, Miss Tina Lerner played it here last month, and now Mr. Gabrilowitsch has played it here. Surely more is not needed to disclose the quality of the work. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is a more ingratiating interpreter of modern music than Raoul Pugno, and he had the advantage of playing to the accompaniment of the wonderful band from Boston, but even this auspicious combination failed to demonstrate that the concerto in question belongs elsewhere than on the shelf.

J. P. S.

[11]

TRAVELER
TWELVE PAGES
NOVEMBER 27, 1908. ONE CENT.

MRS. LENOM ELOPES WITH A MUSICIAN

Crosses Atlantic with Daniel Maquarre, Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Which Mr. Lenom Is Connected---Husband Will Not Follow Them.

Enamored of one of the more prominent instrumentalists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which her husband was also a player, Mme. C. Lenom is now speeding across the Atlantic ocean to France with Daniel Maquarre, a flute player, who, failing to put in an appearance at the concert by the Longy Club last Monday, eloped with her on the same day.

C. Lenom, an oboe player and also one of the orchestra, was greatly angered at the discovery of the facts, but it is understood that he will make no attempt to follow his wife.

Sailed for Europe on Day When Maquarre Was to Have Played

The first hint at the sensation was given when M. Maquarre did not appear at the Longy Club concert at Potter Hall last Monday night. As the time came for his appearance the conductor of the Longy Club became much perturbed, and later was forced to apologize for the player's failure to appear as advertised.

Previous rumors of the relations between Maquarre and Mme. Lenom had been quietly passed about in a certain exclusive musical circle of the Back Bay and by Tuesday, when it was learned that Mme. Lenom had disappeared, the runaway was at once assumed.

M. Lenom, infuriated and determined to run down the man who had stolen his wife away from him, at once began an investigation and the most reliable information to be obtained, showed that the two had sailed for Europe on the very day of the concert.

Will Not be Pursued.

Mr. Lenom, however, according to the statement made by one of the officers of the Symphony orchestra today, has decided not to pursue Maquarre or his wife. He will remain with the orchestra

The manager of the orchestra declined to talk of the runaway today. When asked if M. Maquarre had been discharged from the orchestra, he said: "Well, he is gone. That is all I care to say of it."

It is believed that there has been ill feeling between Lenom and Maquarre for a long time, and that the elopement was the culmination of the former's suspicions that matters were not as they should be.

Threats to Shoot.

In certain small circles gossip to the effect that Lenom has several times threatened to shoot Maquarre unless he should cease his attentions to Mme. Lenom, has not been uncommon.

Maquarre is one of the most celebrated flute players in this country, and has been billed as a star at many concerts.

Maquarre and M. Lenom are members of the Longy Club, one of the most exclusive musical clubs in Boston.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall the first number was Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, played rather more slowly than the usual tempo, but an eloquent reading, nevertheless. The second number was that marvel of orchestral technique and self conceit, "A Hero's Life," in which Strauss, by quoting from other works of his own, modestly proclaims himself the hero of the piece—a world-hero, he would have us believe, on the same heroic level as Julius Cæsar and Napoleon. There are times in this work when it seems as if musical beauty was sought after (though whether it is found or not is another question) but in most of it there is rather a search for musical ugliness. This search is richly rewarded. At the first hearing of this work it sounded strange—at the second still more strange—and it is now positively ugly—a bogie man to frighten children. Mr. Fiedler played it with great virtuosity—but this only brings out the work's inherent ugliness. The battle scene was full of sound and fury, signifying nothing—unless it be Strauss's egotism.

The Rachmaninoff concerto has been heard before. It is not worth hearing twice even with Mr. Gabrilowitch's splendid playing. If he had devoted his energies to a concerto worth while—his playing might be worth considering.

The last two numbers on the programme were by Sibelius—a spring song, and "Finlandia." Of the former the programme notes say: "It requires no analysis"; nor does it. It is a melodious work of no great length—song-like in character, and tells its own story. The other work, "Finlandia," is a piece which must have made everyone long to hear it again, and very soon. It is full of melody of a strongly individual character—well harmonized and effectively orchestrated. These two works served to make one contented with a programme that had previously caused a growing feeling of discontent. Mr. Fiedler played them with much spirit.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ueber das gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltene, sehr erfolgreiche Konzert der Bostoner unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler und solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Emil Sauer bringen wir im Montagsblatt einen ausführlichen Bericht.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

ldress

ite

Das aus den Herren Professor Willy Heß (Konzertmeister des Boston Symphonie-Orchester), J. von Theodorowicz, Emil Ferir und Alwin Schroeder, dem früheren Cellisten des Kneisel-Quartetts, bestehende Heß-Schroeder-Quartett kündigt für den 14. Januar, 10. Februar und 3. März drei Kammermusik-Abende in Mendelssohn Hall an.

884

he First Established and most Complete ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC - 5 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme Well Played, With Ossip Gabrilowitsch as Piano Artist.

It would be difficult to arrange a better programme, either from a popular or from a musician's point of view, than that which was played, last evening, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, at the second Philharmonic concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It began with the "Moldau" symphonic poem, by Smetana, which was a gentle, picturesque introduction to the majestic "Symphony Pathetique," by Tschaikowsky, and this, in turn, to the romantic and fascinating Concerto No. 2, in C minor, opus 18, by Rachmaninoff, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch at the piano, the concert ending with Wagner's sonorous introduction to "Die Meistersinger." Not only was the programme almost ideal in its construction, but Max Fiedler so wielded his baton that there was not a tiresome note or phrase or sentence from the beginning to the end, which came at nearly 10:30 o'clock, and the evening's event was none too long for the audience.

Rachmaninoff's concerto was composed only seven years ago, and it was first performed in New York at a concert of the Russian Symphony Society, about three years ago, so that it has not become concert worn, even though there should be danger of such a fate. It has the usual three movements and its structure is firm and self-sustaining. It is notable in that the piano score is closely knit with those of the choirs of the accompanying orchestra. The result is a delight to music lovers, but no those who would see the pianist perform wonders in solo effects. Gabrilowitsch, indeed, played as a part of the band; yet there were many passages where he showed fine virtuosity, or, perhaps, the ability of a virtuoso, for there were climaxes in which his nimble fingers ran to the upper notes on the piano in a silvery embroidery, or where, as in the allegro scherzando at the close, he handled double octaves on the lower register, where they sounded a march like that of the beating of surf along shore. The pianist, too, was self-contained, and almost reserved in feeling, showing mastery of his themes and ornamentations, and playing with even delivery throughout. Always a welcome visitor in Brooklyn concerts, Mr. Gabrilowitsch seemed to have strengthened and matured since he was last heard here. His tone is particularly silvery and round and his technique is held in leash for poetic expression. He was called out repeatedly at the close of the concerto, and it was evident that the audience wanted to hear him in solo, but this was not to be.

Smetana's symphonic poem is properly programme music, but if ever there was a piece of this kind whose meaning can be gained without an accompanying letter press, then this is the one. It is descriptive of the rise of a river from its source in wooded hills, its course downward, the scenes and incidents along its banks, with moods of nature, and finally, its broadening into a broad stream where ships may ride. Who could misinterpret the music descriptive of the source, the hunting, the rustic wedding, moonlight and dance of nymphs on shore, the tumbling rapids and the roaring, rushing river? Each phase was a musical picture and in nothing that was played at the concert were the abilities of Mr. Fiedler as a conductor more eloquently displayed. Here, in particular, his was a virile and picturesque baton.

In the Tschaikowsky number, the famed and popular (if so soul-searching and lugubrious a composition can be said to be popular, in the wide sense of the word), "Symphonie Pathetique," opus No. 6, were shown whatever defects Mr. Fiedler has as a conductor. It is a temptation to compare his reading with that of his predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, whose calm and aplomb aided him in giving to this symphony that feeling of the mockery of life that Tschaikowsky put into it. Mr. Fiedler, it seemed, sometimes carried his players to a climax and dropped to so light a delivery that a disappointing effect, suggestive of barrenness of ideas, resulted for the hearer. This was noticed in the first movement, where the haunting theme of eight notes on the strings ends, time and again, to be followed by lighter passages by the wood, wind and reeds. But that is all that can be averred in dispraise of Mr. Fiedler's reading. His vigor sometimes runs away with him.

In the vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger," the musicians were in fine fettle, each choir bringing out clearly Wagner's involved orchestral writing, Mr. Fiedler's baton kneading and molding all into one massive effect.

[112]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE REMARKABLE SINGING OF EMMY DESTINN

A Singing Actress Who Can Carry Her Best Powers Into the Concert Room—The Notable Incidents of the Symphony Orchestra's Concert for Its Pension Fund—Noren and Debussy Again—Mme. Chaminade and Musical Confectionery—Mr. Warfield and Shylock—Other Theatrical News—Mr. Mahler's Rude Beethoven—Miss Farrar Humanizes Michaela in "Carmen"

Two notable concerts and one that was curious and unusual made the music of this town on Saturday and Sunday. The notable concerts were those of the Symphony Orchestra, and on Saturday it had the assistance of Miss Emmy Destinn, as truly distinguished a singer as Boston has heard many a day, and repeated such striking pieces as Noren's new "Variations" and Debussy's "Nocturnes." On Sunday, in a concert of the Pension Fund, some of the best qualities of the orchestra, and in wide range, and some of the best traits of Mr. Fiedler's conducting, were uppermost. The curious and unusual concert was that which Mme. Chaminade, the French composer of parlor music, gave of her own pieces to an exceptional audience in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon. Below follow accounts of all these.

EMMY DESTINN

A Truly Remarkable Dramatic Singer Makes Her First Appearance Here—The Rare Intelligence and the Rare Expressive Power of Her Singing—Other Traits as She Revealed Them

Miss Destinn, as she proved at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and of Saturday, is one of the rare singing actresses who can maintain her powers within the limitations of the concert room. Costume, scenic background, histrionic action, the march of the lyric play, the stimulation of the other lyric players, are not essential to her. In opera she plies the arts of the actress resourcefully and significantly, but she remains primarily a singing actress, who vivifies and individualizes her character and who expresses its traits and emotions by the quality of her tones. Therein are the exalted speech and the peculiar power of the singing actress, and when her mastery of them makes her independent of assisting circumstance she may transfer them almost intact to the concert room. When Miss Destinn sings Senta's ballad in the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" in the opera house, she sits in the homely room of Daland's dwelling; the girls at their spinning are clustered about her; as she looks up her eyes and theirs see the picture of the fate-haunted, fate-driven seaman. Already the first act has shown him in flesh and blood, the phantom captain of a phantom ship, made man again in momentary respite from his doom, and cast ashore to find, if he can, salvation in a woman who will sacrifice herself to free him. The legend, the scenic spectacle, the more potent parts of Wagner's music have wrought atmosphere, suspense, expectancy. Then Senta's ballad discloses her haunted by the legend and possessed by it until she awaits the Dutchman—the woman, alike predestined and self-devoted, who is to release him from his fate. She sings; she ends; the door opens; the Hollander stands before her, and the opera—in spite of the moment of actual self-sacrifice that closes it—touches its climax.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Miss Destinn's audience saw only the familiar stage of Symphony Hall and the familiar orchestra seated upon it. To it came no seeming Senta, but a stoutly built, dark-haired, clear-eyed, mobile-featured and very self-possessed young woman in the dress of the hour. The only preparation for an episode in a lyric drama was a few lines in the programme book; the only expectancy for most of the listeners was of a distinguished singer from the opera houses of New York, London and Berlin. Miss Destinn began the ballad, and from the first it was clear that she had no wish to bear the purely histrionic arts of the singing-actress into the concert-room. She made no play of face or figure or gesture, except as her features reflected the emotional and the communicating intensity within her and her body vibrated to it. By her tones, she wrought the vision that haunted Senta—the black sea, the blood-red ship, the ghostly captain on its deck, the storm that ever drives. In her tones the listeners heard the curse that had fallen upon him and heard no less the promise of redemption. Wagner has shaped the ballad with his instinctive aptitude for significant musical and dramatic contrast. The grim picture of the Hollander's fate, and the roaring promise of salvation alternate tellingly. Comes the strophe that tells of his quest of the woman; comes the ecstatic close in which Senta vows herself as his savior. And the voice of Miss Destinn had seemed the voice of this Senta; the visions that were more real than reality to the girl had come and gone in the singer's tones; the promise had mounted in them; the vow had risen in passion of original devotion. Miss Destinn had accomplished these things not merely because she has the characterizing power of the singing actress, not merely because hers are an imagination and a temperament that respond to emotions and transmit them, but because she is a mistress of singing as a vital, communicating, exalted speech. The distinguishing traits of her tones are their sensitiveness to what they would impart and their vitality of impartment, while that sensitiveness is the finer and that vitality the fuller, because she sings with ample knowledge and sure [illegible] a remarkable voice, as Mme. Melba's or Mr. Caruso's, is a remarkable voice. It has its tendency to turn a little sharp. Her artistry in song is not an elation in itself like Mr. Bonci's or Mme. Sembrich's. Its communicating and characterizing quality does not cover a multitude of sins, as it does in Miss Garden's. Rather, the distinction of Miss Destinn, as of Mr. Renaud, is the union in her singing and to mutual service of the fine art of song and of its qualities as an exalted and significant emotional speech.

Senta's ballad is ingeniously contrived, and it was not the least virtue of Miss Destinn's singing of it that her listeners took no thought of Wagner's contrivance. When, later in the concert, she passed to three of Schubert's songs—"The Guide Post," "The Erl-King" and "Gretchen Spinning"—there was no such deliberate artifice to aid. Schubert was too single-minded, too simple-minded, too untheatrical for the effects that are only the more such because Wagner made them with strokes of genius. She was shorn, too, of the aid of the orchestra. In its stead were only the galloping triplets of accompaniment of "The Erl-King," the spinning figure in the piano part of the lament of Gretchen and the dim tonal-coloring of the voice of the piano in the wayfarer's song. Here, too, the singer was more circumscribed. If she were really to sing the songs, she must respect their melodic contour, obey their obvious phrasing, heed narrowly their rhythmic accent and yet within these bounds establish—and in little space of time—their atmosphere, draw and color the picture, vitalize and impart the mood and the emotions that had summoned the one and shaped and tinted the other. Above all, she must be continent. "The Erl-King" is a lyrical narrative and the singer is the narrator. It is not a little lyrical drama with three parts. The song of Gretchen is a picture of the girl seen, the echo of her sad thoughts, and not her frantic speech. "The Guide Post" is the wan musing of the haunted wayfarer, not his passionate declaration about himself.

It was clear token of the intellectual, the discriminating qualities that underlie and shape most truly distinguished singing that Miss Destinn conceived and imparted the three songs with this continent perception of their particular quality. It was no less proof of her musical understanding and of her knowledge of the art of song that she was obedient to every one of their purely musical requirements. In fact this justice to their true nature and demands made her expression of their emotional and pictorial content the more vivid and potent. The voice of remembered rapture—of its ecstasy and of its blankness—sang the song of Gretchen. The voice of a narrator conjuring figures out of the mist in which the pass, catching the echoes of their voices, told the tale of "The Erl-King." Despair crept phrase by phrase through the iteration of "The Guide Post." And in this imparting of the songs as a whole were details that flashed or wrenched—the passion that thrilled and faded on the instant at the kiss of Gretchen's memory; the wild yearning of the ceaseless quest at the "suche Ruh'" of the song of the guide-post; the childlike quality, the insinuating sweetness of the Erl-King's enticements. No; the lamentations of the song do not enchain the arts of the singing-actress. They only stimulate them to more adroit perception and to finer accomplishment. Miss Destinn, of the new school through and through and not the least of the glories, is proof.

H. T. P.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Orchestra at Contrasting Bests in a Fragment of "Goetterdammerung" and in Tschaikovski's Ballet Music—The Other Numbers—Mr. Fiedler's Conducting

It was a pity that the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night for the profit of its Pension Fund won so scanty an audience—the smallest in three years for such an occasion. Those who fear that the orchestra may of late have declined a little in its preëminent and its distinctive qualities might have had their alarms allayed, and those who question some of the traits of Mr. Fiedler's conducting might oftenest have had the pleasure of those qualities in it that are less open to reserve or debate. One of the items of the programme was the heroic intermezzo, so to say, between the prologues and the first act of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" that carries Siegfried from Brünnhilde's rock along the Rhine to Gunther's hall. It is trumpet-tongued music, wrought with magnificent tonal eloquence out of glowing wealth of orchestral resources; it is vital with rich and puissant melody; it quivers with its passion of imagination, suggestion and delineation. It is the voice of the heroic youth of a young and heroic world. So forth fares a hero to the adventures that seal his prowess; so he parts from his Valkyr's side in the glow of his passion for her; so the Rhine bears him upon its broad, deep stream, echoing with the song of its daughters; so dreams the hero as he plies his oar; so comes he in joyous clamor, hot for high adventure to Gunther's warlike hall. The performance matched the music, and where the conductor and the men began the coldest listener might not say. And there could have been few cold under the glowing magnificence of the tone of the orchestra, changing from golden depth to silvery brightness, and half a hundred tints between, under the sweep of this instrumental eloquence and under the heroic accent with which the conductor animated it and the broad amplitude of power with which he clothed it. The splendor of passionate and sustained and fiery utterance of which our orchestra is capable was near its fullest and highest.

Then, in the set of dances from Tschaikovski's ballet, "The Nut Cracker," the band disclosed no less rare and finely contrasting aptitudes. Here, as the music asked, was a perfect lightness and brightness of tone, of a lovely euphony and [illegible] rhythm as though it were at play with them, touching adroitly the lightest graces of harmony and accent, making the dances a changeful fabric of changeful fancies that it wove with the lightest of fingers. The sugar-plum fairy tiptoed to her celesta; the trépak bustled gayly; the Arab dance rustled languorously to its own echo; the Chinese danced, shrilled and teetered; the waltz swayed on the soft horns to the accenting violins. Little flats of virtuosity went as the routine of the movement; little graces of tonal coloring melted one into the other. The felicity of the performance was like to the fancy of the music. And Mr. Fiedler, as he has already shown in his dances from Grétry a month ago, has the alertness to rhythm and to pace that is its spirit and its life.

Mr. Fiedler shines no less in rhetorical music, in music of the large flourish. He likes the florid, the emphatic. He had it on Sunday in Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes" and on Saturday in Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," Lamartine's verses that stirred Liszt to composition sound with grandiloquent rhetoric. The music is no less sonorous of it. Both have the large, vague voice through which romance trumpeted fifty years and more ago. She was a florid muse in those days; she loved showy trappings; and speech was becomingly effusive. Weber in an earlier generation worshipped her no less than Liszt. Nowadays his music must be made to sound to the utmost—emphatically, ornately, sweeping from flourish to flourish. Else does the listener say this is but a coda, this is but a transition, this is but a rhetorical contrast. Now Mr. Fiedler loves sonority, the rhetorical pause, the ample contrast. He warms to big-voiced music. Thus he gave Weber's overture its romantic whirl and gesture, and clothed Liszt's tone-poem in resounding and laborious pomp. He made each speak with its sonorous voice until the listener had his joy of the sound and cared not for the substance. A conductor may not so "rush" Tschaikovski in the variations and the polacca of yesterday and over-emphasis blurred and smeared the very eloquence that Mr. Fiedler sought. No more will such traits gain the soft, suffused beauty of "The Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," that stood likewise on the programme of last night. It is music of April lights, of May softness, of tranquil gladness of heart. For Mr. Fiedler it was as sultry as [illegible]

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1908.

SOCIETY

Symphony Rehearsal Attracts Many

Emmy Destinn of New York Gives Satisfaction as Soloist.

Society showed up loyally at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday, and latecomers displayed remarkable patience while waiting 35 minutes in the corridor during the rendition of the Moren "Kaleidoscope"—new in Boston. Emmy Destinn of the New York Metropolitan Opera House was soloist and won favor at once. She looked well, too, in a diaphanous gown of mauve crepe.

In the throng I saw Mrs. Cabot Morse, Mrs. George Lee, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mrs. Horatio Lamb, Mrs. T. James Bowker and sister, Amy Lowell, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and sister, Miss Helen Burrall MacNichol, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, Mrs. Kate Stevens Bingham, Mrs. Robert C. McQuillen, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Stockton, Miss Manning, Alice Stackpole, the Misses Juliet and Barbara Higginson, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Mrs. William Ames, Miss Bowditch, Mary Vaughan, Cornelia Wolcott, Miss Batchelder, Joe Chipman, Louis Elson, Mrs. Wirt Dexter, with Mme. Despradelles, Mrs. Nathan Matthews and daughter, Mrs. H. Staples Potter, Grace Edwards, Mrs. Leslie Wead, Mrs. James Jac[illegible], Mrs. W. P. Fay, Mrs. Benyc[illegible]not Hubbard, Mrs. Walter Scot[illegible] and Mrs. Jealous.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 13, 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Emmy Destinn, Soloist at the Symphony.

Interesting Concert Tonight for the Pension Fund.

Mr Perabo's Recital—Other Events of the Week.

The eighth Symphony program was unusually varied in character, for there were two "first-time" pieces. Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan opera forces made her local debut as soloist, five composers were represented, short works were in the majority and there was a chorus of female voices from the New England conservatory of music to sing the "Siren" music in Debussy's nocturne. His nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivities," were also on the program. Miss Destinn sang Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and a group of Schubert's songs. The concert opened with Noren's "Kaleidoscope," which is made up of a dozen parts, and closed with the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz."

Miss Destinn, who recently made her debut in New York in D'Albert's opera, "Tiefland," has a voice of splendid volume, its timbre is excellent through all registers, though a trifle pinched in the higher range; but rich and resonant and admirably suited for dramatic expression, the melodic quality not being marred by fortissimo work. An almost perfect control enables the artist to voice different sentiments with seeming ease and there are no moments of monotomy in her singing.

The familiar ballad by Senta was sung with a fervor and tenderness that indicated Miss Destinn's success in the role of the heroine of the opera, and in and three songs by Schubert the artist displayed a high degree of artistry by her skill in contrasting the different moods of the composed. "The Erl King" was possibly over-accentuated in expression, but it was declaimed with a fine effect perfectly satisfactory to the audience. Miss Destinn was generously applauded. Mr Fiedler again proved his skill as an accompanist and played the piano parts for the Schubert songs.

The variations and theme by Noren, entitled "Kaleidoscope," show a modern composer who fairly juggles with orchestral resources, for in the dozen parts forming the work he introduces musical and nonmusical combinations of many degrees of difficulty, not only in performance, but in comprehension. Originality there is in pleasing evidence, and the melodic moments are not wanting, but the average ear is not attuned to all the vagaries of Noren's score. The enjoyment of the piece arose more from the skill in ensemble work shown by the orchestra than from the quality of the puzzling composition.

Another modern, Debussy, figured on the program in his nocturnes, "Clouds," "Festivities" and "Sirens," ideals fanciful in orchestration suggesting tone pictures of the titles. Scored in a masterly manner, their effect is not to be denied, though many of the modulations and some of the strange commingling of instruments certainly sound harsh even in this age of musical progress. The young women voiced the "Siren" music in commendable harmony and the orchestra performed its part in the group in the usual efficient manner. And Mr Fiedler read the "Der Freischutz" music discreetly and without any suggestion of undue vigor.

Joseph Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, will be the soloist this week, playing Rubinstein's fifth concerto. The other numbers will be Haydn's B-flat major symphony, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the "Flying Dutchman" overture.

Pension Fund Concert.

Once more tonight the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra appeal to the generosity of their patrons by giving a concert in aid of the pension fund which has been in existence 10 years. It is gradually approaching the size needed for its work. Payments of pensions began this fall and already 13 former members are enjoying a snug little income from it. Practically, the sole resources of the pension fund are the annual dues of the members of the orchestra and the receipts from the two concerts which are given each year.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Continued from Page 39.

For the first 10 years every cent which came in was invested as principal, for the are no costs of administration. Some gifts to the fund have been made by friends of the orchestra, and these have been added to the principal. As a result the pensions, that now must be paid, come out of the income of the fund, but as years go on the obligations will naturally increase and it will be necessary to add very considerably to the principal in order to meet them.

The friends of the orchestra have been exceedingly loyal, and its fund concerts have nearly always drawn audiences which tax the capacity of Symphony hall. Mr Gericke was really the originator of the idea of forming this fund, and he always took a vital interest in it. No less interest did Dr Muck take, and Mr Fiedler, in turn, has shown keen interest, for he realizes that it is one of the several factors which enable the management to keep the membership practically unchanged from year to year.

There will be no soloist this evening. The selections are as follows: "Les Preludes," symphonic poem by Liszt; "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Dusk of the Gods," Wagner; "Nut-Cracker" suite, theme and variations from suite No. 3, and "1812" overture, Tschaikowsky.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY.
DECEMBER 12, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Another Programme of Notable Music—Noren's "Kaleidoscope" for the First Time and Debussy's "Nocturnes" to New Hearing—Miss Destinn and Her Singing—Miss Duncan Dances Again—Musical News

Mr. Fiedler likes a programme that assembles striking pieces each in its kind. He likes no less to have the contrasts between them keen and clear. He is fain to make each concert as exciting as he may, and yesterday in all three respects he succeeded to admiration. The three orchestral numbers were Noren's new variations, "The Kaleidoscope," for large invention, imagination and utterance, and for a kind of solid brilliance that was truly German; Debussy's "Nocturnes" for endless subtlety, delicacy and felicity of rare idea and rare expression, and Weber's overture to his opera "Der Freischütz" for what much repetition has almost turned into passionate commonplace. Between these orchestral pieces, Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan appearing here for the first time sang Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and three familiar songs—"The Guide Post," "Gretchen Spinning" and "The Erl-King"—from Schubert as a dramatic singer of warm and sensitive understanding and of vital and communicating tones may sing them. Moreover, in the third of Debussy's "Nocturnes" a choir of thirty-two of the advanced pupils of the New England Conservatory sang the wordless song of the sirens. Mr. Chadwick himself had trained them in the difficult music and not only to its exacting demands of accuracy but to the quality of tone that it asks. From beginning to end, thus the music and the performance made as remarkable a concert as that of a fortnight ago.

Noren's Variations are cause for wonder at his long obscurity. At least twenty years of his working life he has spent as a teacher of music and as a composer of minor pieces. Then suddenly he has emerged with the unusual, the striking, the highly individual "Kaleidoscope," and fortuitous litigation over it proved another stroke of kindly fate. A theme and variations, with a fugue or a double fugue for ending, are one of the most prosaic and academic forms of absolute music. Two centuries of composers have worried and sterilized the form, even as they have the themes that they chose for their exercise in it. The more therefore does it tempt some composers of a third century, who set the expressive and the delineative quality of their music above all else. Strauss, to cite an extreme example, wrought his tonal characterization of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza and his panorama of tone-pictures of their adventures into the form of a theme and variations, and made the music marvellously graphic. He subdued the chosen form, as his wont is, to the purposes he had in hand, or, more truly, he made the form assert and emphasize those purposes. Reger in his turn would vitalize the form by the energy, the fertility, the nervousness of his expression within the limits of music that has no other end than its own significant qualities.

Now Noren, even though "The Kaleidoscope" may prove only a remarkable tour de force, takes his place between Strauss and Reger in this modernizing of an academic form. He has devised eleven variations upon his theme; or more probably he designed the scheme of the eleven and then sought long for the theme that would breed them. Each variation has its individuality of mood and suggestion. Each he would have persuasively atmospheric. A title gives the clew—"In the Cathedral," "A Funeral March," "From Olden Days," "Humor" and so forth to a Mazurka, a Slav Dance or such a purely musical title as Canon. The clew is more than sufficient hint. The music in every variation achieves the suggestion that the composer would impart and leads the hearer into its mood and atmosphere. Various indeed are these suggestions, but Noren accomplishes each with almost equal pregnancy and skill. And he gains all this by wholly unforced and unobtrusive means. His variations spring readily from his chosen theme; each is admirably lucid in itself and its relation to the generating melody. He develops each with no less admirable fertility of invention and deference for form. His harmonies, his instrumentation, his every means to give color to his music are as resourceful and as adept. He ends with a double fugue that the Strauss of the "Domestica" might envy and that Reger might applaud. And while Noren is racing through it, while he is piling climax upon climax, the music is as vivid of the suggestion he would have it carry. Out of "Heldenleben" come the voices of the "adversaries" of progress in music, the carpers and the mockers. They buzz about Noren's theme, and then it beats them down in as glorious a tonal fight as a fugue has brought in many a day. It is the symbol of the progress and the victory of "The Kaleidoscope."

Then followed, after the passionate intermezzo of Miss Destinn's singing, the strange beauty and the strange suggestion of Debussy's "Nocturnes." Noren's music is wholly normal. It is one of its virtues that by such normal means it gains so unusual ends. Debussy's means, even after many repetitions in other pieces, even after the analysts have shown in these particular "Nocturnes" that the music has a true and characteristic form, still seem rare, uncannily subtle, wholly individual. They perfectly accomplish their purpose. Not even the music of "Pelléas and Mélisande" works its will more surely, or more intimately fuses matter and manner, the things to be expressed and the expression of them. The first "Nocturne" of "The Clouds" is, beside much of Debussy's music, tangible tone-picturing, and it is not merely by harmonic suggestion, by the association and disassociation of instrumental voices, by a development that seems to run all in tonal filament that Debussy paints his picture. His is the thought that summons the image when he gives that thought voice and life in tones as the thought of the poet, alive in his words, summons the image as his poetry seeks. The sky and the passing clouds do rise in vision out of the tones and in a vision of the poet's eye. No less persuasive is the pictorial and the atmospheric quality of the third "Nocturne" of "The Sirens." Out of the night and the stillness comes the song, distant, nearing, beguiling, holding—a song to pursue and never find. Below the voices, in the orchestra, is the glimmering, curling sea, bearing the song, catching it into itself, setting it free again. And the song and the background are as one. Between is the Nocturne that Debussy calls "Fetes," the dance, the pageant of the dazzling lights, the whirling atoms of his radiant vision. The music is as dazzling as they.

H.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY
DECEMBER 12, 1908

PLAYING FOR ITSELF

The Pension Fund Concert of the Symphony Orchestra

Once more, tomorrow evening, the men of the Symphony Orchestra are bidding the public of its concerts and the general public as well to one of the two occasions of the musical year when neither conductor nor managers but the players themselves summon the audience. The Pension Fund of the orchestra belongs to the men in other senses than in their income, in old age and retirement, from it. Their dues help to increase it; they administer its affairs; and they practically organize the two concerts that annually swell it. Already, too, the fund is fulfilling its purpose. For ten years the capital gradually increased until the income from it was sufficient for the payment of pensions. Now thirteen men, who earned their right to them by their service in the orchestra, receive them. With the years the number of retiring players will increase; the payments for pensions will mount accordingly, and if the principal of the fund is to remain untouched it must rise in like proportion. The men pay dues to the fund; there have been occasional gifts to it; but the larger part of it has come, and still comes, from the return of the two concerts in its behalf.

In the past, and again this winter, these concerts have appealed to three publics. One is the regular public of the Symphony Concerts that seizes the opportunity thus to make return to the men for all that they do weekly for its pleasure and for the prestige of the orchestra. Esprit de corps that binds players, conductor and audience together—the spirit that has done much to make the Symphony Concerts what they are—will send this part of the audience to Symphony Hall on Sunday night. A second public comes from those who do not subscribe to the Symphony Concerts, but who would hear the orchestra once or twice each year and hear it in striking pieces. Tomorrow night, it will have, besides, a new conductor to whet its appetite, and Mr. Fiedler will be making his first appearance to this miscellaneous public. Remains a third element whom the particular programme particularly attracts. Wagner and Tschaikovski please it most, and from the two composers much of the music chosen for the concert of Sunday comes: From Wagner, the "Good Friday Spell" in "Parsifal," and Siegfried's journey in the first act of "Götterdämmerung"; from Tschaikovski, the "Nut-Cracker" suite of ballet music and the theme and variations of the third orchestral suite—both of the brilliant and racy Tschaikovski—and the "1812" overture with the composer turned clamorous and sonorous. Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes," adds yet another sort of romantic music.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
SATURDAY MORNING,
DECEMBER 12, 1908

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME LONG, BUT ABSORBING

DIFFERENT SCHOOLS WELL REPRESENTED

Noren, Wagner, Debussy, Schubert and Weber—The Best Concert of the Season Thus Far.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Noren—"Kaleidoscope." Orchestral Variations.
Wagner—Senta's Ballad, from "The Flying Dutchman."
Soloist, Miss Emmy Destinn.
Debussy—Three Nocturnes for Orchestra and Female Chorus.
Schubert—Three Lieder.
Miss Destinn.
Weber—"Freischutz" overture.

A modern bill of fare, on the whole, but well contrasted, the best concert of the season thus far. A brilliant, if rather long, set of variations, then Wagner melody (and they say that Wagner had no melody in him!), then the most radical of Frenchmen, but in his shorter and least mystifying mood, and finally some German vocal and orchestral tunes as a benediction.

Noren is a new name in the orchestral field, but he is evidently to take rank with the modern giant colorists.

These variations have received an odd advertisement through the law courts. In the 11th variation, Noren, wishing to show his reverence for Richard Strauss, introduced two of the themes from "Heldenleben" into his work. Modern composers may be heroes to themselves, but it is dangerous for outsiders to give them hero-worship, and suddenly Noren was haled into court for pilfering copyrighted goods. Fortunately the court decided that they were "not melodies" (they seldom are with R. Strauss, Esq.) and the variations were allowed to continue their public career.

All the way from Beethoven to Reger the variationist falls in love with his own subject and does not know when to stop. These variations by Noren consume three-quarters of an hour; but they are so magnificently scored and contain so many contrasts that they do not pall on the auditor. The score, of course, is tremendous; everything down to Xylophone is employed, and the work forms a great study of orchestral scoring. There is originality of treatment even from the first measures, which are for snare drum, solo, as bold an effect as Liszt's triangle solo in his E flat concerto. There is much employment of the wood-wind in deep register, a la Tschaikowski. The variation "In the Cathedral" is earnest and organ-like.

In the sixth variation the English horn (always the representative of the shepherd's pipe) is prominent in pastoral work. The seventh is a funeral march, not sad, but lofty and resolute. This again is contrasted with a most rollicking movement, (the eighth variation), a Slavonic dance. In the ninth variation there is as much division of strings as in Wagner's "Waldweben" itself. A Mazurka immediately affords a foil to this pensive movement.

It is possible that in using Strauss themes in the 11th variation Noren was but giving a challenge and endeavoring to show that he also could swing the modern orchestra and culminate with double fugue work a la "Sinfonia Domestica." The fugue, however, does not equal the orchestral one by Reger, with which Dr. Muck made us all sit up, last season. There is, however, every device and treatment present. It must have been horribly difficult to make and eke to play.

Of course, in this work there is development as well as strict variation. There is much additional matter besides the theme itself, but this theme is very striking and well-suited for variation, as it is easily recognized through its metamorphoses.

The performance was a great triumph for our orchestra, and for its painstaking conductor. If any one has believed that there is any retrogression in our band he should watch them travel through this tonal jungle. It was an entire victory of technique over almost superhuman difficulties.

This kind of composition is a "metier" today. Where, a century ago, there was but one Beethoven in orchestral work, and at a later epoch but a pair of geniuses in tone-coloring—Berlioz and Wagner—nowadays there are several who have learned the trick: Strauss, Mahler, Reger, "ed id genus omne."

Miss Emmy Destinn won a great success with her Wagnerian selection. One might have thought that she would have chosen Brahms for her Boston debut, for he composed "The Song of Destinny." Nevertheless we were quite content to hear the graphic ballad of the Dutchman who sailed about as aimlessly as his countrymen are now doing along the coast of Venezuela. Miss Destinn sang the Senta ballad with breadth and purity. She evidently understands her Wagner. She well deserved the many recalls she received.

The Schubert "Lieder" were "Der Wegweiser," "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "Der Erl-konig." Mr. Fiedler was at the piano and showed himself the most discreet of accompanists. We had heard "Der Wegweiser" only a few days before, given by Dr. Wuellner, and we consider its color far more suited to male than to female voice. Miss Destinn, however, gave it with much dramatic force and gloom. It fits to the Christmas season about as well as a pair of overalls at an evening reception. In all three of the Schubert songs Miss Destinn proved herself not only a good vocalist, but a true musician, and her German was excellently enunciated.

What Debussy can do with female chorus he proved long ago in his setting of "The Blessed Damosel." He was present... his most favorable light with the ... short works chosen by Mr. Fiedler. ... were entitled "Clouds," "Festivities" ... "Sirens." Of these the last employed ... female chorus and was much the ... work. It was interesting to note the ... trast of style between the French and ... German moderns. Where Noren wov... Turkish rug Debussy spun a gossamer ... The picture of the Sirens was a most ... tractive one. The female chorus was m... up of vocalists from the New Engl... Conservatory of Music, and it augurs ... for the future of the Boston Opera Co... pany that this institution can furnish s... excellent material. The number was s... with both surety and grace, and the ent... marine picture was far more worthy th... the sea of pasteboard and lead that D... bussy once furnished us.

The singers had no words to give in t... composition, their part being a pure ... calise. Perhaps Debussy's thoughts we... too deep for words. But if the "Siren... was a very interesting and poetic wor... we may add that the purely instrument... nocturnes were less so, the "Clouds" esp... cially being rather thin, and scarcely su... gesting an umbrella.

Weber's overture was a conservative a... tuneful end to the concert. In the prece... ing programme-book the overture to "D... Freischutz" had been promised, but in th... week's list the huntsman was given bac... his sex and no riflewoman was present.

Weber is not always given full cred... for his innovation in the overture form... Only a year ago we read in a New Yor... review that his overtures were in th... "medley" form. This is a popular mis... take. He followed the "medley" idea in... taking his overture themes from the opera... itself, but he developed them in the styl... and general shape of the "Classical" over... ture, a combination of the popular and th... learned that had not previously existe... in overture form.

Mr. Fiedler did not exaggerate the read... ing, as some are prone to do. The hor... quartette was slow, but not dragging, a... served to remind that Weber was ... greatest horn composer of his time, an... epoch when only the "natural" horn (an... instrument without keys and giving n... complete scale) was used. This quarte... was therefore originally "pieced out" b... two pairs of horns, in two different pitches... —F and C. Great effects are produced i... the work by very simple means. The piz... zicato "A" on the contrabass, that fol... lows the horn quartette, is as portentous... as any anxiety that any modern music... wholesaler has ever achieved.

The delirium of joy of the finale also... a touch somewhat akin to the frenzie... ecstasy that Beethoven loved to pictur... and it was given with appropriate aban... don.

Altogether then, although the concert... lasted two hours, it was so varied that... the interest never flagged, and the last... number was by no means the least. Mr... Fiedler has reason to be proud of the re... sults he achieved and few auditors can... understand the amount of work for con... ductor and orchestra in preparing so ... liant a programme.

HERALD—
DECEMBER 13.

Pension Fund Concert.

Once more tonight the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra appeal to the generosity of their patrons by giving a concert in aid of their pension fund. The fund has been in existence now just 10 years, and, thanks to the good judgment that is used in its administration, it is gradually approaching the size needed for its work. Payments of pensions began this fall and already 13 former members are enjoying an income from it. As is generally known, practically the sole resources of the pension fund are the annual dues of the members of the orchestra and the receipts from the two concerts which are given each year. For the first 10 years every cent which came in was invested as principal, for there are no costs of administration. Some gifts to the fund have been made by friends of the orchestra. The pensions that now must be paid come out of the income of the fund, but as years go on the obligations will increase, and it will be necessary to add considerably to the principal in order to meet them.

These concerts are attended by the regular patrons of the Symphony orchestra, and they provide the only opportunities of the year for those who are not regular patrons to hear the full orchestra.

The program of tonight's concert is given under "Concerts of the Week."

[114]

SUNDAY POST.

DECEMBER 13, 1908

MODERN MUSIC

Modern music and a modern singer came before us at the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert of the season. Noren's amazing "Kaleidoscope" variations and Debussy's Nocturnes, the unique expression of universal and all-pervading beauty, offered apt illustration of two very different tendencies of today. Miss Emmy Destinn, who sang, is a modern singer in the highest sense of the word.

Noren's work 10 years ago might have appeared epoch making. Was it Emerson who likened our William Shakspere to a magician who would hang out signs to the affect and that in the evening there would be an exhibition of the stars and planets in the Town Hall? Noren is surely a man of unusual mentality. In listening to these remarkable variations we experience the same sensation of mental freedom and exhilaration that would result in conversation with a broadly educated, broadly thinking man of the world. There is always the consciousness of resource and fertility of thought; there is rarely a measure which lacks vitality or significance. Some of the variations, as the first, are positively witty, and executed with a lightness of touch that is rare in a composer of the German school. There is such adequate and conscious fulfilment of the author's thought. The whole thing in fact, is too clever and conscious. The soothing melancholy of the second variation, the rather ironic fourth, with its humorous use of the xylophone, the impressive fifth, "Im Dom" (In the cathedral), the funeral march which is very effective but never impressive or soul-stirring, the electric Slav dance, which makes the eighth variation—you cannot lay finger on a weak or a dull movement, unless it be the third, which to our taste, smells too much of Munich. There is poetry in the broadly developed ninth, "From Far-off Days." It is all tremendously interesting. The grandest pages are the culminating of the colossal fugue, when the composer, with the aid of the two much litigated themes from Strauss' "Heldenleben," builds up a towering structure of heaven-storming tone. And yet—you remember that imposing architectonics are possible by means of sonorous counterpoint, and that Max Reger, for instance, did this thing, and did it with more greatness in the finale of his variations and fugue which we heard for the first time last season.

There is nothing new, perhaps, under the sun, but there is yet a great deal to be discovered by the present and future generations, and the day of miracles is not past. "'Clouds'; the unchanegable appearance of the sky, with the slow march and solemn march of clouds dissolving in a gray agony tinted with white. 'Festivals': movement, rythm dancing in the atmosphere, with bursts of brusque light. The episode of a procession (a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision) passing through the festival and blended with it, luminous dust participating in the universal rhythm of all things. 'Sirens': the sea and its innumerable rhythm; then amid the billows silvered by the moon the mysterious song of the Sirens is heard; it laughs and passes." We are not prepared to assert that these Nocturnes are the highest expression of Debussy's genius, but here is rapturous, vision-haunted music by a composer who will seek out the secret of beauty eternal for himself, and who on the way supplies a needed foil against the complexity and literalism practiced by the other wing of contemporaneous music-makers.

Miss Destinn's voice is brilliant rather than luscious in quality, but she can color it and express deep emotion. For once the auditor thought first of the great poetry and its enhancing music, next of the voice, and not at all of the singer, save as her strong personality stood back of, and lent magnetism to, her engrossing performance. It was a rare pleasure that Miss Destinn afforded us.

HERALD—MONDAY

DECEMBER 14, 1908

Music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of the season in aid of its pension fund last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. The program was as follows:

Liszt, "The Preludes"; Wagner, "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"; "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Dusk of the Gods"; Tschaikowsky, "Nutcracker" suite, Theme with Variations and Polacca from Suite, No. 3, op. 55, overture "1812."

The cause for which the concert was given and the nature of the program should have drawn a much larger audience. Some may say that there should have been a soloist, an admired prima donna or a formidable pianist; but at whatever concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra a virtuoso assists, however famous he or she may be, the orchestra, after all, is the dominating soloist, the true virtuoso. It might be reasonably supposed that any opportunity of hearing this superb orchestra would fill the hall to overflowing.

All the compositions played, with one exception, were familiar to almost any concert goer. This exception was the "Nutcracker" suite of Tschaikowsky, which has been played, I believe, at the "Pops." The music deserves an honorable position in symphony concerts. In 1891 Tschaikowsky worked on an opera, "Iolanthe," and a ballet, "Nutcracker." He had been requested to compose the two for the Imperial Opera House at St. Petersburg. The subjects were given to him. The scenario of the ballet was based on Dumas' version of E. T. A. Hoffmann's well known tale. Tschaikowsky was at first not at all pleased with the subject, but he gradually became reconciled to it. In Paris he had discovered the existence of an instrument called the celesta, and he wrote his publisher to buy one for him, that he might use it in this ballet. He felt the joy of a child hearing this instrument, and he told his publisher, who, mirabile dictu! was also his friend, that the celesta would cost only 1200 francs. But Jurgensen was sworn to secrecy. What if Rimsky-Korsakoff or Glazounoff should find out about the celesta, and use it before the ballet were competed!

Tschaikowsky, writing the ballet music, was at times discouraged. He told Davidoff, the 'cellist, that he was wearing out, that his talent was going with his hair, his teeth, his feet; but it was the habit of Tschaikowsky to complain of his music before it was performed. The suite was played first—at a concert in St. Petersburg March 19, 1892, and nearly all the movements were repeated. The ballet was first performed with "Iolanthe" at the opera house Dec. 17 of the same year. Neither work was at first successful; the libretto, the story of King Rene's daughter, was found dull; the ballet, on account of the sickness of Petipa, the ballet master, was poorly arranged, and the music was too delicate for ears accustomed to ordinary ballet music.

They who do not know the "Nutcracker" suite are not fully acquainted with Tschaikowsky's genius. This music is charming by reason of its tunefulness, piquancy, euphony, fancy. The various dances are sharply contrasted, and it would be hard to say which one of them is the most delightful. There is more originality, more character, more poetic thought in this little suite than in many symphonies and symphonic poems made in Germany, analyzed laboriously and with awe by commentators, and classed among "important works."

The performance of the orchestra last night was often brilliant, and Mr. Fiedler and the players were applauded heartily by those who were fortunate enough to be present.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SUNDAY HERALD—

BOSTON, DECEMBER 13, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES 8TH CONCERT

Miss Emmy Destinn of Berlin Royal Opera House Sings Here for First Time.

DEBUSSY'S NOCTURNES ARE IMPRESSIONISTIC

Noren's 'Kaleidoscope' Played in Varied Program After Years of Repression.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducter, gave its eighth concert last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Emmy Destinn of the Berlin Royal Opera House and the Metropolitan Opera House sang here for the first time. The program was as follows:

"Kaleidoscope"; Theme and Variations. Noren
Senta's Ballad.....Wagner
Three Nocturnes.....Debussy
Three songs: "The Sign Post," "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel," "Erlking".....Schubert Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber

Noren was unknown in the musical world save as a composer of small pieces until last year, when this "Kaleidoscope: Original Theme and Variations," was performed at a festival of the Allgemiener Deutscher Verein at Dresden and there made a sensation. The composer was then about 44 years old.

Hazlitt once alluded in a tavern to a famous passage in "Grammont's Memoirs": how the Duke of York wooed Miss Churchill, but cooled, owing, it was said, to her having a thin, pale face. "One day, as they were riding out hunting together, she fell from her horse, and was taken up almost lifeless. The whole assembled court were thrown by this event into admiration that such a body should belong to such a face (so transcendant a pattern was she of the female form), and the duke was fixed. * * * I said I could conceive of nothing finer than the idea of a young person in her situation, who was the object of indifference or scorn from outward appearance, with the proud suppressed consciousness of a goddess-like symmetry, locked up by 'fear and niceness,' the handmaids of all women,' from the wonder and worship of mankind."

So with Noren. He had been for years a pedagogue, a director of a music school in Crefeld, a teacher in Berlin. This "Kaleidscope," begun about 1904, was laid aside because Noren was obliged to support himself by teaching, and it was not completed until early in 1907. Correcting the exercises of dull pupils, weary in routine, hearing the works of other composers applauded, knowing that he, too, had musical thought, conscious that there was something in him which would excite admiration, he was obliged to wait for the opportunity to display his talent.

Noren is not wholly a Miss Churchill. His revelation is not so overpowering. Yet this "Kaleidoscope" is one of the most interesting compositions that have come to us of late years from other Germans than Richard Strauss. Two of the variations were omitted last night—the scherzo and pastorale—probably on account of the length of the program; but the composition was long enough without them.

Noren has both contrapuntal and orchestral technic; he also has fancy, but I do not find imagination in any section of this work. His "Cathedral" is sonorous and impressive. There is the thought of the organ, the choir, the solemn scene in the sacred building, but the music is pictorial; it has no spiritual uplift. The first two variations have true character and the "Canon" is ingenious.

The Mazurka is pleasingly vulgar, spirited, intoxicating, if you will, but inherently vulgar. The Funeral March is an agreeable surprise, for in it there is no luxury of woe, no snivelling, no threadbare crape and tears, but a heroic farewell, and the lamentation is neither familiar nor perfunctory. There are fine passages in the Fantasia and Double Fuge inscribed to Strauss, in which by taking themes from the latter's "Eeldenleben" Norden was prevented from publishing his work until the court decided that, as Strauss' two motives were not melodies, there had been no plagiarism. Another case of a Daniel come to judgment. But the Fugue itself has not the rush, the spontaneity of Reger's fugue in the variations on Hiller's theme. The pedagogue is here seen, rather than the thinker, who happens to use a fugue as the best medium for a particular thought. Still, the final trampling under foot of the motive that stands for Strauss' enemies is admirably depicted. All in all, an interesting work.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" were first played here at a Chickering "production" concert, led by Mr. Lang, in February, 1904. As Norden's "Kaleidoscope" is material of the earth, earthy, the Nocturnes are music that is purely impressionistic. To him who has not watched clouds and seen in them what Mark Antony saw,

'A tower'd citadel, a pendent rock,
A forked mountain, or blue promontory,

The first nocturne will be only a weariness to the ear and mind. The impression is not for him, though Baudelaire's stranger who loved only the clouds would love this music. "Festivities," with its strange processional march, its whirring capriciousness, makes a more direct appeal. Does the third movement answer the old question put by Tiberius to the grammarians and repeated by Sir Thomas Browne, "What song did the sirens sing?" Here is music of waves and of sea women; music that never was heard on a casino-lined coast, but sounds that might go with "The light that never was on sea or land." Here is music that is subtly poetic, music of ineffable beauty. Suppose that Debussy had put words to this song; how he would have cheapened the nocturne! To each hearer on the ship of Ulysses or in the hall last night the sirens sang of what might well lure him. But of these nocturnes I shall say a few words next Sunday.

Miss Destinn sang with great dramatic force and yet without too marked suggestion of the opera house. She is one of the few visitors from German opera houses—they may be counted on one hand, and there will be a finger to spare—who, when they appear in concert halls, are not aggressively and impertinently operatic. Miss Destinn's effects were made by legitimate singing and by a personality that is both sympathetic and intense. Whether she were singing Senta's ballad or a song by Schubert, she first of all respected the melodic line, the rhythm, the sound principles of vocal art.

Then, by the quiet power of her interpretation, by the simplicity and the sincerity of her eloquence, she charmed both the soul and the mind of the hearers. She is not one of the shrieking sisterhood that mistake palsy for passion. She remembered that Gretchen's lament was a reverie rather than a set song. She was not in "The Erlking" obliged to resort to ventriloquism to differentiate the actors in the little and terrible drama. It was a great pleasure to hear this famous singer in concert. It is to be hoped that she will at no distant day be seen and heard in operatic parts.

The orchestral performance was a brilliant one. There might have been more atmosphere in Debussy's "Clouds." The music was at times too formal; it was almost divided into sections; but the other nocturnes and "Kaleidoscope" were performed most effectively. "Sirens" calls for only 16 female voices. Their music was sung last night by a greater number, by the Choral Club of the New England Conservatory, and the singers by the purity, the agreeable quality of their voices and by the musical and aesthetic taste displayed contributed largely to the deep impression made by Debussy's imagination and rare expression.

BOSTON POST

DECEMBER 14,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Large Audience With Programme From Liszt, Wagner and Tschaikowsky

The first concert of the season for the benefit of its pension fund by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place before a large audience last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted entirely of works by Liszt, Wagner and Tschaikowsky, as follows: Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt; "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Die Gotterdammerung," Wagner; "Nutcracker Suite, Theme and Variations," from Suite 3, "1812" overture, Tschaikowsky.

The playing of the orchestra was brilliant and engrossing, as it always is to a conspicuous degree on these occasions. Mr. Fiedler read his scores with the heartiness and the insight which are his to an unusual extent, so that even Liszt's bombastic poem sounded fresher, less tawdry and timeworn than is the rule.

It was good to hear the wondrous music from "Parsifal" played by such a magnificent band of instrumentalists, and the excerpt from "Die Gotterdammerung," which is, if we do not mistake, Richter's arrangement, is excellently put together.

Tschaikowsky's fascinating suite, music in a lighter vein, the variations and the gorgeously scored "Polacca" gave instantaneous pleasure. The "1812" overture is music for an occasion, and Tschaikowsky satisfied completely the lower side of his rich musical nature as he piled on his mass effects and revelled in gory passages for the brass. The ingenious and spectacular handling of the "Marseillaise" and Russian themes, in conjunction and opposition, never fails to appeal to an audience. Then there is the organ, the cymbals and other things. It went with great gusto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 14, 1908

PENSION FUND CONCERT AND AUDIENCE BRILLIANT

MR. FIEDLER PROVES A MUSICAL HERO

Entirely at Home With Wagner—Mme. Chaminade's Boston Debut a Great Success.

By Louis C. Elson.

The programme at the Pension Fund Concert, given in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows:—

Liszt—"Les Preludes."
Wagner—"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal."
Wagner—"Siegfried's Rhine Journey."
Tschaikowsky—"Nutcracker Suite."
Tschaikowsky—Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3.
Tschaikowsky—Overture, "1812."

A thoroughly modern programme in the best sense of the word, for Wagner and Tschaikowsky and Liszt are scintillant with all the effects of modern orchestration, yet are not crabbed or mystical in their utterances. Of course, in a concert which is given for a beneficent purpose, and in which everyone from conductor to drummer volunteers his services, criticism must be mute. But were this ban lifted the reviewer would find only praise to speak.

The audience was brilliant and of good size, and Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra appeared at its best. The supreme moment of the concert was its final number, Tschaikovski's "1812 overture," which was played better than it has ever before been done in Boston.

Mr. Fiedler is certainly at his zenith in the modern works. Nor is he a prophet without honor in his own country, for the applause at this concert showed that his earnest and painstaking care were fully appreciated. In other cities there has been some debate, yet the present reviewer was told in Brooklyn recently that every seat in the great new Academy of Music had been sold out long before the concert given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the most prominent citizens of that city said that Mr. Fiedler was held there to be the best of all the Boston Symphony conductors.

As a matter of fact each conduetor has had his good points. Henschel, the first conductor, made programmes which might serve as a model to all his successors, so broad and catholic in spirit were they. Gericke read Beethoven as none of the other conductors succeeded in doing, never "individualizing" or distorting the meaning, but interpreting with a devout piety. Paur could give us Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony or a Liszt symphonic poem in a manner that his successor could not equal. Nikisch played upon the orchestra with an individuality that was little short of marvellous. Muck could take a well-known work, like the Brahms C minor symphony, and reveal it to us with an entirely new meaning and power. Each one of these had his specialties in which he was pre-eminent. Mr. Fiedler has also done some things which make him "sui generis." His performance of the No- variations, two days [illegible] pretation of Strauss' "Heldenleben" a short time before that, make him also a musical hero that must be cherished in our Gallery of Fame.

In the programme of last night he showed that he is entirely at home in the Wagnerian and the Tschaikowskian veins. We do not rank him with Gericke in Beethoven, but each conductor has his "genre," and we are glad to insist upon his powers in the modern field. The performance that the symphony gave last night was brilliant in every detail and showed that there is no deterioration in its technique or enthusiasm. It was a worthy effort in a worthy cause.

[115]

ADVERTISER, DECEMBER 8.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

In placing on the programme of the pension fund concert in Symphony hall, next Sunday evening, the two Wagnerian excerpts—"The Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Gotterdammerung"—Mr. Fiedler has been guided by the large number of requests for such music which have come in since the beginning of the season.

The Tschaikowsky "Nut-Cracker" suite, which is also on the programme, will be new to most of the patrons of these concerts, although parts of it have been played at the "Pop" concerts. It shows Tschaikowsky in one of his happier

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1908.

SYMPHONY'S FIRST PENSION CONCERT

Orchestra at Its Best in Effective Display of Varied Resources.

In spite of the very attractive and diversified program of the Symphony Orchestra's first pension fund concert at Symphony Hall last night, the audience was rather thin. These two special concerts given each season are the only ones in which the famous band makes an appeal for popular favor, and the rows of empty seats were as surprising as they were rare at a Symphony concert of any description. However, on such an occasion many who purchase seats do not use them, and, owing to the purpose of the concert, they probably thought it best not to give them away.

But those who attended heard the orchestra at its best. The program was arranged to make the most effective possible display of the varied resources of the organization. There was the strangely beautiful and mystical music of Wagner in the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Siegfried" Rhine Journey" from "The Dusk of the Gods;" there was music remarkable for its clarity and brilliancy in Tschaikowsky's "Theme with Variations and Polacca" from the Russian composer's third suite; there was a high-class popular pot-pourri in the same composer's "Nutcracker" suite; and there was what would generally be called "tremendous" music in Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. The performance of this last piece was magnificent. However, the audience seemed to find the greatest pleasure of all in the light and merry "Nutcracker" suite; and in this piece the rare virtuoso elements of the orchestra were well shown. Professor Hess, Mr. Maquarre, Mr. Kautzenbach and Mr. Schuecker each had a more or less prominent part, Mr. Kautzenbach not in his usual role of 'cellist nor as conductor of an impromptu "Pop" concert but as a performer on the carillon.

Miss Destinn Scores Hit With Symphony

Miss Emmy Destinn, the celebrated Bohemian soprano, whose alleged jealous feelings toward Miss Geraldine Farrar have been the subject of many a cable despatch, scored a genuine success, both personal and artistic, at Saturday night's Symphony concert.

Miss Destinn's first number was Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman," the dramatic song beginning with the valkyr-like call "Yohohoe, yohohoe, yohohoe!" Dramatically she sang it, but with no forcing of manner or voice, yet with big effect.

But otherwise it was one of the most interesting concerts the Symphony Orchestra has given in recent years. There was a rare spectacle after the "Flying Dutchman" number, when the Choral Club of the New England Conservatory of Music, an organization comprising about a score of well-trained singers, came on the stage to participate in one of the Debussy nocturnes, called "Sirens." And truly sirens, or something of the sort, the young ladies demonstrated themselves to be, for their success with the intricate music of Debussy was almost superhuman.

BOSTON GLOBE—
MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1908.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Symphony Orchestra at Its Best in Program That Ranged From Liszt to Wagner.

The pension fund concert of the symphony orchestra had a smaller audience than usual last night, though the program was more varied and attractive than usual. And while on the subject of exceptions, it may be said that the verve and swing, the sweep and plunge of the playing was quite beyond even the high mark the symphony sets for its ordinary concerts.

So, whether it was the classic elegance of Liszt's "Les Preludes," or the mystic music from Parsifal, or the tremendous narrative of Siegfried's Rhine journey, or the delicious and delicate foolery of the "Nutcracker suite," or the great drama of the "1812" overture, there was electricity in the playing which made the audience thrill with strange little tinglings down the cheeks. Somebody has said that each performance by the Boston symphony orchestra is an experience unique, each concert is an event which is quite distinguishable from every other, and certainly last night ran the gamut of possibilities in emotions for an audience.

The program was well arranged, for it went from Liszt's elegance to Wagner's Parsifal music—the Good Friday spell—and then gave for the completion of the first part of the evening the Gotterdammerung number. Then the Tschaikowsky came along in order, the "Nutcracker" with all its exquisite frippery, its dainty overture in the air, its bell-tones of the "fee Dragee" dance; its sensuous Arabian and its comical Chinese movements; then the "theme with variations" and the strenuous "polacca" from the suite No. 3, and finally the "1812." This last number was certainly a climax logically, and it was played in a storm of tempo that still marred not a note of its clearness.

Dr Fiedler took things at almost feverish tempi, and the players often nearly overleaped him. He went from forte passages to climaxes when one could hardly conceive a greater hight to be reached; the tremendous ending of the final number was enough to raise people right out of their chairs.

The pension fund, in aid of which the concert was given, is already at work, and is contributing its income to the support of one or two players who have been superannuated. And if music that is popular in the higher sense—Wagner, Tschaikowski, Massenet, Berlioz—could be given by these players more often, it seems certain that the pension fund must quickly attain the proportions planned.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 19, 1908.

Society turned out well for the Symphony rehearsal yesterday and a treat was enjoyed in Lhevinne's playing. Haydn, Rubinstein and Wagner were honored on the program. Seen arriving were Mrs. John L. Gardner with Miss Alison Haughton, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, accompanied by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. A. Henry Higginson, looking unusually well in a smart fur turban and sealskins; Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Jr., and daughter, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, and sister, Helen Burrall MacNichol; the Misses Juliet and Barbara Higginson; Ethel Gibson, Ethel Fay, Mary Curtis, Mrs. Robert Stow Bradley, Mrs. H. Staples Potter in smart mourning. Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Pierce (nee Whipple), Mrs. Jealous, Mrs. Henry P. Quincy and daughter Elinor, S. Amory Matthews, Louis Elson, Mrs. George Chadwick, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Alice Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick P. Vinton, Mrs. George Cushing, Miss Manning, Katherine Foote, Mrs. William P. Vaughan, Mrs. George Lee, Mrs. Roby, Mrs. S. Winsor, Mr. Grew, Mrs. Edgar Champlin, Mrs. Phineas Adams and Mrs. "Tom" Motley. The next rehearsal will be Thursday, the 24th, and not Christmas day.

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 19, 1908

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

This programme was presented yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, when the Symphony Orchestra held its ninth public rehearsal of the season: Symphony in B flat major (B. & H. No. 12), Haydn; fifth concerto in E flat for piano and orchestra, Rubinstein (first time at these concerts); "Waldweben," from second act of "Siegfried," and overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

This well-contrasted programme was interpreted in unusually happy vein. Haydn was formal, but in his more virile works revealed himself as a man with much red blood in his veins. In his instrumentation he seems very ingenious and modern for a composer of his time. Whether this symphony was played entirely in the manner prescribed by "tradition" we leave to authorities on the subject. The point that interests an audience of 1908 is whether or not the music contains that which speaks to the modern man, and whether the conductor conveys a living message with appreciation, logic of conception, reverence for a great work. All this can be truly remarked of yesterday's performance. The old music was fresh and lovely and convincing. We do not want iconoclasm in the concert hall; we only want scores, and a conductor, that are alive.

Mr. Josef Lhevinne, who was splendidly equal to its exorbitant technical demands, played Rubinstein's work in a masterly manner, proceeding as a virtuoso to the concerto born. The concerto itself is rather thin stuff. It is more Russian in flavor than many of Rubinstein's greater works. There are some interesting ideas, but such moments are few and far between, and are obscured by endless passages of virtuosity for the dear pianist's sake.

Mr. Lhevinne has the brawn and the agility requisite for the digital execution of the concert piece, and he has a certain bluntness of style which was fitting to the occasion. It may be said in the same breath that his playing is both broader and more sensitive than when he first visited us, according to impressions of a single performance. But he could have spent his time to better advantage.

There occur moments in the life of the musician when every condition, internal and external, seems perfectly adjusted for a good performance. Mr. Fiedler has given some of his most noteworthy readings this season, according to the gospel of Richard Wagner, but he had not previously, in our opinion, reached the point that was reached yesterday in the "Dutchman" overture and in the forest music. Surely, in addition to the conductor's habitual insight, the gods were kind, for we do not remember such a stirring performance of Wagner's early overture in many years at a Symphony concert. The leader had the music in the palm of his hand. For dynamic proportion, for greatness of conception, for soul-satisfying, sweet and dramatic vision, it would be hard to improve upon that performance. How the music of the German composer's first period does flame! What perfect mastery of instruments and musical form, what amazing ease of expression! What kindling, spontaneous imagination! In spite of the immature style, it is only the concluding measures that are banal and theatric, and this flatness is only made more conspicuous by the foolishly out-of-place phrase of "Tristan" lineaments which the arranger has stuck on as a concert ending.

On account of Christmas Day, the public rehearsal of next week will take place on Thursday instead of on Friday afternoon.

DAILY ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 19, 1908

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME CONSERVATIVELY MODERN

Mr. Lhevinne's Pyrotechnic Playing of Rubinstein's E Flat Concerto Carries It to Success.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in B flat.
Rubinstein—Piano Concerto in E flat. No. 5. Soloist, Mr. Josef Lhevinne.
Wagner—"Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
Wagner—"Flying Dutchman" Overture.

A programme that was conservatively ancient and modern. It was not so long ago that Wagner was held to be the radical of radicals. "Nous avons changee tout cela"; today he seems a rather conservative composer; he has been thrust out of the radical camp by the demon that he himself has raised, a la Frankenstein.

Haydn's symphonies wear better than Mozart's. Mozart tended somewhat towards modern dramatic effect and his efforts in that direction seem tame compared with those of his successors; but Haydn remains frankly in the 18th century and retains all the quaintness and naivete of his epoch. Sprightly melody, suave counterpoint, unstrained cheerfulness are in each of his orchestral works and his symphonies will be played and give pleasure when all of Mozart's except the G minor and the "Jupiter" are placed upon the shelf.

It was not given in a periwigged style, this little symphony, but Mr. Fiedler managed to impart virility and vigor to its first and last movements. The minuets, in spite of the fertility of Haydn's invention in the treatment of this dance, are the movements that are fading most in his sonata forms. Small wonder that Beethoven brushed them all aside with the Scherzo, in 1802. Yet the Trio of this particular Minuet gave a very good contrast with the chief movement and was especially melodious. The symphony as a whole, however, was not as attractive a work as some others by Haydn.

The Rubinstein concerto has the failing that most pianist-composers fall into—it keeps the solo instrument rather too conspicuously in the foreground. It is not a symphony with a thread of solo-work interwoven, as is the case with Brahms' second concerto, or Beethoven's fourth and fifth. But, with a soloist, this is a failing that "leans to virtue's side" very decidedly, and the composition displayed the Russian pianist in a very favorable light.

Mr. Lhevinne is much more than a virtuoso. He has an abundance of technique, but he generally uses it as a means to an end and he does not believe that virtuosity is its now reward. We could have wished to have heard him in some more inspired composition, possibly a Beethoven concerto. The first movement seemed rather artificial, but it had a very brilliant coda, with an abundant display of wrist-action for the soloist, and of course the double octaves and heavy chords won their applause. The Andante has a striking pizzicato theme for contrabasses, afterwards treated by the piano, and there is considerable free poetic rhapsodizing in the movement. Its end is as whispered as the coda of the "Pathetic Symphony" by Tschaikowsky.

In the finale definite melodies (possibly some folk-themes) are present and there is an enormous amount of bravura work. This Mr. Lhevinne attacked with a power and verve that carried the rather showy composition to triumph. Such pyrotechnics and such endurance always excite an audience. Yet the content of the work is less worthy than that of Rubinstein's preceding symphonies. Even Mr. Lhevinne's superb playing cannot blind us to that fact.

The Wagner numbers were a noble ending to the concert. Mr. Fiedler had evidently worked with his accustomed care on the wonderful "divisi" passages for strings, which came out most clearly and eloquently,—the myriad voices of the forest. The preeminence of Wagner over his successors is clearly enough shown in such passages as these. Strauss and Noren, Mahler and Reger, have also sometimes subdivided their orchestral parts into many-voiced polyphony, but never with such effect as is here attained.

When it comes to the figures themselves, the "motiven," the beauty of Wagner is again made manifest. No one ever possessed, as he did, the power of suggesting a character, an object, an event, so graphically in a very few notes. We doubt, for example, whether in the whole realm of music there is a succession of three chords that can compare with the "Fate-motive," and in this number the Bird motives, the Siegfried motive, the Slumber motive, are infinitely more pregnant with meaning than anything which the later works can offer in their programme-music.

The pianissimo of the beginning was remarkably well done, and the crescendos were real crescendos with good climaxes at their end. But the best point of the orchestral performance at this concert was the "Flying Dutchman" overture. We were almost persuaded that it was also intrinsically the best music.

Since we are in the mood for comparisons we may suggest comparing the "Flying Dutchman" overture with Debussy's "La Mer," or even with Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," to see in which work the salt spray is most abundant. How great masters may weave material from similar figures may also be seen in the fact that the "Flying Dutchman" figure is twin brother to the opening figure of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, only the former moves upward and the latter downward.

The performance was a marvel of healthy vigor and the contrast between the sailor's motif and the sweet motive of salvation, the Senta theme, was finely drawn, while the apotheosis of the finale was made into a noble climax. It was a most stirring interpretation of a work with which almost every auditor was familiar and the abundant applause after its conclusion showed that its fiery reading was thoroughly appreciated.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LHEVINNE, RUBINSTEIN, HAYDN AND WAGNER

The Pianist Reappears in an Unusual Concerto—A Season of Keyboard Heroics—Mr. Fiedler and an Eighteenth-Century Symphony—Youthful and Mature Wagner—The Christmas Break in Concerts—Few Announcements for Next Week

A programme in which Mr. Fiedler figured for the first time in Boston as the conductor of one of Haydn's symphonies, and which included Wagner of the late panoramics and early dramatics, the "Waldweben" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture, furnished still another element of novelty and interest at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. In addition to a pedagogic Haydn, a tempestuous Hollander and a Wagnerian wood in the spirit of the realists, came a seldom heard pianoforte concerto of Rubinstein, and a season of keyboard heroics. Mr. Josef Lhevinne was soloist, and the restraint and dignity of his performance in music of a character that consistently invites to personal display added one more element of distinction to the occasion. Whatever dissent might have been excited by the scenery of the "Waldweben" or the assertiveness and bravado of the concerto, certainly there was not a dull minute during the programme, which was fairly long. The B-flat symphony is one of the most attractive of Haydn's excursions in this form; Mr. Fiedler's qualities as a conductor gave peculiar emphasis to the Wagnerian numbers, and the firmness with which Mr. Lhevinne renounced the vanities of the virtuoso while playing the music of virtuosity added another portrait to the gallery of serious artists—one of a firm-lipped, earnest face bending over the black and white keyboard with passionate absorption in his task. The programme was:

Haydn: Symphony in B-flat major.
Rubinstein: Fifth Concerto (E-flat major) for Pianoforte.
Wagner: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," act. ii.
Wagner: Overture to "Flying Dutchman."

Rubinstein, at least, made no symphonic flourishes. He declined to protest that he was sworn to the Beethoven faith of concerto writing, a symphony with a piano part. He set himself to a task of the utmost exploitation of the resources of the pianoforte. To him a pianoforte concerto meant a concerto for the pianoforte with the humiliation of orchestra. Agree with his premises or not, his conclusions are irresistible. He produced what he set out to produce, a flourish of glorified technique. If he had stopped there, the concerto might be left to gather dust with the swooping fantasias of Thalberg. But in the most intricate figures of this concerto is still the voice of melody, Rubenstein's inalienable gift. Does he make bass and treble bellow with full-fisted chords? the thunder is melodious; does he sound a flourish of delirious chromatics? the delirium is tuneful; does he impose herculean labors at a fleet rhythm for rushing hands? in its wildest tumult the pianoforte manages to sing. Not only manages, but sings spontaneously, and this throughout a concerto of more than generous length. No less noteworthy is the variety of its pianoforte figures. Some of them we have heard before in the barcaroles, a few are perhaps common to the vehicle, but as device is piled on device, and arabesque entwines itself in arabesque, as the composer plies the infinite combinations of the keyboard which he knows with such intimacy, there interposes the query whether he did not definitely set out to exhaust the vocabulary of technical prowess. In scheme, moreover, the work is large-boned, moving in a long stride, robust, and taking its lung-fulls of resonance. It stalks in heroics. But with this distinction—its heroics are a dash self-conscious; they differ from the earlier brands of pianoforte bravura as the Latin epic differs from the Greek. Achilles and Patroclus had no idea how fine they were. Nor had Homer. But the Latin poet had. This is not to accuse the Russian of posturing; he was too fierily in earnest to take the time. But in his music the choices and rejections are plainly visible. It is heroic in another aspect as well—in the pianoforte's domineering ways with the orchestra. In its episodic progress are whole pages where the accompaniment is reduced to the proportions signified by the term ad lib., or the orchestra is silent altogether while solo instrument strides on in its seven-league boots.

It was to music of such hectoring ways that Mr. Lhevinne brought his firm and reticent style. In the phrases of such oratory he preserved his singular repose, and yet employed a forceful delivery. It was the musical speech of one who sees proportion and the due relation of details to the mass. When the accompanying instruments had dropped to a whisper and solo pianoforte was off at impetuous revelry; in passages which send spinning chromatics the length of the keyboard against hymning strings; or such episodes as the long solo which declares the theme of the finale with its ample qualifying clauses, the performer seemed to have submerged his personality, and to have surrendered his powers to the office of interpretation. If ever concerto courted the fine frenzy, wilted linen, disheveled mane and the other local habitations of divine fire, it is Rubinstein's concerto in E-flat, and yet in music which would, with justice, have been made the excuse of a score of pianists for walking of their hands. Mr. Lhevinne never sacrificed decorum to display. The virtues of his style became the virtues of the music. It expressed each idiom with peculiar justice, let it be feathery passage work, the musketry crackle of staccato runs, the [illegible] octaves in triple shouts. The performance thus became more than interpretive; it was also something of a justification. The conclusion theme of the finale is greatness descending a little to familiarity. It shows, as it were, the unapproachable when he unbends to the anecdotal strain. The great man goes further. He egotizes a little. To start in the lofty style, carry it off superbly for two movements and a half, to have a lapse into the vernacular some dozen pages before the end, is hardly in the books, as such things go. Again Mr. Lhevinne's fluency carried it off. If greatness egotized, that was to be its royal prerogative, and to be expressed by the regal or editorial "We."

With all its minute particularity, the playing never failed to grasp and present the larger designs, for the concerto adheres to a unified structure with all its bravura work, announces texts and carries them into logical development. Thus the Andante, while employing the most varied resources of the solo instrument, seeks and sustains a note of reflective melancholy to suit the most fastidious romanticist. And its spectral ending, with the contrast of strings and keys as of cheerful lamp light raying out into the clammy dews of a churchyard, the faint subsiding echoes of goblin laughter, ending with the hollow mutter of kettle drums, just audible, is surely something more than the music of technical display. And lastly, Mr. Lhevinne's modesty was its own reward. In the scriptural sense, by losing himself he saved himself. Played by numberless lesser men (or, for that matter, several of the greater) it is not impossible that these florid measures might have become tedious if not offensive. That they were exuberant, virile and stirring was due not least to the noble quality of Mr. Lhevinne's playing.

To the Haydn which we remember as proceeding off the tip of Mr. Gericke's precise and scholarly baton, and the Haydn instinct with grace and vivacity as his scores were read by Dr. Muck comes another version, added yesterday afternoon by Mr. Fiedler—a Haydn drawing the long breaths of youthful vitality—like the athlete in repose after sharp exercise. The capacity for violent action is there, and felt, but dormant; nothing is vehement, nothing clamorous, but the strength is more emphasized for being subdued. Some such impression was produced as Mr. Fiedler swung his stick to summon the rounded phrase and the pompous sentences of this symphony. What he would have us see beside the beauty and symmetry of the form, the satin finish of the string choir, and the gold lace in its sparing ornamentation, is the strength and agility with which this figure moves in the courtly paces of the dance, with the clink of scabbard against silken thighs to hint of sturdier exercise which could be performed on more gallant fields. Once and only once in this form did Haydn essay to combine the language of the court, which was his natural tongue, with the language of the camp. That the military symphony, as usually heard, has less of the martial stride than the "Ninth" as played yesterday afternoon is sufficient comment on the spirit and energy of Mr. Fiedler's conducting. At no time, with the possible exception of some of the perorations of the finale, did he, as organists say, pull out all the stops. Obedient to his beck the horns quavered, the chattering wind choir responded, the violins paced their rectilinear measures, the 'cellos and double-basses uttered their monosyllables, arriving again and again at the full stop, so dear alike to composer and conductor. "I pause for a reply," says the speaker impressively. "Then none have I offended," he resumes after the silence, and launches out afresh. Mr. Fiedler's Haydn has been referred to as pedagogic. It is hardly that, for the term carries with it the reproach of pedantry, and whatever be the peccancies of Mr. Fiedler's conducting, pedantry is hardly one of them. His scholarship as brought to Haydn is professorial rather, but the type of professor who is actively fond of physical exercise, preferably mountain climbing.

In the Wagner numbers which brought the programme to a conclusion we were again on familiar ground—no dizzy balancing feats between music and virtuosity; no circumspect pacing of the line which separates scholarship and pedantry, but the full freedom of pealing strings and brazen-throated horns, for the overture, at least. The "Waldweben" was a slightly different story. Here the conductor plied a brush which might have been dipped in the pigments of the Dutch school. Wagner's music was pictorial. Mr. Fiedler would make it minutely so. Out of the droning pedal point and the zone of murmuring strings he called the roulades of flute, clarinet and oboe, cheeping and twittering; he defined the pictorial themes, smoothed off the drowsy hum of the woods, indicated the elfin chuckle of horns, all with the definiteness of the passionate devotée to clean drawing. When Wagner, busy at the work of scene-painting, glances up to remark: "There, something of that sort," Mr. Fiedler announces: "Precisely this!" This technique is abandoned, however, shortly before the end, for an imperious summons to the brasses to blare their mightiest. From plying the deft touches of the realist we change to the "jabbed brush strokes."

After all, why musical scene painting, frankly announced as such (and asserting no claim to the character of sheer programme music) in the concert hall? It is not only episodic; its essence is descriptive of something which is not there to see. To disassociate such music from its proper associations is somewhat analagous to the exhibition of a stage set, without the corresponding action, because, at the time of the performance, the excellence of the background and lighting was greatly admired.

Of the same pictorial texture, but with far other relations was the "Flying Dutchman" Overture. Written years before its composer attained his definitive stage, it could hardly be delivered with more than a general turn, and yet it had all the potency and charm and considerably more of grandeur than the forest idyl. As it was conceived—in the large style of the historical painters, with something of their theatricality and concessions to sentiment—so it was played, allowing free range of imagination through its mystery, its simplicity and its tumult. Its tale was freely legible, the far-off trumpet calls starting shivers of superstitious dread, the naïveté of its ballad, the misty gloom which shrouds the fate-driven ship; but most of all the majesty of the sea, its horror and fascination, its ache and its matchless beauty, as keenly felt by Northern peoples. The same tempest which the Roman braved by an appeal to his fatalism, roused the laughter of Vikings. Both are in this overture. Mr. Fiedler, possibly from national affiliations, chose the latter.

THE SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, DECEMBER 20, 1908.

NINTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Josef Lhevinne Plays Superbly a Dry Concerto by Rubinstein.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its ninth concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat major (B. and H. No. 12).....Haydn
Fifth concerto (E flat major) for piano, op. 94.....Rubinstein
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"..Wagner

This concert gave pleasure to many, but neither the program nor the performance calls for extended discussion. The purely orchestral pieces were all familiar, for though the symphony had not been played at these concerts for several years, in fact, since 1895, the music itself, as far as form and melody are concerned, has been known to zealous players of piano pieces for four hands. The performance of these pieces was fully up to the high standard of the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler's reading was sane and orthodox. Yet it is impossible to refrain from bearing testimony to the clarity and suavity which characterized the interpretation of the symphony.

Mr. Fiedler is not one of those that endeavor to modernize Haydn, that are not happy unless they play all sorts of tricks with rhythm and introduce incongrouous and anachronistic effects, so as to make this frank, simple music more acceptable. It is true that we cannot hear Haydn's music with the ears and the mental attitude of those who first heard it. Our enjoyment is thus no doubt somewhat diminished. To modernize it does not right matters. We are then farther away from Haydn and his period than before, and what becomes of the saving grace of his frank good humor, of his direct appeal?

Rubinstein's fifth concerto was played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Mme. Schiller introduced the work in 1876 at one of Theodore Thomas' concerts in Music Hall. Either the great difficulties of a purely technical nature or the dryness of the music itself discouraged other pianists. Mr. d'Albert used to play the concerto occasionally, but he, like the Hebrew prophet who displeased Voltaire on account of his name, was capable of doing anything. Josef Lhevinne, who played here at a Symphony concert for the first time, is passionately fond of the fifth concerto. It is his favorite battle horse. With it he won the Rubinstein prize. He chose it when he played in this country for the first time. He goes about with it as though it were his mission in life to persuade all hearers that it is a thing of grandeur and beauty. There is something pathetic in this devotion.

It matters not who plays the fifth concerto; the work is long and it seems longer in the performance. As a whole it is dull and futile music. Here and there is a page that has a faint melodic charm; here and there are pages that excite curiosity for a moment. Much of the concerto is only wearisome. It bristles with difficulties, but this is no longer a recommendation. Rubinstein could probably have written a still more difficult concerto.

Mr. Lhevinne is a virtuoso of the first rank. His uncommon mechanical proficiency is indisputable. He has both power, which last night he did not abuse, and delicacy. He is master of many nuances, and the quality of tone is always charming or distinguished. Since he last played here in recitals he has gained in aesthetic breadth and dignity. Last night he was more than an admirable virtuoso in the restricted meaning of the word. He played that which is for the most part inherently unmusical most musically. By the clearness of his interpretation he showed the deformity of the concerto, so that by the excellence of the performance the concerto was "most intolerable and not to be endured." Furthermore, he accomplished this: the hearer was fascinated by the superb character of the performance and often clean forgot the music. He was conscious only of Mr. Lhevinne displaying with the utmost ease beautiful or impressive arrangements of tones.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund will be on Sunday evening, Feb. 28. Dr. Ludwig Wuellner will then recite "The Witch's Song" to the accompaniment of Max Schillings' music, and probably sing a group of songs. The orchestral pieces will be Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and another piece to be announced later.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE, DECEMBER 20, 1908.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Rubinstein's Concerto Finely Played.

Lhevinne Warmly Welcomed as the Symphony Soloist.

Handel and Haydn Concert Tonight—Gossip.

The Russian pianist, Josef Lhevinne, appeared as soloist of the ninth Symphony program, Rubinstein's fifth concerto for piano and orchestra, Haydn's B flat major symphony and excerpts from [illegible]r's "Siegfried" and "Flying Dutchman" making up the selections. Although the piano concerto does not rank with the more familiar fourth by the same composer it teems with difficulties and demands great physical endurance in performance.

There is little of the grace and melody of the fourth concerto, forte and fortissimo passages seem to be almost constantly demanded, and although it may be more taxing to the player than is the other, it does not contain the melodic elements and coherency that make the fourth one of the great concertos in the literature of the piano.

But Lhevinne gave an amazing display of virtuosity, despite the somewhat uninteresting nature of the piece, and deepened the impression made at his recitals here two years ago.

Of stocky build, with muscular arms and shoulders, he has sufficient power to cope successfully with a composition of this nature, and throughout the three movements there was no lessening in his leonine vigor. His octave playing, and there was a great deal of it, was remarkable in its energetic rapidity; his singing tone formed a splendid contrast to it, and the innumerable runs in chromatic and natural scales and the arpeggio passages were fairly dazzling in brilliancy. It was virtuosity that compelled admiration and hearty applause

The first movement is disjointed in structure, but it affords abundant material for display of technique and strength, both of which Lhevinne possesses in a high degree. In the second part there are some melodic movements, just a few in which the artist displayed the beautiful cantabel and expressive forms of his art in a pleasing manner, and in the hurly-burly of the final movement he never faltered in his task. Surely Lhevinne is a pianistic giant, and his recital next week arouses pleasant anticipations.

Mr Fiedler guided his orchestra quite successfully over the musical shoals which permeate this concerto. This was particularly shown in the opening part among the chromatic ups and down which are impartially distributed among the instruments.

It was a pleasure to hear the Haydn symphony again, its joyous nature being most agreeably presented by the orchestra. The elaborate figures in the second movement were beautifully voiced by the different choirs and in the final part of the piquancy and verve of the dance themes were deliciously fetching. And the flute part, which is prominent throughout the work, was a delightful feature in an impressive ensemble.

The forest music from "Siegfried" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture were given with splendid effect. In the former the "woodland life and stir" were exquisite in their tonal suggestions and the storm, stress and mystery of the overture typified vividly, and almost savagely, the life of the ghostly rover of the seas.

Owing to the fact that Christmas falls on Friday this year, the public rehearsal of the orchestra will be given next Thursday afternoon, the concert taking place as usual on Saturday evening. The feature of the program will be Beethoven's fifth symphony, which will be an anniversary performance, the work having been performed for the first time in Vienna, Dec 22, 1808.

Of all the works on the program of the pension fund concert last Sunday night, the charming "Nut-Cracker" suite by Tschaikowsky seemed to please the most, and as it is essentially Christmas music, Mr Fiedler has incorporated it in his Christmas program. The prelude to "Parsifal" will complete the selections.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—FRIDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1908.

SOCIETY

Many Men Are Seen In Audience

Their Presence a Feature of Symphony Orchestra Rehearsal.

A feature of the Symphony rehearsal audience yesterday was the presence of many of the male sex. There was a full house and most of the familiar faces were on hand.

I noted especially Mr. and Mrs. James A. Lowell Blake (Helen Prince), Mrs. T. James Bowlker and her sister, Amy Lowell, Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, very handsome in black velvet and ermine; Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Daniel Frank, Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, John D. Long, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Edgar Champlin, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and sister, Miss MacNichol, Mrs. J. Reed Whipple, Mrs. Henry Morse, Mrs. Francis R. Allen, Mrs. Elliot Hubbard, Evelyn Forbes, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. George Lewis and sister, Mrs. George S. Silsbee, Mrs. Frederick Russell Nourse (Dorothy Quincy), Mrs. Caroline F. Warren, Cornelia Wolcott, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Jr., Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee with Alison Hamilton, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Horatio Cushing, Mrs. William P. Fay and daughter, Kitty, Miss Manning, Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mary Vaughan and Mrs. F. H. Severance of New York.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 27, 1908.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mischa Elman to Play at the Symphony.

Paderewski Coming With His New Orchestral Work.

Lhevinne's Recital and Current Gossip.

This week's Symphony concerts bring to Boston for the first time Mischa Elman, from all accounts one of the most astonishing violinists that has visited America in a great many years. Elman recently made his debut in New York and won there unanimous praise from the critics. This young Russian was born in 1890 in Odessa. His father was his first teacher, and when he was 5 years old he made his first public appearance in his native city.

In 1896 he became a pupil at the Imperial school of music at Odessa and won his first prize of a free scholarship at his entrance examination. Leopold Auer, professor in the Royal conservatory in St Petersburg, heard him in 1902 and was so impressed with his genius that he secured the czar's permission to take Mischa and his family to St Petersburg, where he accepted him as a free pupil.

Two years later he made his first appearance in St Petersburg under rather curious circumstances. Auer was advertised to play the Tschaikowsky concerto at one of the symphony concerts, and at the last minute was compelled to give up the idea, and he sent Mischa Elman instead, then a boy of 14. His debut made a sensation, and in the same year he duplicated his success in Berlin.

At the Symphony concert he will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. The other works on the program will be a festival overture by Otto Nicolai that has never been played at these concerts. The other orchestral work will be Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

Paderewski Coming.

C. A. Ellis, manager of Paderewski, announces that the only recital here this year by the great pianist will take place in Symphony hall Saturday afternoon, Feb 6. Paderewski sails for America the end of next month and it is his purpose to play only 20 times, most of which appearances will be with orchestras. He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington; with the Chicago orchestra in Chicago, with the St Paul orchestra in St Paul and the Minneapolis orchestra in Minneapolis.

He will give no more than one recital in any city and his recitals will be limited for the most part to the larger cities of the east. He is bringing with him his symphony, which will have its first performance anywhere with the Boston Symphony orchestra in February.

Mail orders may now be sent to Symphony hall for tickets for the recital.

SOLLETTE
ss PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 30

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4, will offer Philadelphians their first opportunity of hearing Mischa Elman, whose debut in New York last Monday evening appears to have borne out the statement that, while one of the youngest, he is also one of the greatest violinists of the age. It has not yet been decided what work he will play here, though it is likely that it will be the Beethoven concerto, his performance of which is reported by no less a person than Ysaye to be "a revelation."

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has heretofore only in the case of Paderewski engaged the same soloist for the concert of Saturday afternoon as of Thursday night. Elman has been engaged as soloist for both concerts of this organization, and it is probable that he will be heard in the Brahms concerto and in the Beethoven during the same week.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S BALLET OF "THE NUT-CRACKER"

Delightful Music Delightfully Played—A New Side of the Russian Composer—Mr. Fiedler's Just Fondness for Ballet-Music—The Prelude to "Parsifal" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for Contrasting Beginning and Ending

Blessed were contrasts and blessed was safety in Mr. Fiedler's programme for the Symphony Concert of Thursday afternoon. Wagner, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven are the most reliable composers, nowadays, for English-speaking audiences. The current series of Symphony Concerts is not yet half done, and already Mr. Fiedler has played five of Wagner's overtures and a fragment from "Siegfried"; three pieces of Tschaikowsky, and two overtures and three symphonies by Beethoven. The conductor, seemingly, is still uncertain of the likings of the public and rather indefinite in his own inclinations. He has discovered that his audiences are thirsting for Wagner, and he has given them generously to drink. Tschaikowsky is plainly secure with them; and Beethoven is safer still. On Thursday, besides, his three dependable composers gave him plentiful contrasts. His Wagner was the calculating and high-pitched Wagner of the anguished prelude to "Parsifal." His Tschaikowsky was the fanciful and playful, exotic and adroit Tschaikowsky of the "Nut-Cracker" ballet. His Beethoven was the mighty and the impassioned Beethoven of the fifth symphony.

The conductor led all this music to the diminished and rather perfunctory audience of the afternoon before Christmas, and with a hand that sometimes seemed a little perfunctory as well. Tschaikowsky's dances, however, could not fail of applause, and the finale of Beethoven's symphony and a truly eloquent playing of it kept the audience long enough in the hall to recall Mr. Fiedler at the end of the concert. The youth of the second balcony is plainly fond of him, and it clapped him lustily. No previous conductor of the orchestra—to note another incident of the concert—has been so eager that his men individually or in mass should have the immediate reward of their prowess. The Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy in "The Nut-Cracker" is virtually a little piece for the célesta, with light orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Kautzenbach of the 'cellos played it with a tone as soft and sugary as the fairy herself, and Mr. Fiedler had him to his feet for the answering applause. The Dance of the Mirlitons, with its suavely insistent flutes, brought similar reward to Mr. Maquarre, Mr. Brooke and Mr. Fox.

Mr. Fiedler is apt in the conducting of ballet music and wise in his restoration of it to a just and agreeable place in the Symphony Concerts. Why it should have been counted beneath their "dignity," only the stiffy solemn-minded folk may say, and their explanations seldom reach beyond a priggish "because." One purpose, surely, of the concerts is to give musical and esthetic pleasure, and ballet-music in its finest estate does bring a delight of its own. Very eminent composers, from the Frenchmen of the eighteenth century to the Russians of our own day, have written it abundantly. Beethoven and Schubert did not disdain to test their talents with it. The mere difficulties of such music are fascinating. There stands the relentless ballet-master with his "choreographic" scheme—so many measures here, such and such a dance here, a change of scenery (and its accompanying music) to fill a particular number of minutes, a play of light to be emphasized, a ballerina to be carried off or on the stage, and so forth with the endless requisitions of a minute and highly conventionalized form. The scenario of the average ballet is seldom, moreover, stimulating to the waiting composer. Yet with such impulse and within such arbitrary limitations, he should write music of light and gracious melody, brightly harmonized, piquantly figured, highly rhythmed, as brilliant, fanciful, pictorial and suavely suggestive as he can make it. It can be done, it has been done, in this particular "Nut-Cracker" from which Mr. Fiedler chose the suite of Thursday, in Lalo's "Namouna," in Johann Strauss's "Aschenbrödel," in a dozen other pieces of our own and elder times.

And when it is so done, it gives twenty-fold the pleasure of much solemnly pretentious and solemnly ineffectual music. Take the case of Tschaikowsky himself. His "Manfred" symphony, his fantasia on "The Tempest," for example, are not nearly so interesting music or so satisfying and successful accomplishment in their kind as is this "Nut-Cracker" ballet in its genre. There is less imagination in them alike in the invention of melody, the play of rhythm, the command of mood. They are less felicitous technically, less fine and spontaneous of spirit, and they give far less pleasure of the ear and of the emotions. The truth is that light fancies and such elegant and adroit expression of them as fill "The Nut-Cracker" are many times more difficult to write than the sonorous periods of "Manfred" or the tone-picturing of "The Tempest." Pompous symphonies and passionate tone-poems are far easier to make—respectably—than a ballet of delicate and exotic charm. Every cook roasts beef; not all can make melting sweetmeats.

And how charming and fanciful and light of hand and mood these "Nut-Cracker" dances are! Tschaikowsky toiled long and rebelliously at the writing of them. He cursed roundly his acceptance of the commission for the ballet; but the music contains not a hint of these tempers. It is fluent and fickle as an improvisation, as elegant and polished as edgeless detail can make it. The little overture, nearly all in the upper tones of the instruments, changeful, playful, brings the air of fantasy. Follows the march of the children, with its short-stepped eager rhythm. Then the "characteristic dances"; the "dance song," for the célesta seems to sing above the accompaniment, of the Sugar Plum Fairy; the fiery and snapping Trépak for the rude little Russian toys; the Oriental dance with its soft, heavy melody, its languorous rhythm of swaying fans and its undertone of the rustling tambourine; then the teetering Chinese dance as though the figures on a plate or a bowl had momentary motion; the mirlitons—toy instruments—dancing to their own idealized voices; and last the titillating introduction, the flashing cadenza of the harp, and then the delicately footed, lightly colored, suavely graceful Waltz of the Flowers. Our Tschaikowski is usually the passionate tone-poet of the fantasias, the symphonist of large voice and unbridled mood, or the rapturous technician of the concertos. Here in "The Nut-Cracker" he is the adroit, the delicate, the fanciful virtuoso of the ballet, designing a miniature with the graceful lines of his melody, animating it with his bright rhythms, coloring it with the prettiest of tonal tints. And he is no less a master. What may there not be in the other ballet of his prime, "The Sleeping Beauty"! Mr. Fiedler should search it out—the more because he is so sympathetic and skilful with such music and has so adept an orchestra for it. Then, too, there are no troubling dancers of flesh and blood to cloud the dances. Only the eye of the imagination sees them. They say that Miss dell' Era, the original Sugar Plum Fairy, was "dull and ugly." Who would guess it from the music?

The agonized voice of the prelude to "Parsifal" and the heroic voice of Beethoven's symphony made strange preface and sequence to this ballet-music. And once more, in the prelude to "Parsifal" it was easy to miss the darkness and the close atmosphere of the theatre. Most of Wagner's preludes will plausibly bear transfer to the concert-room. The overture to "Tannhäuser," the prelude to "The Mastersingers" are full-bodied and eloquent symphonic pieces in themselves. But the prelude to "Parsifal" is too calculatingly contrived for a particular place and circumstance; it is too vividly and excitingly expectant of the particular things that are to follow. Besides, there sit the orchestra and the audience in broad, clear light and alert attention. The conductor stirs his stick; the band "gives out" the phrase of the Holy Supper, but no such nervous thrill comes to the listeners as when the phrase rises, mounts, gathers strength and fulness as some transporting and upbearing voice out of the darkness of the theatre. The reiterated anguish of the prelude rising until it cuts the listener's imagination like some fine-edged knife, throbbing, tortured with pain and with vain suffering; the intermittent glimpses of aspiration, hope, celestial glamor and celestial exaltation, are all at bottom transporting excitements to the remote mysteries and the remote passions of the drama that is to come. Poignant as they are anywhere, they are schemed for the mystery and the anticipation of the darkened theatre, the nervous audience, the hidden orchestra, the trembling blank of the curtain. There is no other music of such unspeakable agony, there is little of such ineffable aspiration; both are full of piercing reticences until in sheer relief the listener cries, What next, what next? Only the theatre may answer. Unconsciously probably, but fortunately, Mr. Fiedler somewhat lessened this note of poignant expectancy. The prelude, especially in concert, can be emotionally almost unendurable.

"Eroica" or no "Eroica," the symphony in C minor is the true "Heroic" symphony—heroic in idea, heroic in expression still, in spite of all the widening musical freedom and the waxing musical resources of a hundred years. Probably it is far more eloquent to us with our fuller and keener sense of the emotional qualities of music, than it was to the company who heard it dubiously in the Vienna of December, 1808. Some then called the symphony too long and over-developed. We in our turn see the heroic magnitude and fulness of the design and feel the mighty emotions that shaped and animated it. We have been attuned to heroic voice in music, of struggle, of longing, of fury, defeat and triumph. We rise instinctively to such heroic excitements as the transition from the scherzo to the finale, and answer to the thrill of the embattled chords of the first movement or of the triumphant song of the finale. For us, too, perhaps, more than for Beethoven's own generation is the deep and absorbed passion of the slow movement. The tonal weight, the tonal splendor of the modern orchestra only makes such music the more eloquent. Above all, the symphony is masculine music—the mass, the sweep, the power, the stress of it are all of the struggling, conquering, heroic male. The more broadly, vigorously and commandingly it is played the better. Mr. Fiedler was truly heroic in the swelling flood of the finale. He made it molten music. He wrought the transition vividly yet without obvious calculation. There were honest vigor, masculinity and directness, and no far-fetched emphasis, in his reading of the first movement. But in the andante his particular fault once more beset him. He must have his restless contrasts at all costs. He tried to be subtle in his modifications of the pace, in his nursing of the phrase, and he was only broken and disjointed. He would [illegible] Beethoven's head [illegible]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Another Tone-Poem by Strauss at the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Elman's Debut—Mme. Melba's Return—Mr. Lhevinne in Recital—A Dolmetsch Concert for Christmas

Mr. Fiedler has put another, a familiar and one of the most generally appreciated of Strauss's tone-poems on his programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday—"Death and Transfiguration," last heard here in the final year of Mr. Gericke's conductorship. As Mr. Ernest Newman and many another admirer of Strauss will have it "as regards the union of pure form with unalloyed purity of material, this is the most perfect thing that he has done. The poetic scheme is free from any matter that is not essentially musical, and it develops in such a way as to afford the musician the amplest facilities for development of his own special kind." No other music of Strauss, except, perhaps, that of "Salome" so readily and deeply stirs an audience, while Mr. Fiedler, in "A Hero's Life," sufficiently proved his mastery of these tone-poems. At the other extreme musically and at the other end of the programme is Nicolai's good old "Church Festival" overture, built upon Luther's hymn, "A Mighty Stronghold is Our God," hitherto unknown to the Symphony Concerts. Between the two, Mischa Elman, for his first appearances here will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra. Mr. Elman is the most eminent of the younger violinists of the time, and since he ended his days as a prodigy, breadth, beauty and intensity of tone, ripe musicianship, largeness of understanding, and genuine passion and fire have been his distinguishing qualities. Since Mr. Kreisler came first to Boston, no violinist of such just distinction as Mr. Elman has come for his début here. In the course of the week there will be room for an article about him and his career.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, at Infantry Hall, Tuesday, Dec. 29, is going to play Rubinstein's Fifth pianoforte concerto, in E-flat. Lhevinne is today the most unauthoritative interpreter of the piano music of Rubinstein, who was for so many years his teacher. This particular concerto for one of those mysterious reasons that make the repertoire of a pianist usually so constricted, is very little played, although the general belief is among those who know it that it is far superior to the famous concerto in D-minor, which has been worn thread-bare by every conservatory student in the world. Mr. Lhevinne from all accounts is displaying richer art than ever and he is winning golden opinions from the press and public wherever he is playing.

Mr. Fiedler at this concert is going to make good the promise made for the first concert, which on account of illness in the orchestra, he was unable to fulfill.

He will play the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the "Egmont" overture. The "Scheherazade" suite requires nearly three-quarters of an hour to play all its different movements, and as the concerto is rather long, it is impossible to put any more numbers on the program and keep it within limits of [illegible]

[118]

SUNDAY POST,

DECEMBER 27, 1908

MISCHA ELMAN.

Mischa Elman, the young violinist of whom such astounding reports have reached us from Europe and New York, where he recently made his American debut, will appear as soloist at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Elman is 18 years old, having been born in Odessa, Russia, in 1890. His father was his first teacher, and at 5 years of age he made his first public appearance in his native city. In 1890 he became the pupil of Professor Fiedelman at the Imperial School of Music in Odessa, where he won the first prize of a free scholarship at his entrance examinations. Leopold Auer, professor of the Royal Conservatory at St. Petersburg, was so impressed by the young Russian's playing that he obtained leave of the Czar to take Elman and his family with him to St. Petersburg, where he accepted Mischa as a free pupil. Two years later the young violinist made his first appearance in St. Petersburg under very unusual circumstances. Auer was announced to play the Tchaikowsky concerto at a Symphony concert, but was obliged to resign at the eleventh hour in favor of Elman, whom he sent to take his place. Elman, then a boy of 14, won a sensational success. In the following year he completed this triumph in Berlin. The next season he concertized in London, and thereafter rapidly rose to the front rank of living violinists.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will play the Tchaikowsky concerto. The programme will open with a festival overture built upon the grand chorale of Luther, "Ein Feste Burg," by Otto Nicolai, which will be heard for the first time at these concerts. The final performance will be that of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

THE BOSTON JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 28, 1908.

THE "NUTCRACKER" PLEASES AUDIENCE

Symphony Program Suits So Well Mr. Fiedler Is Applauded Again and Again.

Saturday night's Symphony concert was the shortest and most popular one given this season. There was a well-contrasted and unusually attractive orchestral program—the prelude from Wagner's "Parsifal," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. An audience that quite filled the hall showered applause upon Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra from first to last. The climax of enthusiasm was reached during the performance of the Tschaikowsky number. This must have surprised the standpatters, who have been clinging to the notion that the "Nutcracker" suite was too trivial for a Symphony program. Nothing played by the orchestra this year has been more heartily, more genuinely, enjoyed by the larger portion of the audience. The performance of this symphony was all the more impressive coming after the Kazoo Dance and the Flower Waltz.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

.....

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA CONCERT ON DEC. 28—BOSTON SYMPHONY, JAN. 6

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Pohlig, will give its third concert on Monday evening, December 28, at the Lyric.

For this performance Conductor Pohlig announces the following program, with Thaddeus Rich, concert master of the orchestra, as the assisting artist:

1. Goldmark. Overture, "Sappho."
2. Balakirew. Symphony in C.
3. Wieniawski. Concerto in D minor, for violin and orchestra, Thaddeus Rich.
4. Tschaikowsky. March Slave, Op. 31.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6, at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will mark the first appearance in Baltimore of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who won such a success in New York at his debut ten days ago. Everybody who follows the musical affairs of Europe has been aware of the success this young man has had in Germany and in England, and, in fact, all over the Continent. Those who were present in Carnegie Hall when Elman made his debut say that they never witnessed such scenes of enthusiasm since Paderewski first appeared in that place 17 years ago. The man who led the applause by waving his handkerchief and crying "Bravo!" after Elman had performed the Tschaikowsky concerto was Rafael Joseffy.

ess .....

DEC 12 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT WEEK

Miss Tina Lerner Will be Soloist

The next big musical event in Worcester will be the opening of the Ellis series of concerts in Mechanics hall next Tuesday evening and it promises to inaugurate one of the most brilliant series of subscribtion concerts that this city has ever had. There has been a very large subscription sale; in fact, Mr. Ellis refused to undertake the organization of these concerts until there was a sufficient subscription to assure him that the attendance woould be worthy of the class of attractions he is offering. Besides this early subscription, the number of music lovers who have taken advantage of the comparatively low prices for the season has been unexpectedly large.

MISS TINA LERNER

The first concert will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra which needs no introduction even to those patrons who do not attend the concerts of the orchestra in Boston. Those who have listened to its playing this year say that never has its virtuosity been so brilliant and its tonal qualities so rich and mellow. Moreover, Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, has entirely justified the reputation which preceded his coming to this country. He differs decidedly from most of his predecessors in his manner of conducting and in his interpretation. He belongs to what might be called the "passionate" school and seeks as no conductor of the orchestra has ever sought the emotional content of the music that he plays.

He is a large, strong, rugged man, whose appearance on the platform inspires confidence not only in the orchestra but in his hearers. He knows exactly what effects he wants and he knows how to get them from the orchestra, which even with such a band of virtuosi as the Boston Symphony, is not always the easiest thing in the world. He is a man of broad sympathies and while he is a modern of moderns and is in closest touch with the latest movements in music, like all great musicians, he believes that the music of today is founded on the great classics of the past and he is no less great in interpreting the music of Beethoven than he is in interpreting the music of Richard Strauss.

His first program, which is one of unusual attraction, is comparatively conservative in respect to the modernity of the music to be played. Three of the works are acknowledged classics and the fourth is modeled closely after the great men of the first third of the 19th century, and shows none of the eccentricities of the composers of today. Weber's "Oberon" overture, in common with his overtures to "Euryanthe" and "Der freischutz," is set as a model for all time of the operatic overture. These three overtures are about all that is left of the operas, for while "Der Freischutz" is still sung now and then in Germany, "Oberon" and "Euryanthe" have almost completely disappeared from the stage. The value of an art work is finally decided by its life and the length of its life is finally decided by, not the critic, but the public, and that these three overtures written almost 100 years ago have come down to us and are constanly played, is best proof of the high merit that fills them.

Beethoven's seventh symphony has been gaining great renown, recently, from the dancing of Isadore Duncan. This remarkable woman, who has created such a sensation in this country during the past fall, took her cue from Wagner's description of the symphony, that it was "the apotheosis of the dance," and not the least of her achievements has been to interpret the music in motion. But without the aid of dancers, this great work is due to prosper for many years to come. Next to the fifth symphony, it is the most popular of the immortal nine. It shows Beethoven in one of his most agreeable moods. Its beautiful melodies, its enticing rythms, and particularly the wild bachannal which closes it, have made it a work which of itself always attracts large audiences, whenever it is announced for performance.

[119]

Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," is one of a set of six similar works which the Bohemian composer wrote to celebrate his native country. In this he seeks to portray in purely musical and legitimate fashion, the course of the great river Moldau as it flows through plain and mountain until it joins the Elbe. Smetana was, if nothing else, a naturalist in music. The greatest of Bohemian composers, his work is colored with the national feeling of his country. Mr. Fiedler has played this symphonic poem this year with much success in Boston, New York and other large cities.

The final number on the program will be the "Tannhauser" overture which Mr. Fiedler has resurrected from popular concerts and put again in a place worthy of its beauty. Mr. Fiedler considers it only second in the list of operatic overtures to Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and those who have had the good fortune to hear his interpretation of it agree with him fully.

The soloist will be Miss Tena Lerner, a young Russian, who is now in America for the first time and has been playing with much success in New York and other large cities in the east. She has chosen as her concerto that by Saint-Saens in G minor No. 2, a work whose popularity seems to increase with age. The charming scherzo demanding as it does the fleetest of fingers, and the most delicate touch, is peculiarly adapted to the art of this young virtuoso. The full program is as follows:

Weber ..... Overture, "Oberon"
Beethoven Symphony in A major, No. 7
1. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
2. Allegretto.
3. Presto: Presto meno assai.
4. Allegro con brio.
Saint-Saens Concerto in G minor, No. 2
1. Andante sostenuto.
2. Allegretto scherzando.
3. Presto.
Smetana .....
Symphonic poem "The Moldau"
(No. 1 of the series, "My Country.")
Wagner ..... Overture, "Tannhauser."

ABLE ADDRESS, EIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YOR

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

ess .....

.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 29. The soloist will be the celebrated Russian pianist, Josef Lhevinne. At this concert Mr. Fiedler promises to give Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," which was announced for the first concert, but had to be given up because of the illness of one of the important members of the orchestra. Mr. Lhevinne will play Rubinstein's concerto for piano in E-flat, No. 5, so that the audience will have an admirable opportunity to contrast the work of two leading Russian composers, one who was so strongly German in his sympathies, Rubinstein, and one who was entirely nationalistic if not chauvinistic, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Full details of the concert will be announced in due time.

This evening in Symphony hall, Boston, will be given a concert by the Symphony orchestra, with Mr Fiedler conducting, for the increase of its pension fund. The "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Gotterdammerung," from Wagner; "Les Preludes," from Liszt, and "The Nutcracker Suite," the "1812" overture, and the Variations from the third orchestral suite, from Tschaikovsky, make the program.

EVENING TELEGRAM,

s ..... New York City.

.....

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9. At both of these concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not yet been decided what works he will play, but it is practically decided that at one of the concerts he will play the Beethoven concerto.

54

n .....

ress .....

.....

Elman With Boston Symphony.

The first opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Mischa Elman will be at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4. All predictions about the success of this young man in America seem to have been even more than fulfilled at his debut in New York and afterwards at his recital.

It has not yet been decided what work he will use with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, but the chances are it will be the Beethoven concerto, his performance of which is reported by no less person than Ysaye to be a revelation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

DEC 20 1908

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on the evening of January 7 and the afternoon of January 9. At both concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not been decided what works he will play, but probably he will be heard at one concert in the Beethoven concerto.

The first opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Mischa Elman will be at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4. All predictions about the success of this young man in America seem to have been even more than fulfilled at his debut in New York and afterward at his recital. From the account of those who were in Carnegie Hall when he made his first appearance there on the 10th no such scenes of enthusiasm had been observed in New York for many years. This astonishing virtuoso seemed to take the audience off its feet by his marvelous playing. He seems to have everything—tone, technique and musicianship.

It has not yet been decided what work he will use with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, but the chances are it will be the Beethoven concerto, his performance of which is reported by no less person than Ysaye to be a revelation.

Full announcement regarding the concert will be made in due time.

The first opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Violinist Mischa Elman, the latest European sensation, will be the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, January 4. All predictions about the success of this new star in America seem to have been more than fulfilled at his recent debut in New York, and afterward at his recital. The young virtuoso seemed to take the audience off its feet by his marvelous playing. He seems to have everything—tone, technique and musicianship. It has not yet been decided what work he will use with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, but it will probably be the Beethoven concerto, his performance of which is reported by no less person than Ysaye to be a revelation.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

DEC 20 1908

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9. At both of these concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not yet been decided what works he will play, but it is practically decided that at one of the concerts he will play the Beethoven concerto. Full details regarding the programmes will be made known later.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 20 1908

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9. At both of these concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not yet been decided what works he will play, but it is practically sure that at one of the concerts he will play the Beethoven concerto.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9. At both of these concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not yet been decided what works he will play, but it is practically decided that at one of the concerts he will play the Beethoven concerto.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess BUFFALO, N Y DEC 20 1908

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th. This announcement is always fraught with pleasure for all music lovers in Buffalo and it is a matter of congratulation that the concerts of this great orchestra have become an annual factor in this city. This year the orchestra brings with it its new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who came to this country last fall to succeed Dr. Karl Muck. The very favorable notices that have been written about him make all lovers of good music extremely keen to see what he can do with the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler comes recommended as a very skilled maker of programmes, and certainly those who have seen the programmes he has been giving at the regular Symphony concerts in Boston will agree that he is particularly gifted in what seems to be a very rare art. It is not going too far to say that no conductor of the orchestra has had a more popular success than Mr. Fiedler. Patrons of the orchestra will hear with much pleasure that Prof. Willy Hess, who is such a favorite in Buffalo, is again at his post of concert-master, having returned last fall from a leave of absence of a year.

The management promises an unusually interesting concert, full details of which will be published in due time.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is again the local manager of the concert and all information regarding tickets and the like may be had from her.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

DEC 20 1908

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9. At both Mischa Elman, violinist, will be the soloist. It has not been decided what works he will play, but it is practically determined that at one of the concerts he will play the Beethoven concerto.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9. At both of these concerts, Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not yet been decided what works he will play, but it is practically decided that at one of the concerts he will play Beethoven concerto. Full details regarding the programmes will be made known later.

1884

SECOND

ess

The first opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Mischa Elman, the 18-year-old Russian violinist, will be at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 4. All predictions about the success of this young man in America seem to have been fulfilled at his debut in New York and afterward at his recital. In Carnegie Hall, when he made his first appearance on the 10th enthusiasm was tremendous. It has not yet been decided what work he will use with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, but it will probably be the Beethoven Concerto, his performance of which is reported by no less person than Ysaye to be a revelation.

---

om

ldress

ite DEC 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9. At both of these concerts Mischa Elman will be the soloist. It has not yet been decided what works he will play, but it is practically decided that at one of the concerts he will play the Beethoven concerto.

DEC 20 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 6, at 8:15 o'clock. This concert will mark the first appearance in Baltimore of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who created such an astounding success in New York at his debut, 10 days ago. Everybody who follows the musical affairs of Europe has been aware of the enormous success this young man has had in Germany and in England.

[20]

TRIBUNE

PROVIDENCE, R I

DEC 20 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Lhevinne and the Symphony Concert.—Local Notes.

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, is going to play Rubinstein's fifth pianoforte concerto, in E-flat. Lhevinne is to-day the most unauthoritative interpreter of the piano music of Rubinstein, who was for so many years his teacher. This particular concerto, for one of those mysterious reasons that make the repertoire of a pianist usually so constricted, is very little played, although the general belief is among those who know that it is far superior to the famous concerto in D-minor which has been worn threadbare by every conservatory student in the world. Mr. Lhevinne, from all accounts, is displaying richer art than ever and he is winning golden opinions from the press and public wherever he is playing.

Mr. Fiedler at this concert is going to make good the promise made for the first concert, which on account of illness in the orchestra, he was unable to fulfill. He will play the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the "Egmont" overture. The "Scheherazado" suite requires nearly three-quarters of an hour to play all its different movements and as the concerto is rather long, it is impossible to put any more numbers on the programme and keep it within limits of pleasurable enjoyment. The concert date is Dec. 29 at Infantry Hall.

Miss Emma [illegible]

---

m

ress

The Boston symphony orchestra will give its second concert in Springfield in the Court Square theater on Tuesday evening, January 12. The soloist at this concert will be the famous Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. It is a matter of gratification to the management of the orchestra that Springfield patronized so well the first concert given here in November, and it is further a matter of gratification that music-lovers of Springfield so thoroughly approved of Mr Fiedler. Mr Fiedler was more than delighted with the reception he received here, and it may be promised that he will give another program as attractive as the first. The full details concerning the concert will be made later on.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Address

Date

After an absence of a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a concert in Rochester on Saturday evening, January 30th, at Convention Hall. The orchestra has again included this city on its annual Western trip which always takes place in the last week of January, the cities to be visited this year being in order, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The management of the orchestra wishes that it could give more time to its tour through the Middle West in order to fill the remunerative engagements that are always offered to it, but more time than a week is out of the question. In the short space of five months the orchestra gives 107 concerts, 48 of which (including the twenty-four rehearsals) are given in Boston, ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence, Worcester, Springfield and Hartford. This year the orchestra has a new conductor in Max Fiedler, of Homburg, who came to America last fall as the successor to Dr. Karl Muck.

It is not going too far to say that no conductor of the orchestra has ever enjoyed a greater popular success than this newcomer. Mr. Fiedler is not only a great conductor, but rarer still, he is a skilled maker of programmes, and possibly not a small part of his success has been due to this.

From UNION

Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS

Date DEC 20 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its second concert in Springfield in the Court Square theater on Tuesday evening, Jan. 12. The soloist at this concert will be the famous Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. It is a matter of gratification to the management of the orchestra that Springfield patronized so well the first concert given here in November and it is further a matter of gratification that music lovers of Springfield so thoroughly approved of Mr. Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler was more than delighted with the reception he received here and it may be promised that he will give another program as attractive as the first. The full details concerning the concert will be made later.

1884

---

n

REPUBLICAN SPRINGFIELD, MASS

ress DEC 20 1908

Boston Pension Fund Concert.

A vital part of a scheme for a permanent orchestra must be a pension fund which will make it possible to retire players when their powers begin to fail. The Boston symphony orchestra, as is well known, has such a fund, and gives a concert for it every year. Of the one recently given the Transcript says:—

It was a pity that the concert of the Symphony orchestra last night for the profit of its pension fund won so scanty an audience—the smallest in three years for such an occasion. Those who fear that the orchestra may of late have declined a little in its pre-eminent and its distinctive qualities might have had their alarms allayed, and those who question some of the traits of Mr Fiedler's conducting might oftenest have had the pleasure of those qualities in it that are less open to reserve or debate. One of the items of the program was the heroic intermezzo, so to say, between the prologs and the first act of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" that carries Siegfried from Brunnhilde's rock along the Rhine to Gunther's hall. It is trumpet-tongued music, wrought with magnificent tonal eloquence out of glowing wealth of orchestral resources; it is vital with rich and puissant melody; it quivers with its passion of imagination, suggestion and delineation. It is the voice of the heroic youth of a young and heroic world. So forth fares a hero to the adventures that seal his prowess; so he parts from his Valkyr's side in the glow of his passion for her; so the Rhine bears him upon its broad, deep stream, echoing with the song of its daughters; so dreams the hero as he plies his oar; so comes he in joyous clamor, hot for high adventure to Gunther's warlike hall. The performance matched the music, and where the conductor and the men began the coldest listener might not say. And there could have been few cold under the glowing magnificence of the tone of the orchestra, changing from golden depth to silvery brightness, and half a hundred tints between, under the sweep of this instrumental eloquence and under the heroic accent with which the conductor animated it and the broad amplitude of power with which he clothed it. The splendor of passionate and sustained and fiery utterance of which our orchestra is capable was near its fullest and highest.

The first opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Mischa Elman will be at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 4. All predictions about the success of this young man in America seem to have been even more than fulfilled at his debut in New York and afterwards at his recital. From the account of those who were in Carnegie Hall when he made his first appearance there on the 10th no such scene of enthusiasm had been observed in New York for many years. This astonishing virtuoso seemed to take the audience off its feet by his marvelous playing. He seems to have everything—tone, technique and musicianship.

It has not yet been decided what work he will use with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, but the chances are it will be the Beethoven Concerto, his performance of which is reported by no less person than Ysaye to be a revelation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

DEC 20

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert at Infantry Hall on Dec. 29, is going to play Rubinstein's fifth pianoforte concerto, in E-flat. Lhevinne is to-day the most authoritative interpreter of the piano music of Rubinstein, who was for so many years his teacher. This particular concerto for one of those mysterious reasons that make the repertoire of a pianist usually so restricted, is very little played, although the general belief is among those who know it that it is far superior to the famous concerto in D-minor, which has been worn threadbare by every conservatory student in the world. Mr. Lhevinne, from all accounts, is displaying richer art than ever, and he is winning golden opinions from the press and public wherever he is playing.

Mr. Fiedler at this concert is going to make good the promise made for the first concert, which on account of illness in the orchestra he was unable to fulfill.

He will give the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the "Egmont" overture. The "Scheherazade" suite requires nearly three-quarters of an hour to play all its different movements and as the concerto is rather long, it is impossible to put any more numbers on the programme and keep it within limits of pleasurable enjoyment.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE, MD

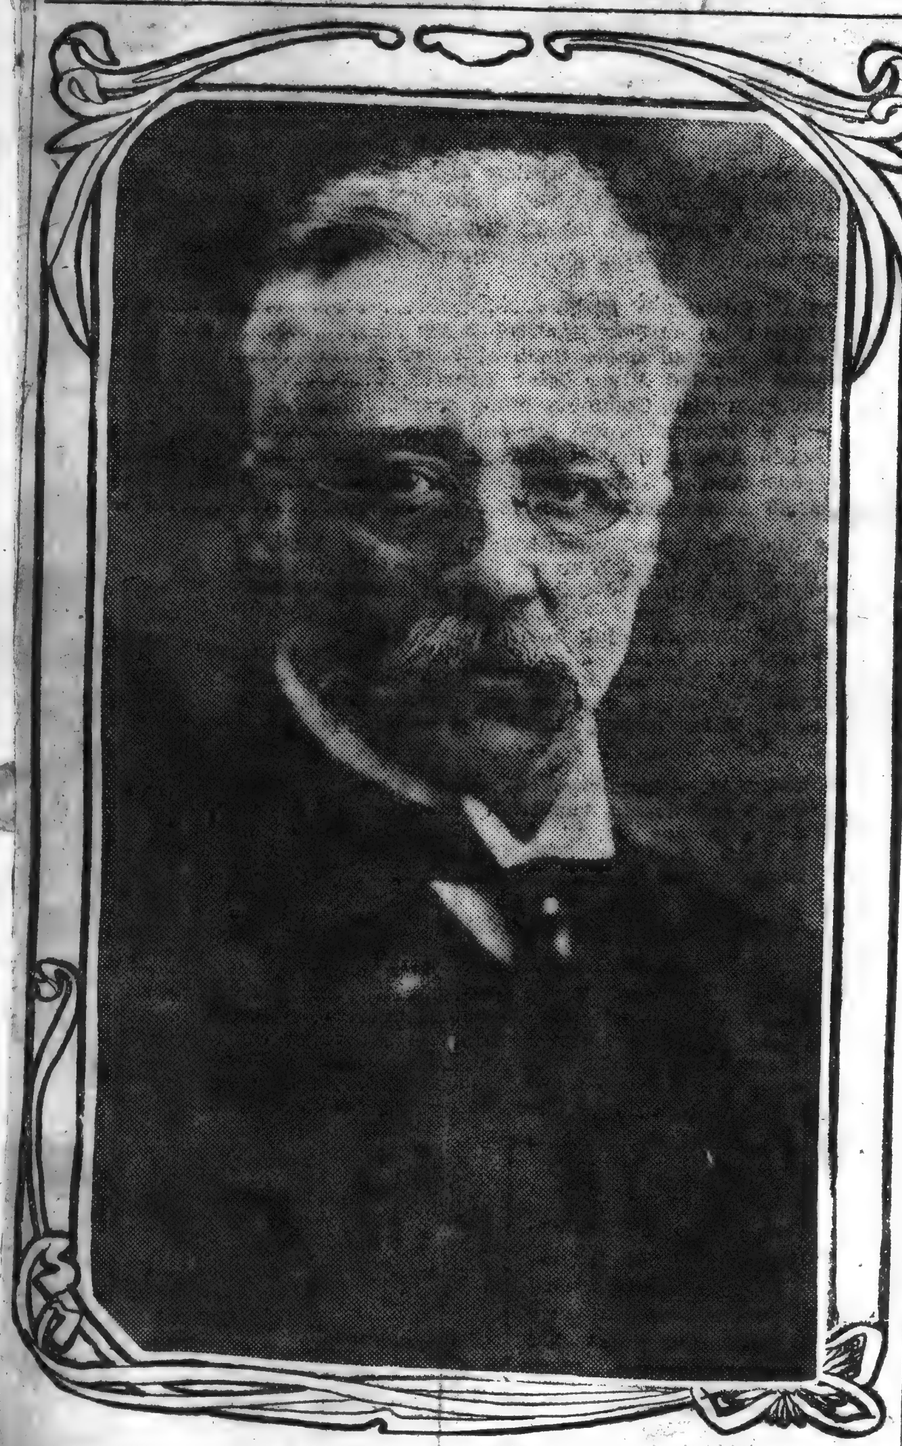
DEC 21 1908

Boston Symphony Next Month.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening, January 6. The concert will mark the first appearance in Baltimore of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Those who were present in Carnegie Hall when Elman made his debut say they never witnessed such scenes of enthusiasm since Paderewski first appeared in that place 17 years ago.

1884

New Orchestra Leader Coming.



MAX FIEDLER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Indianapolis Thursday evening, Jan. 28, 1909, will bring a new conductor, Max Fiedler, the sixth who has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Fiedler, unlike any of the former conductors of the orchestra when they first came to Boston, has made his career exclusively in concert work, and at that, his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been a brief one, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton. He has been a conductor only thirteen years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid, until today he is ranked among the few great conductors of the world, and his services as guest are constantly in demand in the musical centers of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, Dec. 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow student of Dr. Muck, and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson. He was graduated with high honors in 1880. Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he acepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the Conservatory. It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that it is rarely the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city as Fiedler has in Hamburg.

When Fiedler first went to Hamburg, Von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, he gave a concert of his own organization at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a conductor was instant. In 1904 he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg, and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony Concerts in that city. Each year, for the last several years, he has conducted as guest in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York when he was the guest conductor of the Philharmonic Society of that city. Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best friends the young composers of Europe have.

Illustrated

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th. This announcement is always fraught with pleasure for all music-lovers in Buffalo, and it is a matter of congratulation that the concert of this great orchestra has became an annual factor in this city. This year the orchestra brings with it its new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who came to this country last fall to succeed Dr. Karl Muck. The favorable notices that have been written about him make all lovers of good music extremely anxious to see what he can do with the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler comes recommended as a very skilled maker of programmes, and certainly those who have seen the programmes he has been giving at the regular symphony concerts in Boston will agree that he is particularly gifted in what seems to be a rare art. It is not going too far to say that no conductor of the orchestra has had a more popular success than Mr. Fiedler. Patrons of the orchestra will hear with much pleasure that Willy Hess, who is such a favorite in Buffalo, is again at his post as concert-master, having returned last fall from a year's leave of absence.

The management promises an unusually interesting concert, full details of which will be published in due time.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is again the local manager of the concert, and all information regarding tickets and the like may be had from her at No. 26 Irving place.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

lress .....

e .....

Lhevinne's Success.

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who is to be the soloist at the second Boston symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 29, was the soloist at the regular Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He played, as he will play here, Rubinstein's Concerto in E flat, a work which is seldom heard. It is a concerto of almost insuperable difficulty, and the manner in which the distinguished pianist overcame all the obstacles the composer has placed in the way of success, aroused both Symphony audiences to the greatest heigh of enthusiasm. In fact, no soloist has been more warmly received by the Symphony audiences in Boston this year.

The sale of seats for the concert will open at Steinert's Saturday morning.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

s ..... New York City.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

THE third pair of concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9, will present Mischa Elman, as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto, playing both of these works for the first time in America. As his greatest reputation as a violinist has been made by his interpretation of these two classics, his performance will be looked forward to with great interest. Mr. Fielder has placed a noteworthy novelty on the Thursday evening programme—variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Saturday afternoon programme, in addition to the Beethoven concerto, will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

---

n ..... EVENING MAIL,

ress ..... New York City.

e .....

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening, January 7 and the following Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will be the soloist on both occasions. Thursday evening he will play the Brahms concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the Thursday evening programme the Tone poem, "Death and Apotheosis," by Richard Strauss, and Saturday afternoon the programme will also include Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Miss Chesthea[illegible]

---

om ..... itizen,

dress ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

te ..... DEC 26 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 8 and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in Manhattan since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste and sound musicianship, and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. It is significant of the value which the Boston Symphony Orchestra places on him that he will serve as soloist during the December trip, playing with it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York, after having played with it at its home concerts in Boston. He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

Date ..... DEC 26 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist.

E[illegible] New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... PUBLIC. LEDGER PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address .....

Date ..... DEC 27 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Mischa Elman seems to be that very rare artist who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe.

Elman seems to have destroyed for once at least the well-founded tradition that an artist whose coming to America is preceded by vainglorious "puffs" never justifies them. In the last three years the dispatches have been full of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York a few weeks ago should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste and sound musicianship, and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. He seems to have conquered New York as he conquered London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna. It is significant of the value which the Boston Symphony places on him that he will serve as soloist during the December trip, playing with it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York, after having played with it at its home concerts in Boston.

He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

* * *

The Philadelphia Concert Orchestra

Stand[illegible] Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

ss .....

DEC 27 1908

that town.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 8, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Mischa Elman seems to be that very rare artist who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe. Elman seems to have destroyed, for once at least, the well-founded tradition that an artist whose coming to America is preceded by vain-glorious "puffs" never justifies them. In the last three years the dispatches have been full of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York, a few weeks ago, should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste, and sound musicianship, and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. Seldom does it happen that any violinist receives such unanimous praise from the rather captious New York critics, and this is all the more remarkable since it is a well known fact that New York papers rather rejoice in taking lightly one who brings to this country a great European reputation. He seems to have conquered New York, as he conquered London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna. It is significant of the value which the Boston Symphony Orchestra places on him that he will serve as soloist, playing with it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York after having played with it at its home concerts in Boston. He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

ss ..... New York City.

Der Solist der nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Carnegie Hall am 7. Januar Abend und am 10. Januar Abend wird Herr Mischa Elman sein, der im ersten Konzert das Brahms'sche und im zweiten das Beethoven'sche Violin-Konzert zur Aufführung bringen wird. Als Novität wird Dirigent Herr Max Fiedler am Donnerstag eine „Kaleidoskop" benannte Doppelfuge von Noren vorführen, schließlich Strauß' Tonpoem „Tod und Verklärung". Am Samstag giebt es Beethoven's C-Moll-Symphonie und Wagner's „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouvertüre.

From ..... SUN,

Address ..... New York City.

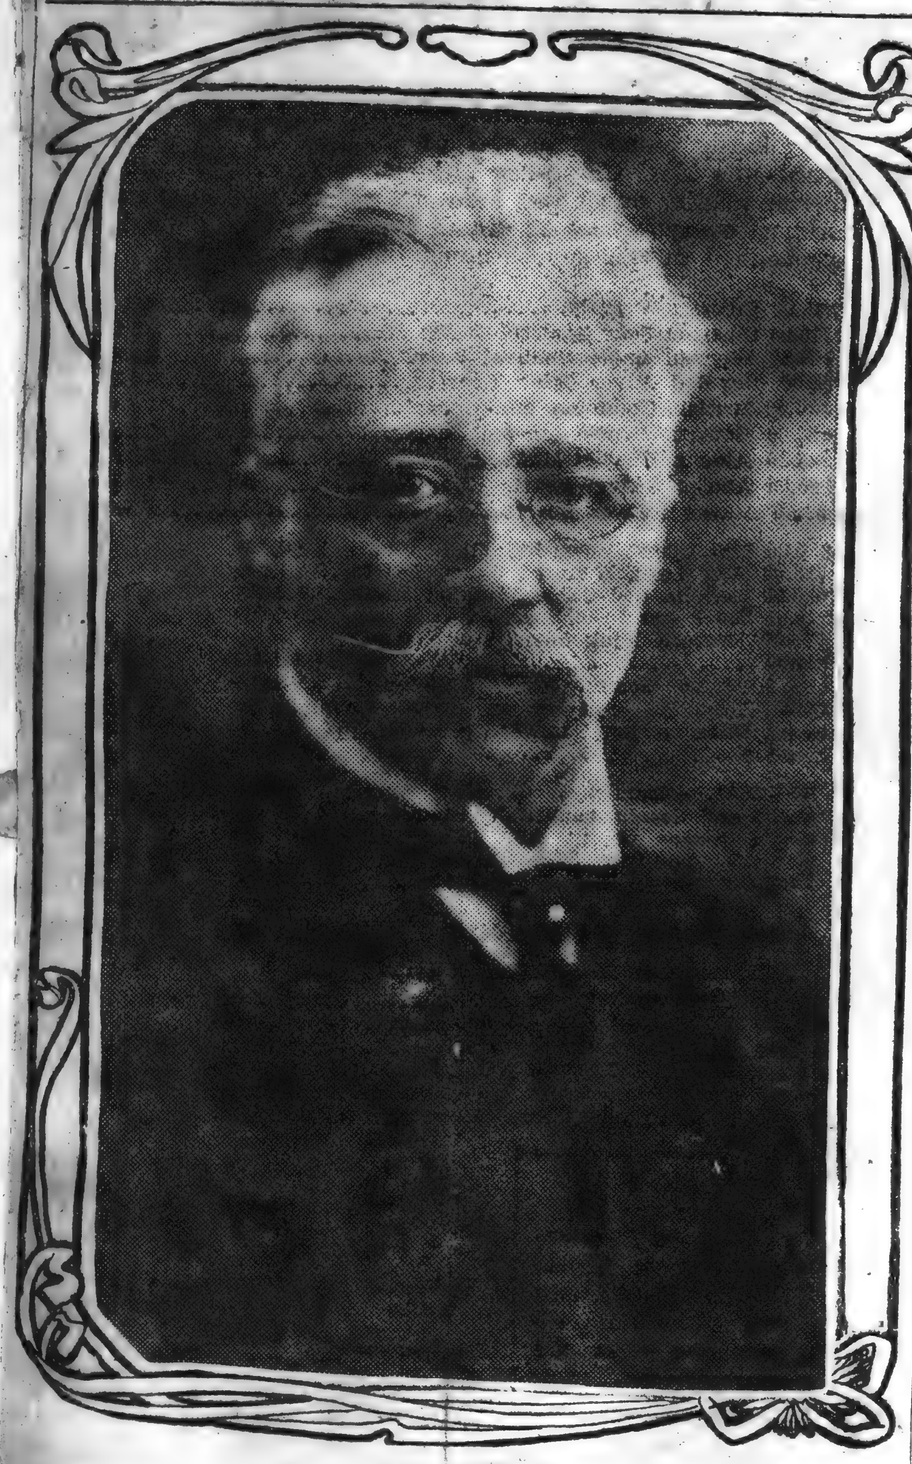
DEC 27 1908

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto, playing both of these works for the first time in America. As his real reputation as a violinist has been made by his interpretation of these two classics his performance will be awaited with interest. Mr. Fiedler has placed a noteworthy novelty on the Thursday evening programme, the variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope" by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," and the Saturday afternoon programme, in addition to the Beethoven concerto, will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

[121]

STAR
DEC 30 1908

New Orchestra Leader Coming.



MAX FIEDLER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Indianapolis Thursday evening, Jan. 28, 1909, will bring a new conductor, Max Fiedler, the sixth who has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Fiedler, unlike any of the former conductors of the orchestra when they first came to Boston, has made his career exclusively in concert work, and at that, his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been a brief one, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton. He has been a conductor only thirteen years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid, until today he is ranked among the few great conductors of the world, and his services as guest are constantly in demand in the musical centers of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, Dec. 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow student of Dr. Muck, and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson. He was graduated with high honors in 1880. Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the Conservatory. It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that it is rarely the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city as Fiedler has in Hamburg.

When Fiedler first went to Hamburg, Von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, he gave a concert of his own organization at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a conductor was instant. In 1904 he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg, and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony Concerts in that city. Each year, for the last several years, he has conducted as guest in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York when he was the guest conductor of the Philharmonic Society of that city. Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best friends the young composers of Europe have.

Illustrated
ess

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th. This announcement is always fraught with pleasure for all music-lovers in Buffalo, and it is a matter of congratulation that the concert of this great orchestra has became an annual factor in this city. This year the orchestra brings with it its new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who came to this country last fall to succeed Dr. Karl Muck. The favorable notices that have been written about him make all lovers of good music extremely anxious to see what he can do with the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler comes recommended as a very skilled maker of programmes, and certainly those who have seen the programmes he has been giving at the regular symphony concerts in Boston will agree that he is particularly gifted in what seems to be a rare art. It is not going too far to say that no conductor of the orchestra has had a more popular success than Mr. Fiedler. Patrons of the orchestra will hear with much pleasure that Willy Hess, who is such a favorite in Buffalo, is again at his post as concert-master, having returned last fall from a year's leave of absence.

The management promises an unusually interesting concert, full details of which will be published in due time.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is again the local manager of the concert, and all information regarding tickets and the like may be had from her at No. 26 Irving place.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m lress
e

Lhevinne's Success.

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who is to be the soloist at the second Boston symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 29, was the soloist at the regular Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He played, as he will play here, Rubinstein's Concerto in E flat, a work which is seldom heard. It is a concerto of almost insuperable difficulty, and the manner in which the distinguished pianist overcame all the obstacles the composer has placed in the way of success, aroused both Symphony audiences to the greatest heigh of enthusiasm. In fact, no soloist has been more warmly received by the Symphony audiences in Boston this year.

The sale of seats for the concert will open at Steinert's Saturday morning.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
s New York City.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

THE third pair of concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9, will present Mischa Elman, as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto, playing both of these works for the first time in America. As his greatest reputation as a violinist has been made by his interpretation of these two classics, his performance will be looked forward to with great interest. Mr. Fielder has placed a noteworthy novelty on the Thursday evening programme—variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Saturday afternoon programme, in addition to the Beethoven concerto, will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overtrure to "The Flying Dutchman."

m EVENING MAIL,
ress New York City.

e

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening, January 7 and the following Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will be the soloist on both occasions. Thursday evening he will play the Brahms concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the Thursday evening programme the Tone poem, "Death and Apotheosis," by Richard Strauss, and Saturday afternoon the programme will also include Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Miss Chatham's ...
om ...rizen,
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te DEC 26 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 8 and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in Manhattan since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste and sound musicianship and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. It is significant of the value which the Boston Symphony Orchestra places on him that he will serve as soloist during the December trip, playing with it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York, after having played with it at its home concerts in Boston. He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

1884

STAATS ZEITUNG,
ss New York City.

Der Solist der nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Carnegie Hall am 7. Januar Abend und am 10. Januar Abend wird Herr Mischa Elman sein, der im ersten Konzert das Brahms'sche und im zweiten das Beethoven'sche Violin-Konzert zur Aufführung bringen wird. Als Novität wird Dirigent Herr Max Fiedler am Donnerstag eine „Kaleidoskop" benannte Doppelfuge von Noren vorführen, schließlich Strauß' Tonpoem „Tod und Verklärung". Am Samstag giebt es Beethoven's C-Moll-Symphonie und Wagner's „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouvertüre.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date DEC 26 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist.

Es ... New York, 1884

SUN,
From New York City.
Address DEC 27 1908

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto, playing both of these works for the first time in America. As his real reputation as a violinist has been made by his interpretation of these two classics his performance will be awaited with interest. Mr. Fiedler has placed a noteworthy novelty on the Thursday evening programme, the variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope" by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," and the Saturday afternoon programme, in addition to the Beethoven concerto, will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

[121]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC. LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date DEC 27 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Mischa Elman seems to be that very rare artist who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe.

Elman seems to have destroyed for once at least the well-founded tradition that an artist whose coming to America is preceded by vainglorious 'puffs" never justifies them. In the last three years the dispatches have been full of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York a few weeks ago should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste and sound musicianship, and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. He seems to have conquered New York as he conquered London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna. It is significant of the value which the Boston Symphony places on him that he will serve as soloist during the December trip, playing with it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York, after having played with it at its home concerts in Boston.

He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

* * *

The Philadelphia Concert Orchestra

Stand[ard] Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ss
DEC 27 1908

that town.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 8, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Mischa Elman seems to be that very rare artist who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe. Elman seems to have destroyed, for once at least, the well-founded tradition that an artist whose coming to America is preceded by vain-glorious "puffs" never justifies them. In the last three years the dispatches have been full of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York, a few weeks ago, should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste, and sound musicianship, and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. Seldom does it happen that any violinist receives such unanimous praise from the rather captious New York critics, and this is all the more remarkable since it is a well known fact that New York papers rather rejoice in taking lightly one who brings to this country a great European reputation. He seems to have conquered New York, as he conquered London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna. It is significant of the value which the Boston Symphony Orchestra places on him that he will serve as soloist, playing with it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York, after having played with it at its home concerts in Boston. He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

DEC 27 1908

At both of the third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 10, the soloists will be Mischa Elman. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms' Violin Concerto, and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven Concerto, both for the first time in America. As his real reputation as a violinist has been made by his interpretation of these two classics, his performance will be looked forward to with great interest. Mr. Fiedler has place a noteworthy novelty on the Thursday evening programme—variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the Saturday afternoon programme, in addition to the Beethoven Concerto, will comprise Beethoven's C-Minor Symphony and Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

DEC 27 1908

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4, and this concert assumes extra importance, in that it will mark the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Elman seems to be that very rare artist who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe. He seems to have destroyed, for once at least, the well-founded tradition that an artist whose coming to America is preceded by vain-glorious "puffs" never justifies them. In the last three years the despatches have been full of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York a few weeks ago should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems to have conquered New York as he conquered London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna. He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

From TRIBUNE

Address ..... New York City.

Date .....

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, will present Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto, both for the first time in America. His reputation as a violinist has been made by his interpretation of those two classics. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the Thursday evening programme a novelty in the form of variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." The Saturday afternoon programme in addition to the Beethoven concerto will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

TIMES

s ..... New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 10, will present Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto, and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto, playing both of these works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler has placed a novelty on the Thursday evening programme, variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the Saturday afternoon programme, in addition to the Beethoven concerto, will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

DEC 27 1908

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 10, will bring forward Mischa Elman as soloist. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto. As his reputation as a violinist has been made chiefly by his interpretation of these two classics, his performance is looked forward to with interest. Fiedler has placed a noteworthy novelty on the Thursday evening programme: Variations and double fugue, "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Saturday programme will include Beethoven's C minor symphony and the overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman."

News-Democrat
December 30th 08.

BIG AUDIENCE ENJOYS BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSIC

That a large proportion of the large audience in Infantry hall last evening, was drawn by the fact that Josef Lhevinne, the brilliant young Russian pianist, was billed as the soloist for the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is unquestioned, and yet the other numbers on the program were in themselves of more than sufficient merit, both in composition and execution, to attract the lover of realy good music.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, had drawn largely upon the modern Russian school for last evening's concert, and of the three selections played one was by Rimsky-Korsakoff and another by Rubinstein. That the music of this school has become popular within the past few years is an undisputed fact, but it is to be feared that this popularity is more largely due to a fad than it is to a careful study of the music itself.

However, the public demands the works of Russian composers and such music is furnished, and it is only a question of time to develop how much foundation there is for the demand.

The symphonic suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a delightful composition, which suggests in every beat of the conductor's baton the fragrant and picturesque orient, and there is a gorgeousness, if it can be so expressed, about that appeals strongly to the senses, and illustrates vividly the several passages of the suite, but more particularly the ruin of the ship against the rocks.

The playing of Mr. Lhevinne of the Rubinstein concerto in E-flat major showed that as a virtuoso he is all that has been claimed for him. To those who heard him for the first time it was a revelation, and to those who were familiar it was a delight. The conberto itself is one that affords ample opportunity for a display of technical work upon the part of the pianist, and of this Mr. Lhevinne took every advantage, and there is no doubt that he is a great pianist.

Full of charm and a mass of true melody, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" brought the program to a close, and that it was fully appreciated was made manifest by the more than liberal applause bestowed upon the playing. Mr. Fiedler has already shown that there is a marked improvement in the work of the orchestra, and a greater attention to detail, which in the last few seasons had allowed to become somewhat lax. The program of last evening's concert in full was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(In memory of the composer, who died June 21, 1908.)
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major ..... Rubinstein
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84 ..... Beethoven

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will be given Tuesday evening, Feb. 3.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,
JANUARY 2, 1909

MISCHA ELMAN

THE VIOLINIST AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

His First Appearance Here Yesterday—The Passion of His Playing and Its Exciting and Transforming Power—His Intensely Modern Spirit—The Qualities That He Brought to Tschaikowsky's Concerto and Their Effect Upon It and His Audience—The Youth and His Career in Europe

Mischa Elman's playing is the product of pure passion—passion for his violin, passion for its range and resource, passion for its beauty and power of voice, passion for his music, for the exact re-creation of it and for the completest and most communicative expression of all that it contains. Twenty passions, perhaps, shape and vitalize his playing, but the deepest, the fullest, the most commanding of them all is the passion for the uttermost and the irresistible expression. Thereby he is, or he seemed yesterday, when he played for the first time in Boston at the Symphony Concert, the most modern of violinists. For into him, young as he is, has entered the consuming passion for expression—of himself, his medium, his material—as it has not penetrated and possessed even Mr. Ysaye or Mr. Kreisler. It is the distinguishing and devouring passion of our time in every one of the arts, and in music most of all. To make the voice of poetry and of prose, the line and color of painting, the contours and the planes of sculpture, the tones of music, the varied impartments of the actor, yet more finely and largely, more vitally, truly, and potently expressive, is the restless and torturing goal, each in its kind, of our artistic generation. The composer strives for it in music, like Strauss or Debussy, Mahler or d'Indy, and still more, perhaps, the executive artist. It is the ceaseless goad, for example, that drives Mr. Paderewski to more and more strenuous eloquence or to finer and finer suggestion with the piano. It is the life itself of Mischa Elman's playing of the violin.

Therein is the wonder of him. Out of some obscure village in South Russia; the son of a poor Jewish school master; unlettered, almost uncouth; endowed only with instinctive and absorbing aptitude for the violin, he passed by a happy chain of discovery and circumstance to the teaching of Auer, the Russian master. He emerged from the conservatory a prodigy, who was not a prodigy, because already his talents had flowered into a youthful maturity. Managers, audiences, all sorts and conditions of men tried to keep him a prodigy. He himself hated the name, the position, the attributes. He was Mischa Elman, the violinist, be his years fourteen or sixteen, as they were then, or eighteen, as they are now, and as a violinist, independent of time or place or any transitory quality, he would have men know him, judge him and then yield to him He went to and fro among the concert-rooms of Europe, steadily widening his world. He has now come to those of America. In these years, the very quality and accent of our artistic time have swiftly ripened in him, and uniquely among violinists. He has the affection for his instrument that every virtuoso must feel to win its secrets; but his is a passionate, a dominating affection. In a passionate quest he has searched out its resources, and as passionately mastered them until they serve him equally and at will. Then he has searched his music as ardently, affectionately, intelligently. His hearers shall know the exact substance, comprehend the full design, note the smallest detail of it. Still more shall they feel the passion that is in it and in him as he re-creates it. He would wring from it the last drop of expressive quality, the last hint of emotional suggestion. If it is songful he would raise it to the utmost pitch of impassioned melody; if it is stressful of rhythm and accent he would intensify this pulse. If every measure brings its technical exaction he would make such difficulties seem a part of its substance and spirit. If it is music of ornament he would give it the dazzling and transporting passion of rapturous bravura. Above all, passion and expression—full-blooded passion, vivid and vitalizing expression, so restless and so eager that it can barely pause for repose, and then rests that it may go only the faster and the farther to new intensities.

The passion, moreover, is irresistible to his hearers. There is nervous intensity in the presence of this youth—short of stature, slender below the waist, stocky above it, broad of shoulder, large of head, strong-chinned, Tartar-nosed, clear-eyed, high of forehead, resolute, alert, energetic, strong to the utmost of vitality, of sensation, of eagerness. Hear him in private talk, and his words come in quick, warm flood; his features play in incessant underscoring of them; he springs to his feet; he walks the floor; he leans over his companions in the energy with which the idea, the mood, the reaction of the moment possesses him; and in his eagerness to make them know and feel it. Watch him as he comes to the stage in the concert-room and waits for his instrument to enter. He has the self-possession of routine, but it is a nervous and eager self-possession. He is perceptibly straining to be free, to set to his violin and his music, to release the passion and the power hot within him. He begins and his playing and all that he would put into it wholly absorb and possess him. He sways, he "weaves," his body bends to the contour of his music and his head moves to the accent of it. And for once these things seem no trick of manner before an audience. They are as natural as inescapable, as his leapings to his feet in his own rooms. They are a part of the nervous intensity, the sheer passion that for the time control him. Quickly a similar passion, a similar quality possess his hearers.

For the first time yesterday, within long memories of the Symphony Concerts, an audience broke into applause in the midst of one of the movements of a concerto, and it was less of approval and of pleasure than of nervous relief and reaction from the strain under which the violinist, momentarily pausing, had held his hearers. It came again spontaneous, ardent, insistent, exciting, at each normal halt in the music, and most of all at the end. Even then the passion of his spirit was still strong upon Mr. Elman. The audience might have been the choice and final arbiter of the fate of violinists in the warmth of his acknowledgements. The orchestra had been zealous in accompaniment and loud in applause, and Mr. Elman must needs shake its hand by the proxy of Mr. Hess. Mr. Fiedler had conducted as though his fortunes as well as Mr. Elman's were at stake, and the violinist overflowed with gratitude. The passion of all these things, great and small, was sincere.

Mr. Elman had played Tschaikowsky's concerto, played it as though it were in his blood, with his warm pulse of life beating steadily in it, and with a bewitchment that made it seem like new, strange, wholly transformed music. Impressions came and went like the turning and the flashing of the glass in a kaleidescope. Now the sweep of his bow, the power and the elasticity of his arm, gave his tone breadth, richness, vitality. Now the adroit delicacy of that same bowing filled the tone with lights and shadows. His rhythm leapt and stung. His accenting of the cadenza had made it seemingly spring to life under his bow. The technical feats, the technical exactions, with which Tschaikowsky filled the first and the last movements are an old story. They traverse the whole range of the violin—runs, harmonics, double-stopping, staccati, what you will. Unquestionably Mr. Elman accomplished them; but recollection of them came back in a blur. For he had achieved them so that they seemed neither feats nor exactions; they were of the piece taking its passionate course; they were normal means that the violinist was charging with imparting force; they had seemed the rapturous speech of the music. Between these two movements had come the idealized folk song of the andante, and Mr. Elman had sung it with sustained but subdued passion, with a soft, clear beauty of edgeless and undulating tone that had carried it to shadowy and haunting loveliness. The equality, the fusion of all these traits and things was the sum of these impressions. Mr. Elman's technical feats had been no more perfect in their kind than his singing of the canzonetta. His unfolding of the melody in the first allegro had been no whit less fascinating than the sweep and bite of his rhythms in the folk-dances of the finale. The power of his tone in the cadenza had been neither more nor less than its pervading beauty. He had been clarity and crispness itself in as intricate "passage-work" as the ingenuity of composer has often devised. The comprehensiveness, the balance of his playing made the marvel of it. So far as the concerto gave him room, he had poured the whole art of the violin into it.

And the passion was as comprehensive, as pervading, as equal and as diversified. César Thomson gains the beauty of his tone seemingly by a kind of devilish ingenuity. Ysaye achieves it by the amplitude of his power, Kreisler accomplishes it by an exquisite sensitiveness. With Mr. Elman the means are pure passion for the beauty, the range, the poignancy, the richness, the endless coloring of the voice of the violin. As some will have it, as Balzac himself had it, there are spirits imprisoned in these stringed and fretted and varnished shells. If it be so, not one of them might resist such passion as that with which Mr. Elman plies or persuades, goads or woos them to voice. He is as passionately insistent upon the coloring and the accent of their tones. Those who are cool-blooded enough to follow his playing of the concerto, score in hand, say that there is not a mark of expression in it that Mr. Elman does not follow to the letter. He enriches the music no less with imaginings and impulses of his own to changeful pace or varying stress of accent. Already the crowning artistry of the violinist that colors and shades tone through the skill of bow and fingers, spurred and ordered by the expressive impulse behind, is at its command. His tone is prismatic when he wills; luminous when he wills, shadowed, misty, radiant, suffused. The discernment, the sensitiveness, the means to do what these prompt, all dwell in him. There was like passion in his technical accomplishments. They were neither calculated nor ostentatious. They came and went with an intoxicating freedom. So unobtrusive were they that the uninitiated might never have suspected their existence. Double-stopping, harmonics, runs, staccati—he made them seem as so much rapturous and impassioned song, of themselves stirring him to warmer and warmer expression. As for rhythms, they beat throughout with irresistible vitality. The ear felt their quivering sinew. Fancy ran with them.

Thus the whole concerto seemed to live with a new life. Tschaikowsky at maturity toiled long upon it, and now this youth made the music a magnificent and rapturous improvisation. The first melody of the allegro seemed gradually to broaden and deepen under Elman's hand to warm and ardent song. With equal penetration, dexterity and imagination he wove the "passage work" into a gleaming or a shadowy web of many strands. If the violin were in dialogue with the orchestra, it seemed to command or to persuade it. The band followed where the solo instrument lead. The triumphant rhapsody of technical prowess that precedes the fantasia was like a climax to the song. The cadenza rose, with a kind of stark power, to its own striding rhythms. In the andante, the clarinets rippled to the song of the violin and the horns at their softest flowed with it. The whole was of an exquisitely suffused and softly ardent beauty. Then the violin leapt into the melodic and the rhythmic riot of the finale, and for once there was no thought of its repetitions. To each, Mr. Elman brought some new and more intense stress of rhyth[illegible]

[122]

ADVERTISER

JANUARY 2, 1909

A VIOLIN PRODIGY AT THE SYMPHONY

MISCHA ELMAN CONQUERS BOSTON WITH HIS ART

A Fully Equipped Virtuoso at 16 —Orchestra Played From Nicolai and Strauss.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Nicolai—Overture on "Ein Feste Burg."
Tschaikowsky—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mischa Elman.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration."

The programme was chiefly modern in spite of the fact that Nicolai belongs to the first half of the 19th century. How much music the tune of "A strong castle is our Lord" is responsible for! It was the war-cry of the Reformation, this chorale, and there is an irresistible power in its measures that speaks of the inflexible determination of its singers. When the Protestant went into battle, he sang it; when he went to dreary imprisonment this tune with its confident words was his solace; when he went as a martyr to the stake "Ein Feste Burg" was to him as the "Ave Maria" to the Catholic.

Therefore Bach has made a Cantata of it; Raff has built it into an overture; Meyerbeer has had it played and sung in the "Huguenots"; Mendelssohn has used it as the foundation of his "Reformation Symphony"; George E. Whiting has spun it into his "Henry of Navarre"; Wagner has thundered it forth in his "Kaiser-Marsch." And here we have the melodic Nicolai, whose "Merry Wives of Windsor" is a masterpiece, again using it in overture form. Apart from its tremendous historical associations and its powerful words, the tune itself is finely adapted for counterpoint. Who wrote it? No one can say with certitude, although we know that Luther wrote the words.

The overture began grandly with the theme given out by full orchestra and organ. This is a much more effective method than the one adopted by Mendelssohn, who introduced the melody on flute alone, and then worked it up through the orchestra. Nicolai gives much excellent fugal work in this version and achieves a result much broader and more fitting than that attained by Raff when working up the same chorale into an overture.

Mischa (which means Michael) Elman is more than a prodigy,—he is an artist. It was a fitting introduction of this young phenomenon to Boston to have him appear at the Symphony Concerts for his debut,—an advantage which his more youthful predecessors of the bow, Reuter and Vecsey, did not have,—we question whether they so well deserved it.

Elman fairly conquered Boston with his brilliancy of work. He is not exactly an infant phenomenon, for he has attained the age of sixteen. But one cannot often find a full-fledged artist at so early an age. He has a sympathetic tone, much breadth, especially in passages on the G string, his harmonic tones are pure and birdlike, in double-stopping he is sure as a rock, his bowing is free and unconstrained, and altogether he is a fully equipped virtuoso and a musician as well.

It was small wonder therefore, that he won an absolute triumph. The public were aroused by his work as we have seldom seen them. He is likely to become the chief musical star, in instrumental work, of this season, if we except Paderewski.

The work which he played was less to be commended. While we do not agree with the great critic Hanslick, who abused it with Billingsgate, we nevertheless think it one of the weakest of Tschaikowsky's compositions. The first movement is almost constant display of the soloist; the second has some rather monotonous Russian melancholy, and the finale is too evidently an attempt at the extremes of folk-music. We feel that the great success here achieved was rather a personal one, a victory of Master Elman and not of Tschaikowsky.

We are always deeply moved by Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." It is a lofty theme loftily treated. When we compare this powerful tone-poem on the greatest topic in the world (and partly out of it) with the same glowing orchestration applied to celebrating himself as a hero, or to giving us an idea of his wife and baby, we feel doubly that hero is the right method in the right place. It was also interesting to study this picture of Death so soon after we had heard Tschaikowsky's tone-poem on the same topic; the one epic, the other personal; the one Miltonian, the other suggesting Hugo in its poetic realism. The one yields to the victory of the grave, the other triumphs over it. This is to us the highest Strauss, the noblest orchestral poet of recent times.

We have had this work often enough in recent years for all our concert-goers to become familiar with its salient points. We need not therefore spend much time in describing them. It is rather of the reading given by Mr. Fiedler that we should speak, and here we can eulogize heartily. It is very evident that Mr. Fiedler is one of the most painstaking of conductors. He makes every figure, every sub-theme, have its due prominence. Yet he is not a mere drillmaster; he throws himself into his work with an abandon that proves that he feels its every measure.

Yet in the first part, the picture of the sick-room, we found some exaggeration; the art of concealing art was not always present. There was nervous vigor, rather than sustained power. But the performance gained as it proceeded and at the end we felt that we had never had the transfiguration, which is the climax, given so powerfully and clearly.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra Goes Elsewhere —Albert Spalding, the Violinist, for the First Time—Mr. Lhevinne and Mr. Gabrilowitsch for Pianists—"The Kneisels" and Debussy—The Flonzaley Quartet Returns —The Apollo Club in Light Pieces

The Symphony Orchestra departs Sunday evening on the third of its monthly journeys to New York and cities farther south, and therefore, it will give no concerts here on Friday and Saturday of next week. Mischa Elman, the violinist, accompanies the band to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, and then Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, joins it to appear at Hartford and at Springfield. In New York Mr. Elman will play twice with the orchestra —an unusual distinction—next Thursday evening in Beethoven's concerto, and next Saturday afternoon in Brahms's. Elsewhere he will repeat Tschaikowsky's. For New York, Mr. Fiedler has put on his programmes Noren's "Variations," still unperformed there; Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the dances from Grétry's "Cephalus and Procris." The orchestra will not return to Boston until Wednesday morning, Jan. 13.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 2, 1909

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Mischa Elman Scores a Notable Success in Violin Solos

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, scored a sensational success yesterday afternoon as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. A young man of 18 years, compactly built, underneath average height, he played with astonishing authority, and his personal presence was a force with which to be reckoned.

Mr. Elman—one is inclined to say "Master Elman"—has seen some five years of wide experience as a travelling virtuoso. Perhaps his bearing savored slightly of the assurance of successful and self-confident youth, and such assurance is not displeasing. But there was more. How many of the famous virtuosi that we hear nowadays step out upon the platform with the stamp of great music already upon them? The vast majority might be butchers or bakers or soap-sellers, who having done their trick, could gracefully and appropriately retire into the commonplace of a mundane existence. When Elman appeared, there was in his face something of what he was to do.

It has never been our experience to hear the Tschaikowsky concerto played so characteristically, with such fire and passion, and yet with superb authority, self-control and a strong prevailing sense of form. One did not consider the violinist's splendidly adequate technic, or whether he was giving an "individual" reading of the work, or any other of those moot points of the modern auditor. There was only room for the consciousness of intense, vitally engrossing, if sometimes vulgar, music, speaking for itself. Even at the beginning the hearer anticipated the end, and was conscious, in some measure, of the course that the intervening pages were to take. As this implies, Elman's conception of the work was that of a very mature artist, arrived at the stage where, with the versatility and the perceptions of one who has seen and thought, he is fitted to grasp and convey another's message. This playing glowed with energy and inspiration, but the player's feet were always on the solid ground. Notably clear-sighted and healthfully vigorous it all was, but never stolidly sane or insensitive to the most subtle impulse of the music. Elman's technic rests on the firm foundation of a clear head and sound nerves, and such are the artists that we need today.

For at least eight years of Boston Symphony concerts—the writer's experience of them extends no further back—concerts where in the course of two or three seasons the most of the world's great artists appear, no audience heretofore has been guilty of breaking loose and applauding wildly during the orchestral tutti that follows the first passage of the soloist. That is what happened yesterday.

The concerto itself has rarely so great a composition. What some call its barbarism and its coarseness was not suppressed or veneered, but it all proceeded, we felt, from a strong, if over-emotional, man, and such was the artistry employed that passages which might have been hollow or redundant had distinction and appeal. The cadenza of the first movement was a demonstration of absolute mastery from every technical and esthetic standpoint. The longing, reminiscent romanza was sung with the ardor and the languor and the sensuousness that it demands, but it was never cloying. The finale went at a breakneck speed, with the savagery and the boundless energy of a Russian dance. Its mechanical difficulties were cleanly and authoritatively surmounted, and it was only the wilful and natural digressions of the composition that now and then slackened for an instant the headlong pace, while there was always abundance of tone to cope with the heavy orchestra. It was a memorable performance. If time for the succeeding applause had been subtracted from the 10-minute intermission that particular intermission would have

---

SUNDAY GLOBE-

JANUARY 3, 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mischa Elman Soloist at the Symphony.

Old-Time Free Singing Competitions to be Revived Here.

Albert Spalding's Debut—Recitals of the Week.

Mischa Elman, a young Russian violinist not yet out of his "teens," created unusual enthusiasm at the last Symphony rehearsal and concert by his wonderful performance of Tschaikowsky's D major concerto, a composition which was declared some years ago to be too difficult to play. Elman's playing bordered upon the phenomenal, and his hearty reception was thoroughly merited, for commendatory superlatives are his due when speaking of his interpretation of the immensely intricate work. His debut here was a musical sensation, and twice in the first movement the orchestra was interrupted by tumultuous applause after the interludes of the violin.

He appeared a trifle nervous when facing the audience as a passive performer, but the first few measures of action dissipated this feeling and immediately his playing disclosed a beautiful resonant intonation, as though a man and not a youth was the interpreter. He possesses confidence, in fact is quite authoritative in manner, and there is no lack of enthusiasm and earnestness in his playing.

He plays as if he loved his art, and this attitude is a great factor in his success, for there are no "frills" with which to gain applause. He is the true artist and not the player who strives to gain plaudits by individual eccentricities.

His technique is of the highest grade, clarity, smoothness and flexibility of fingering ran through all his work, and the depth of his lower notes had the timbre of the cello. The instrument evidently was one of great value, for the tone throughout was rich and sweet. One feature of Elman's achievements was the unerring accuracy of his fingering, no matter what the tempo was or whether in single notes or chord passages.

Clean-cut purity in all kinds of octaves, in double stops, chord runs and harmonics were always at his command, and in the lyric passages the cantabile quality of his work was exquisite. In the cadenzas there were effects that fairly scintillated.

If the audience could have had its way Elman would have been forced to play indefinitely, but "no encores" were given, though young Elman had to make many a journey back to the platform and bow to his applauding auditors and fellow players.

The program opened with Nicolai's religious festival overture, an impressive composition to which the organ gives a dignified background. There was no chorus, which omission made some of the lighter orchestrated parts sound a little thin. The work was given effectively, especially in the opening movement with the organ accompaniment. The concerto was also performed in fine spirit, though the phenomenal solo work was the most interesting and the principal feature.

Mr Fiedler gave a vigorous and at times an ear-piercing performance of the Strauss number, "Death and Transfiguration"; but it was in the accepted vein or mood and was received with considerable applause. There will be no concerts this week, the orchestra being on tour.

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1909.

There is little doubt the Boston Symphony orchestra has made no mistake in allowing Springfield this season three of the limited number of out-of-town concerts that can be given. The audience at Court Square theater which last evening heard the second concert of the series was as large as at the first, and if anything even more enthusiastic. It was a concert that could hardly fail to stir the pulse. The soloist was Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and the pianiste who can equal his performance might almost be counted up on the fingers of one hand. The conductor was Max Fiedler, and at the very beginning of his American experience Springfield had an opportunity to show how greatly it liked him. And the program could for its purpose hardly have been bettered.

Among the interesting remarks in the posthumous autobiography of Theodore Thomas, who has had few equals as a program maker, was his statement that he had found it easy to interest a general audience with Beethoven and Wagner; the difficulty came in finding any other composer whose music was equally certain of appreciation, and the problem was not solved till Tschaikowsky's music came into vogue. His judgment was strikingly justified in the concert last night. Mr Fiedler gave his hearers the finest symphony by Beethoven for an opening and two of the loveliest orchestral compositions by Wagner to close. And to make the recipe complete Mr Gabrilowitsch put in for good measure the great piano concerto by Tschaikowsky. How could an audience not be pleased? In one particular only did the program deviate from Mr Thomas's most successful formula—he made it a rule to put a short work before a symphony to give the audience time to quiet down. Last evening it was not necessary; an expectant hush had come over the theater before Mr Fiedler raised his baton for the fateful first notes of the symphony. Nor was there at any time a relaxation of this close attention; it was an even more flattering evidence of appreciation than the prompt and spontaneous applause that followed each number.

The reception of Mr Fiedler showed that his hearers had fresh in mind the pleasure they had received at the earlier concert, and the performance of the symphony stirred fresh enthusiasm. There was nothing on the program that called for quite such a "demonstration" on the part of the conductor as his brilliant and unusual interpretation of the "Oberon" overture at the first concert. Perhaps, too, his demonstrativeness has already been checked a little in the Boston tepidarium, though it was New York which was most shocked at the spectacle of a Boston conductor showing enthusiasm. However that may be, the spirit of his conducting has suffered no chill. Strong, firm, and exalted was his reading of the fifth symphony. Dr Muck used to pass over the famous "Fate" phonic easily, as though disdaining to make much of it. Mr Fiedler is not ashamed of the old emphatic way; here as elsewhere his readings are broader, more elementary, more obvious—better fitted to move a great audience. Yet there was no lack of fineness, even of delicacy, and the flow of the lovely andante was as smooth, exquisite and eloquent as can be imagined. Among all symphonic movements this ranks highest as a favorite, with the possible exception of the allegro of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and the public is not far wrong in its preferences. It is perhaps these wonderful variations that make this symphony beloved above the "eroica" or the seventh, yet its superiority lies no less in the ideal harmony of the entire work—a harmony far above the mechanical union of the movements by the use of common themes. Wherein lies this felicity of proportion, style, mood, theme, construction and color can hardly be defined; it can only be felt, and the greatest masters have not always attained it. In the C minor symphony its mark is unmistakable, and to most hearers even the triumphant outburst at the end is not too much drawn out; its very repetitions drive the stamp in deep.

In comparison with this grave beauty, this Promethean fire, this classic restraint, this indomitable assertion of the will to follow a straight course, the famous Tschaikowsky concerto shows for rococo. It belongs to an age and a race more mixed in character, more scant of faith, more subtle and more emotional. For sheer physical thrill what is there to compare with its first page—unless it be its last. The shock is electric, it stirs every fiber. And between—what lovely music, mixed here and there with cheaper materials, shading narrowly at times the edge of the commonplace. Out of his plain stuff Beethoven toiling with pursed lips, altering, revising, polishing, has shaped a perfect thing; the greatest of Russians has heaped up music of gorgeous splendor, passionate, powerful, inspired, and has just missed the mighty grasp of mind and will which forces everything into its true relation to the rest. It comes close to being the greatest of all the works of its kind, yet its defects are precisely those which make its permanence doubtful. Its appeal is direct to the nerves, and the nerves are notoriously fickle.

To-day at any rate no concerto can more confidently be counted upon to stir an audience when it is played by so superb an artist as Mr Gabrilowitsch. Possibly it does not bring out his special qualities so richly as the Chopin concertos, in which he must be almost unsurpassed; it demands massiveness almost as much as energy, and his playing is not quite massive. It is, however, extremely beautiful, and not lacking in power of an intense and concentrated sort. Really splendid was the elastic energy of his attack in the great chord passages, yielding a tone of great volume and remarkable purity. No less admirable was his fleet and supple technic in the bravura passages, and his cantabile is always of rare charm. He was recalled at least half a dozen times, and only the removal of the piano permitted the concert to proceed. The two Wagner selections, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," two of the loveliest things Wagner composed for orchestra, were both beautifully played, and brought to a close one of the finest symphony concerts Springfield has ever enjoyed. There can be no doubt as to the revival this year of a notable interest in orchestral music, and for this the credit must go to Mr Fiedler, who has given ideal programs and conducted them admirably. It is to be hoped that his American experience will not close with the

[123]

THE SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, JANUARY 3, 1909

GIFTED VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mischa Elman, Young Artist of Unusual Talent, Makes First Appearance.

MASTERLY PLAYING OF TSCHAIKOWSKY PIECE

Impressive Performance of Strauss' Tone Poem, 'Death and Transfiguration.'

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 11th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mischa Elman, violinist, played for the first time in this city. The program was as follows:

Overture on the choral, "A Safe Stronghold".....Nicolai
Concerto for violin.....Tschaikowsky
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss

Nicolai's overture, written originally for orchestra, chorus and organ, was once a favorite piece at concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society. There was no chorus last night when the overture was played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time. It was once the fashion to build musical works of various kinds on a choral. The Germans have not wholly abandoned the custom, witness the orchestral variations by Georg Schumann on one, and the French have a trick of introducing a choral in unexpected places. Nicolai's overture is at least 65 or 66 years old and it was no doubt a conventional piece at the time of the first hearing. When the chorus is employed the sonority of the opening measures is impressive if only through tonal weight.

Without the chorus these pages are effective. But the contrapuntal treatment that follows is rather cut-and-dried, and the second subject and the use made of it do not enhance the dignity of the choral. The overture was perhaps appropriate at the beginning of the year by reason of Luther's hymn. The inherent musical interest did not in itself warrant the introduction of the overture into the repertory of the orchestra.

Young Mr. Elman is indeed a remarkable violinist. His reputation had preceded him. When he first appeared in European cities as an infant phenomenon, we were assured by grave critics that this boy had the masculine grasp and the emotional qualities of a mature and sensitive artist. Long articles were written about him, inquiries of a psychological nature. It was considered extraordinary that a child played emotional music with the right emotion when he could not have experienced this emotion.

Mr. Baughan attempted to explain the matter by saying that music carries its own emotions. "The performer has it ready-made for him if he does but understand the language." A prodigy, a wonder-child is a musical child of abnormally sensitive mind and body. There were some that preferred the theory of reincarnation, and they believed that a musical soul had entered into the boy's body. Admit spiritual transmigration. How did the boy acquire the ability to play passages which would baffle ordinary students for years? When Elman was asked about his practising, he answered, "I would play for about 20 minutes, and then if I found I could not get the effect I wanted I would stop and think, until I felt how it should be." Here, then, was a boy violinist who actually thought, and thus he furnished a footnote to the old saying: "To some God gives brains; to others, to play on the fiddle."

If there were doubting Thomases at the concert last night they were convinced before the end of the first movement of the concerto that Mr. Elman's great reputation is fully warranted. It is seldom that any famous violinist at the zenith of his fame has so many admirable qualities. It is not necessary to dwell upon the pure intonation, the beauty of tone, now warm, full, sensuous, now exquisitely delicate, keen rhythmic feeling, the astounding mastery of technical difficulties. Mr. Elman has more than all this. He has the rare gift of interpreting Tschaikowsky's concerto as though the music were in a sense his own. His interpretation is in a way a creation.

The music had more dignity, beauty, fire by reason of his own individuality in expression. Nor is he a young man of one concerto. In New York, for instance, he will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra this week the concerto by Brahms and also Beethoven's. It would be interesting to compare the three performances for a violinist may be able to play effectively music by Beethoven and Brahms and yet be tame and even dull with the concerto of Tschaikowsky. According to the testimony of sound and experienced judges, Mr. Elman's best and highest qualities are revealed in each one of these concertos. That is to say, he is wholly rounded as an interpreter. His individuality accomodates itself to that of each one of the composers.

It is easy to declare with an air of portentous wisdom that Mr. Elman is a "born violinist"; that he is a "genius"; but these statements do not solve the mystery of such rare apparitions in the musical world. Here is a youth, who, born obscurely in Russia, is now, at the age of 16 or 17, ranked with the two greatest violinists now living. He is already illustrious, not merely as a virtuoso of the highest rank but as a master of purely musical and aesthetic interpretation. Here is a great mystery. Fortunately it is not necessary to solve it in order to have supreme enjoyment.

To those who are acquainted with the history of Tschaikowsy's concerto the superb performance of last night was not without its irony. Tschaikowsky wrote the concerto intending that Leopold Auer should play it. Auer for some reason or other pronounced the work impossible, and he did not try to conquer its difficulties. The composer went so far as to accuse Auer of intriguing against it. Yet Auer years afterward played it brilliantly, and now his pupil, Elman, ennobles a concerto that to many hearers, warm admirers of Tschaikowsky, has seemed a stumbling-block.

Mr. Fiedler gave a singularly impressive performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which is the noblest of Strauss' symphonic poems. Others are more extraordinary bizzare, if you will have the word, but "Death and Transfiguration" is imaginative without the suspicion of a too deliberate desire to make the bourgeois sit up. It is to be classed with "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," but in its loftiness of sentiment it is above them. The magnificent climax was built up with great skill by Mr. Fiedler.

There was continuity that was irresistible. Performances of this work have been given when the "Transfiguration" section was not given time for majestic development, or the section seemed divided into episodes without close connection. Under Mr. Fiedler's direction, these pages of inspired music were as the apotheosis of the human race after the disappointments, sorrows, tragedies of daily life. Man is after all a noble animal, and this music is as the eloquent justification of his nobility even in the grave.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1909

A correspondent complains that while Mischa Elman, the violinist, appeared here at only a single pair of Symphony Concerts, he is playing with the orchestra at two of its concerts in New York this week, so that its public there will have twice the opportunity that it gave to its audiences in Boston to hear him. Unfortunately, perhaps, in the case of so notable a violinist as Mr. Elman, it is not the custom of the Symphony Orchestra to engage a singer or a virtuoso for more than a pair of concerts in Boston in the course of a single season. In New York, moreover, only Mr. Paderewski and Mr. d'Indy have hitherto appeared with the orchestra at two separate and successive concerts. The exceptional public interest in Mr. Elman has warranted a third departure from custom. Here in Boston, however, he is likely to play again with orchestra, though not at the Symphony Concerts, before the season ends.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Concert Sale to Open.

The sale of seats for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, will open at Steinert's this morning. Two works that were announced for the first concert, but which Mr. Fiedler was unable to play, have been placed on the programme for the second concert. They are Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The soloist will be Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist.

Firemen Smoke.

Members of Hook and Ladder 10 on

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1909

SYMPHONY CROWD CAPTIVATED BY BOY

Marvelous Artistry of Elman Arouses Enthusiasm Almost to Frenzy.

Mischa Elman, the boy who looks like a man, the violinist who plays like a wizard, captivated the audience at Saturday night's Symphony concert. This juvenile phenomenon—who will be 18 years old, or, according to some of his biographers, only 17—two weeks from next Wednesday—made a brilliant success with one of the most difficult pieces ever written, the Tschaikowsky concerto; and thereby hangs an interesting tale. But before it is told it should be said that the applause after the first movement was almost unique in the history of Symphony concerts. It was enthusiastic almost to the verge of frenzy, and it lasted as long as did the final outburst that followed the concluding sweep of Elman's magical bow.

The story of the Tschaikowsky concerto and of Elman's extraordinary success with it may be told in a few words. The work was originally dedicated to Leopold Auer, a famous Russian virtuoso, but Auer said it couldn't be played. Later Brodsky, who appeared in Boston early in the nineties, made some success with it, and then Auer changed his mind. This all happened before Elman was born. Six years ago Elman went to St. Petersburg to study with Auer, and now this prodigious boy is traveling round the world making a sensation with the very concerto which his teacher lost the honor of having his name formally linked with.

Still another interesting fact is that the impressive first movement was played here just about twenty years ago by Bernhard Listemann, and Mr. Listemann was among those who enjoyed the performance Saturday night.

SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 3, 1909

Death and Transfiguration

A Memorable Performance at the 11th Symphony Concert

The programme of the 11th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Religious Festival Overture on the Chorale, "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott"..Otto Nicolai
Violin Concerto.....Tschaikowsky
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss

Mr. Mischa Elman, a violinist of extraordinary talent, was soloist, and yesterday the Post spoke of his triumph at the public rehearsal, a triumph the more gratifying in that it represented the appeal of sane, vital art, which, whether Mr. Elman had been 18 or 50, would have exerted the same electric effect upon the enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Fiedler, it is generally conceded, made one of his greatest successes thus far when he placed upon a programme Richard Strauss' overwhelming "Hero's Life," which will be repeated at the second pension fund concert of the season. No less remarkable and more uplifting were the performances of the "Death and Transfiguration" at the concerts last week. There is no question of one thing: that Richard Strauss, be his position what it may 300 years hence, is beyond question the authoritative voice of this period, that when he speaks he voices the wonderful impulses of this generation. No wonder that he appeals irresistibly to young musicians, to the rising conductor, Mr. Fiedler, and others of his ilk, of today. Has there ever been a more curious age? And that heaven-storming mind, in its dauntless questioning, would not be balked by anything in the sky above or the earth below. Is all that within the province of art? Yes, within the province of art that is growing greater, more profound, more expressive, more all-embracing every day of these amazing years. To me such art represents the greatest word, "Modernity."

This tone poem is among the earlier of Strauss' epoch-marking works. He has not wholly escaped Wagner's idioms, or, rather, when this influence is perceptible, he multiplies—the voice, mind you of this n'th power generation—he multiplies a hundredfold the emotional stress, for instance, of the dramatic episode that depicts the final climax of Tanhauser's struggle with the flesh and the spirit in Wagner's opera of that name. There is such a vortex of a reminiscence in "Tod und Verklarung."

It requires strong nerves to bear the strain of one of these torrential tone poems. Mr. Fiedler accomplished more than any conductor in our experience with the "Transfiguration" music—a dangerous test of the interpreter. In characters of fire he painted that soul-picture. Where, or when, are we to stop? Shall it soon be given to the Over-man whom Strauss is forever prophesying, to drink of the waters of Life and Death, and to Know?

Perhaps in a few generations the terrible depicting of the death chamber, the trance of introspection, and the dying man's last conflict with the last grim foe, will seem naive alongside the paintings of Richard Strauss the second, but for us of 1909 there is little in any art that goes deeper. Here and there in the score seems to be a patchy place, where the ends of a tremendous vision did not meet, where the inspired speech takes for a moment the tones of other men, but who else could have written the overpoweringly atmospheric beginning, the magnificently militant pages that represent man's struggle with fate, the warning of the trombones, and the psychological transition from death to victory? How very few composers—and conductors—could have so built up the ascending, victorious, rainbow-tinted apotheosis? And what more can we say of Mr. Fiedler's transcendant interpretation, than that it was equal to the great modern masterpiece?

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: JANUARY 10, 1909

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE CONCERT FOR TUESDAY.

A Fine Program to be Conducted by Mr Fiedler at Court Square Theater, With the Pianist Gabrilowitsch as Soloist.

The musical event of the coming week will, of course, be the second Boston symphony orchestra concert in the Court Square theater Tuesday evening at 8.15. This time the orchestra brings with it as soloist one of the most eminent pianists now before the public—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, whose work is not unknown in Springfield, as he has been heard here in the past in recital. Again Mr Fiedler shows that he knows how to make a most attractive program. For Tuesday evening four numbers have been selected, Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor No 1, "Waldweben" from Wagner, and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

This season is the centennial of what is perhaps the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies. It was played for the first time in the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, on December 22, 1808. The motives of the allegro, andante and scherzo of the symphony were sketched as early as 1800 or 1801. It is also known that he was working on it between 1804 and 1806 but before finishing it, put it aside to write the fourth symphony in B flat. It was finished in 1807 and dedicated to Prince von Lobkowitz and the Count Rasumoffsky. It was published in April, 1809. The first performance of this symphony in America, so far as can be found out, was at an academy concert in Boston on November 27, 1841. It held the place of honor at the first concert of the Philharmonic society of New York on December 2, 1842.

There are some who prefer the seventh symphony; there are a few who prefer the "Eroica" and many believe that the ninth in its full choral form is the greatest of Beethoven's works, but the public seems to have set on the fifth as the greatest of them all and by that symphony all symphonic works that have been written since that time have been judged. For 100 years it has remained the absolute standard of symphonic construction. Whatever the increase of instruments, the variety of colors that the modern symphonies have, they are all of them measured by this one work—the masterpiece of the master.

Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor which Mr Gabrilowitsch will play, had its first performance in public in Boston in the old Music hall on October 25, 1875, when Hans von Buelow was the pianist. In 1874 Tschaikowsky was the teacher of theory in the Moscow conservatory at a salary of $30 a month. At the end of that year he wrote his brother that he was absorbed in the composition of a pianoforte concerto and was hopeful of having Nicholas Rubinstein play it in his concert. The concerto was finished in February, 1875, but before that date he had played it to Nicholas Rubinstein, who thrust it aside as utterly commonplace and trivial. The result of this was that Tschaikowsky erased the name of Nicholas Rubinstein from the score and inserted in the dedication the name of Hans von Buelow, whom he had not yet seen. Von Buelow acknowledged the compliment and that same year played the work in Boston. One of the most interesting facts about this concerto is that it brought about a friendship between Tschaikowsky and the widow, Frau von Meck, who became so interested in his work that she gave him a sum of 6000 rubles annually, almost up to the time of his death. This friendship was of a most extraordinary character. The two, although they maintained a most constant correspondence, never in their lives met.

The "Waldweben" was arranged by Wagner for concert use from parts of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of "Siegfried." He gave it the title of "Waldweben" (Life and Stir of the Forest). It is one of Wagner's most exquisite pieces of tone painting and one of the most popular of his concert pieces. The final number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which needs no introduction to the Springfield public.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, was born in St Petersburg January 26, 1878, the son of a lawyer. His first teacher on the piano was his brother, and then Rubinstein advised his parents that they allow their son to become a professional pianist. He studied under Tolstoff in the St Petersburg conservatory and when he was 16 he took many prizes, among them the Rubinstein prize. In St Petersburg he was constantly under the supervision of Rubinstein, and in 1894 he went to Vienna, where he took a course of work with Leschetitzky. His first appearance in America was in November, 1900, and he has made several tours of this country since then.

[124]

CABLE ADDRESS, "EIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

Providence will have its first opportunity to hear with orchestra on next Tuesday evening Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, for on that night he appears here at the second of the Boston Symphony concerts, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Infantry hall. Lhevinne is now in America for the third time, but, curiously enough, he never played with the Boston Symphony until a week ago last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when he appeared at the regular Symphony concerts. He played then, as he will play in Providence, Rubinstein's concerto in E-flat Major, No. 5, a work with which he won a prize at the Moscow conservatory and which he alone of all pianists plays in this country. Everybody is familiar with the hackneyed Rubinstein concerto in D-Minor, but this later and infinitely greater work has been sadly neglected. This may be due in part to the enormous difficulties which attend its performance. Pianists who have studied the score do not hesitate to say that it is the most difficult of all works of its kind, demanding not merely fleet fingers and supple wrists, but enormous physical strength and endurance. It has all the qualities which characterize Rubinstein's works in the way of melody.

Owing to the length of the concerto and to the length of the "Scheherazade" suite, Mr. Fiedler has placed but three works on his program. The first number will be the "Scheherazade" suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which was promised for last concert, but could not be played owing to the illness of Mr. Sadony, the first bassoon. There was so much disappointment by the change that Mr. Fiedler promised to put it on the program of the second concert, which he has done. It is a long work in four movements, brilliant in color, brilliant in orchestration and full of enticing melody. The composer has drawn his inspiration for this work from the Orient, as he has in several things he wrote. As the name implies, the subject matter of the music is taken from the Arabian cycle, "A Thousand Nights and a Night," dear to the heart of the youngster under the name of Arabian Nights. "Scheherazade," is will be remembered, was the clever sultana who saved her own neck by telling her husband a new story every night until finally he was forced to admit that the life of one with such a vivid imagination could hardly be spared. She is personified in the suite by a solo violin which carries a characteristic theme. The suite is divided into four movements based on as many of the tales and it has long been one of the "show pieces" of the orchestra, although it has never been played in Providence.

The final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which was also on the last program but had to be omitted. Beethoven wrote the music incidental to Goethe's great drama and the overture is about all that is played today. It has for nearly a hundred years now excited the admiration of music lovers and despite the huge modern works with their enormous paraphernalia of expressed motion in tone, it remains the finest example of tone product that the literature of music possesses.

The concert will begin at 8:15 precisely,

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

evening exhibitions daily.

Seats for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra went on sale to-day at Steinert's. The concert will be given next Tuesday evening and Joseph Lhevinne, pianist, will assist in solo work. The orchestra programme will include Rinsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Schehrezade;" Rubinstein, Concerto for piano, No. 5, in E-flat; Beethoven, Overture in Goethe's "Egmont."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Monday evening, January 25th, in Convention Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert in this city, an event which to music lovers means the crowning musical achievement of the season in Buffalo.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will on this occasion make his first appearance in Buffalo.

After a year's absence in Germany, Prof. Willy Hess will also be back at his old post as concert master.

As in former seasons, the orchestra comes to Buffalo under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

BALTIMORE, MD

Boston Symphony.

The third Baltimore concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening, January 5. The performance will mark the first appearance in Baltimore of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Elman seems to have destroyed, for once at least, the well-founded tradition that an artist whose coming to America is preceded by vainglorious "puffs" never justifies them. In the last three years the dispatches have been full of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York a few weeks ago should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It is reported that he caused the greatest sensation any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. Elman will play at his initial appearance here Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D Major.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 5, at 4:20.

---

ne First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Seats for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra went on sale yesterday at Steinert's. The concert will be given next Tuesday evening and Joseph Lhevinne, pianist, will assist in solo work. The orchestra programme will include Rinsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Schehrezade;" Rubinstein, Concerto for piano, No. 5, in E-flat; Beethoven, Overture in Goethe's "Egmont."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Baltimore of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. Mischa Elman seems to be that very rare artist, who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe. He will play at his appearance here with the orchestra, Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

---

ss .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 5, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will mark the first appearance in Washington of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who created such an astounding success in New York at his debut ten days ago. Those who were present in Carnegie Hall when Elman made his debut say that they never witnessed such scenes of enthusiasm since Paderewski first appeared in that place seventeen years ago.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss .....

With Max Fiedler, the new conductor, wielding the baton; with Prof. Willy Hess, after a year's absence abroad, back in his old place as concert master, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 25, opening its brief season on tour. To music lovers, the Boston Smyphony Orchestra concert is the crowning achievement of the winter, and there will be the added novelty of watching the famous organization under its new leader, who has taken Boston by storm, and is claimed by many of the New York critics to be one of the greatest conductors the orchestra has ever had.

As in former years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Buffalo under the local management of Mrs. May Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place, who announces a mail order sale of seats in advance of the public sale. Prices will be $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents, according to location.

---

om .....

dress .....

te .....

DEC 27

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 4, and this concert assumes extra importance in that it will mark the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. In the last three years there has been much published of the achievements of this young Russian in Europe, and it was natural that his first appearance in New York, a few weeks ago, should have been greeted by an audience decidedly skeptical. It has now become a part of musical history that he caused the greatest sensation that any virtuoso has made in New York since Paderewski first came to this country. He seems, according to all accounts, to have everything which is needed to make a complete violinist—technique, temperament, taste and sound musicianship—and to have all these qualities in an extraordinary degree. He seems to have conquered New York as he conquered London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna. He will play here Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON SOUTHERN TOUR

Orchestra Will Visit Washington for Single Concert on January 5.

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra of ninety-seven pieces will make a Southern trip the early part of next month, visiting Washington, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

The trip will commence the first week in January. On January 4 the orchestra, under the leadership of Max Fiedler, conductor, will give a concert in Philadelphia.

On the following day, January 5, in Washington, and on January 6, in Baltimore, the full symphony orchestra, consisting of many of the best musicians in this and foreign countries, will give concerts. The manager for the trip is Charles A. Ellis, who for several years has been manager of the orchestra.

---

om .....

dress .....

e .....

The annual concert in Buffalo of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which this year takes place on Monday evening, January 25th, in Convention Hall, is one of the red-letter musical events in Buffalo's musical calendar. The concert of January 25th will be of unusual interest in that it will serve to introduce the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and will reintroduce the favorite concertmaster, Willy Hess, after his year of absence in Europe. The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is an affair which is not only of musical interest in the highest degree, but it is one which always brings out Buffalo's most representative audiences, and is a brilliant occasion from every viewpoint.

Mr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career, the performance of Fidelio in Hamburg, several years ago. His experience in programme-making has been great. He believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than 1¾ hours. The best programme, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure necessary contrasts in styles and schools.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and mail orders for seats may be sent to her at No. 26 Irving place, where they will be filled in the order of receipt. Prices, as in former years, will be $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents, according to location.

---

s .....

DEC 27

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 5, at 4:30.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS

s .....

The second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra will be given in Court Square theater on Tuesday evening, January 12, when Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist. Gabrilowitsch is down to play Tschaikowsky's magnificent concerto for piano in B flat minor No 1. This is one of the truly sensational works for piano and orchestra. It has a most imposing opening of solid chords on the piano against a runnig melody in the orchestra, and experience has shown that very few pianists are able to do it justice. Mr Gabrilowitsch played this with the Boston symphony orchestra in Boston a few weeks ago and had extraordinary success, such critics as Philip Hale saying that it had never been played so superbly. The other works on the program will be Beethoven's fifth symphony, considered by most as the greatest of the nine; "Waldweben" or "Forest Murmurings," in the second act of "Siegfried;" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The public sale of seats opens at the box office, Court Square theater, on Thursday, January 7.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

ess .....

DEC 27

At Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open a brief road tour, and Buffalo will get its annual opportunity of hearing this orchestra of world-wide fame. To most music lovers the yearly visit of Boston's great orchestra is the crowning achievement of the season and there is, if possible, greater interest in the event than ever before, as it will be the musical debut of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, while Prof. Willy Hess, after a year's absence in Germany, is back at his old post as concert master.

Fiedler's success at the head of the orchestra has been phenomenal. He was previously known in this country by reputation and also from the fact that as guest conductor he had appeared for a few times in New York, where he was welcomed as one of the greatest leaders of his time.

But when he went to Boston as the conductor of America's most famous musical organization, he won fresh triumphs and his work has been a revelation, while he is considered by many critics the greatest conductor the orchestra has ever had.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, will again be the local manager of the concert and mail orders for seats may be sent to her. Prices, as in former years, will be $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

---

m .....

dress .....

te .....

Second Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Court Square theater on Tuesday evening, Jan. 12, when Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist. Gabrilowitsch is down to play Tschaikowsky's magnificent concerto for piano in B flat minor No. 1. This is one of the truly sensational works for the piano and orchestra. It has a most imposing opening of solid chords on the piano against a running melody in the orchestra, and experience has shown that very few pianists are able to do it justice. Mr. Gabrilowitsch played this with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston a few weeks ago and had extraordinary success, such critics as Philip Hale saying that it had never been played so superbly.

The other works on the program will be Beethoven's fifth symphony, considered by most as the greatest of the nine; "Waldweben" or "Forest Murmurings" in the second act of "Siegfried," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The public sale of seats opens at the box office, Court Square theater, on Thursday, Jan. 7.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSICAL NOTES.

Two Notable Concerts During Christmas Week.—A New Choral Society.

Christmas week offers two notable concerts in the second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with an attractive programme and a great soloist, and the recital by Mischa Elman, the young Russian violin prodigy. On Tuesday evening the orchestra, with Josef Lhevinne, pianist, appears at Infantry Hall.

Lhevinne is now in America for the third time, but, curiously enough, he never played with the Boston Symphony until a week ago last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when he appeared at the regular Symphony concerts. He played then, as he will play in Providence, Rubinstein's concerto in E-flat major, No. 5, a work with which he won a prize at the Moscow Conservatory and which he alone of all pianists plays in this country. Everybody is familiar with the hackneyed Rubinstein concerto in D-minor, but, curiously enough, this later and infinitely greater work has been sadly neglected.

Of the orchestra numbers, the first will be the "Scheherazade" suite, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which was promised for the last concert but could not be played, owing to the illness of Mr. Sadony, the first bassoon. There was so much disappointment by the change that Mr. Fiedler promised to put it on the programme of the second concert, which he has done. It is a long work in four movements, brilliant in color, brilliant in orchestration and full of enticing melody. The composer has drawn his inspiration for this work from the Orient, as he has in several things he wrote. The final number will be Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which was also on the last programme, but had to be omitted. Beethoven wrote the music incidental to Goethe's great drama, and the overture is about all that is played to-day. It has for nearly a hundred years now excited the admiration of music lovers. The concert will begin at 8:15 precisely.

* * *

Of the young violinist, Elman, who appears at Memorial Hall Friday evening in the Students' Course, a writer records of his New York debut that "the first eight bars played told the story of a great success and a new real musical sensation, for one knew at once that here was no prodigy, but a master, virile in conception and execution, in force and emotion, one whose name is rightly coupled with that of the greatest masters since the great Joachim and Wieniawski. The demonstration of approval began after he finished the Cadenza in the first movement, which was superbly played, and with an enthusiasm that fairly swept the audience away. Cries of 'Bravo,' 'Bravo' came from every part of the house, interrupting the continuance of the movement, which, when at last ended, the audience broke out in a frenzy of applause. His second number brought out an encore, a simple Russian folk song, which was rewarded with actually 10 minutes of applause, but Elman would not add more."

Elman's programme here will include the following numbers:

Symphonie Espagnole.....Lalo
Sonate E-major.....Handel
(a) Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
(b) Etude Caprice.....Paganini-Auer
(a) Nocturne.....Chopin-Sarasate
(b) Caprice Ba[illegible].....Sarasate

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

At the Symphony Concert.

A large and brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall last evening for the second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the audience were noted Hon. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. Anna Ellis Dexter, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mr. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Geneva Jefferds, Miss Caroline Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan W. Littlefield, Mr. and Mrs. Horace G. Belcher, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Dempster, Mrs. John O. Tillinghast, Mrs. J. Earl Clauson, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Etta Fraser, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Miss Charlotte Remington, Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Thurston, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister, Miss Edith Nichols, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Margaret Dwight, Mr. James F. Phetteplace, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. Julian Hereshoff, Miss Eleanor B. Congdon, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Mr. and Mrs. Howard D. Wilcox, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. Charles A. Gale, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, Mrs. Grace L. Johnson, Miss Ada Johnson, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Miss Caroline Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Kent Goodwin, Mrs. Frank G. Spencer, Mr. Frank Spencer, Mrs. John M. Buffinton, Miss Buffinton, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Miss Harriett J. Miller, the Misses Willson, Mr. H. C. Ostby, Miss Ostby, the Misses Sherman, the Misses Vaughn.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSICAL NOTES.

Second Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Evening.

The musical event of the coming week will be the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall, on Tuesday evening. Judging from the enthusiasm created by the first concert, it seems likely that this will be the most successful season the Boston Symphony has had in Providence for many years. The Orchestra played with its wonted perfection of tone and technique and Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, won golden opinions not only from his programme, but from his manner of interpreting it.

It was, of course, unfortunate that at the last moment vital changes had to be made in the programme owing to illness in the orchestra, but Fiedler promised then that the works which were omitted, particularly Rimspy-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, which had been looked forward to with such eagerness, would be placed on the second programme. This he has done and he has also placed on the programme Beethoven's Egmont overture, which had to be omitted the time before.

Owing to the length of the Scheherezade suite and of the Rubinstein concerto, which Lhevinne will play, to bring the concert within the maximum length of two hours, it has been impossible to put more than three weeks on it. The Scheherezade suite plays for nearly 45 minutes. It has never been heard in Providence, although since it was first performed years ago under the conductorship of Emil Paur, it has been one of the "show pieces" of the orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master in the art of orchestration and he demands of an orchestra what seems to be almost impossibilities; because this is so, the suite is not often played by orchestras, as it is beyond the capacity of all but two or three in the world to do justice to it. This does not mean that the suite is heavy, tuneless music. On the contrary, it is most brilliant and melodious and the difficulty of its performance is not realized by those who hear it.

JOSEF LHEVINNE.
Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday.

The great Russian was several times drawn to Oriental subjects for his inspiration. In this, as is generally known, he has chosen for his subject certain stories from the great Arabian Cycle of "A Thousand Nights and a Night." In the suite the Sultana Scheherazade, who saved her own neck and those of her sisters by telling a story every night to her husband, is personified by the solo violin and the skill with which the composer uses his theme has aroused the admiration of musicians the world over. The suite is in four parts, the titles of which are as follows: I. "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship;" II. "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince;" III. "The Young Prince and the Young Princess;" IV. "Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion."

Josef Lhevinne, the soloist, had his first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He then played Rubinstein's concerto in E-flat No. 5, which he will play in Providence. It is a work of enormous difficulty and the ease with which he overcame them, tremendous passages, double octaves and the like, excited the enthusiasm of the audiences in Boston as no soloist has done this year.

Lhevinne has grown greatly in his art since he first came to this country and now may truly be said to be one of the very great pianists of the world.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture is fairly familiar to music lovers of Providence. It stands to-day, as it did when it was written, as one of the great tone tragedies in musical literature.

The concert will begin at 8.15 precisely.

CALVARY BAPTIST [illegible]

STAR

DEC 30

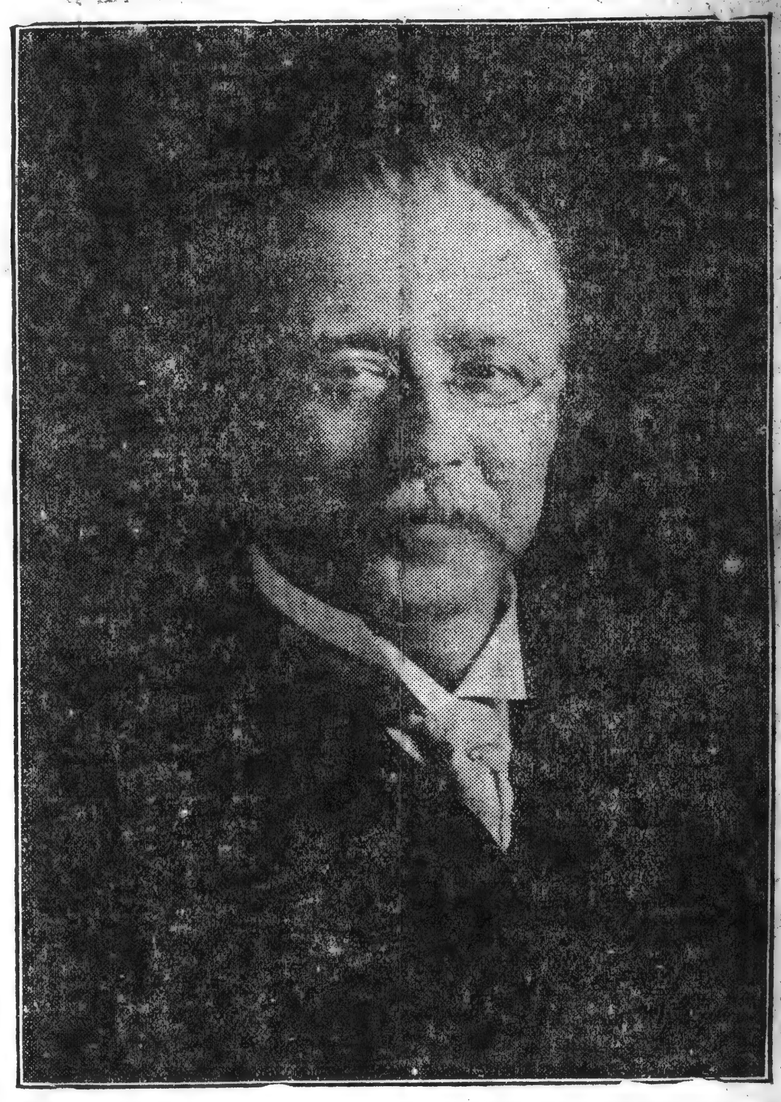
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, who is to make his debut in Washington with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major. He is to play eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, twice in Boston, twice in New York and once each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and with the exception of the concerts in New York he will make his first appearance in these various cities.

"HOMEIKE" NEW YORK NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DEC 29

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S CONDUCTOR



—Photo by Garo, Boston.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor,
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight brings the second of the three concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gives during the present season in Providence. The concert will be in Infantry hall, beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, and the program is as follows:

I. Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite "Scheherazade," (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night) Op. 35; 1, The Sea and Sindbad's Ship; 2, The Story of the Kalandar-Prince; 3, The Young Prince and the Young Princess; 4, Festival at Bagdad; The Sea; The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior; conclusion.

II. Rubinstein, fifth concerto (E-flat major) for pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniment, Op. 94; 1, allegro moderato; 2, andante; 3, allegro.

III. Beethoven, overture to "Goethe's "Egmont."

Boston Symphony Program.

Mr. Fiedler has once more shown his skill as a program maker in the list of works he has prepared for the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will be given in the Court Square theater Tuesday evening, Jan. 12. Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is the first work to be played, is one of the few symphonies which never seems to lose by repetition. The finest symphonies of Tschaikowsky, Schumann, Brahms, Schubert and other masters seem to grow stale if one hears them too often, but this tremendous "Fate" symphony of Beethoven's seems to gain with repeated hearings and one can listen to it many times in a season. Mr. Fiedler has won much fame as a conductor of Beethoven and his performance of it here is awaited with much interest. Again he shows his fondness for excerpts from Wagner's music dramas by placing on his program the lovely "Waldweben" which Wagner arranged from the "Forest" music of the second act of "Siegfried" and by ending his program by the stunning "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

The soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, than whom there are few greater pianists in the world, will play Tschaikowsky's first concerto for pianoforte, the one in B flat minor, which is one of the final tests of a pianist's virtuosity. Mr. Gabrilowitsch needs no introduction to Springfield and the inclusion of his name in the program is welcomed by all music lovers.

The sale of tickets will open at the box office Thursday, Jan. 7, but in the mean time those desiring may send n mail orders to the theater, with checks payable to D. O. Gilmore, and such orders will be filled in the order they are received before the opening of the public sale. Prices for the concert will be the same as last time, $1.50, $1, 75 cents and 50 cents.

[125]

DEC 30

Mischa Elman With Orchestra.

Tickets are now selling at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1115 Chestnut street, for the third Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening. This concert is made particularly notable by the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who recently created a furore in New York. He will play the Tschaikowsky concerto.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

Paderewski in January.

Paderewski sails for America the end of January for a tour of a few weeks, in which time he will be the soloist at several concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloist with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul Orchestras. He will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 2. Seats may now be reserved by mail.

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R I
DEC 30 1908

FINE MUSICAL TREAT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The excellence of the programme and its execution at the first concert, the skill of the new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, the announcement that the selections which were unavoidably omitted a few weeks ago would be rendered and the engagement of the noted Russian pianist, Josef Lhevinne, as the soloist, combined to attract an even larger audience to Infantry Hall last evening at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than was seen at the initial number of the series and no one in the large gathering was disappointed in any particular. The orchestra was at its best again, Mr. Fiedler conducted in the same masterly manner, with the same firm command of his musicians and the same skill in drawing out all their ability and talent, and the soloist won the admiration of his hearers and charmed them by his rare power in displaying the possibilities of the piano as a vehicle for music of the highest class.

The entire concert consisted of but three numbers, so long and difficult were the selections. First came the presentation by the orchestra of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which was at the last moment withdrawn from the programme of the last concert because of the illness of a member of the orchestra whose presence was essential to its production. Thre was much disappointment at that time at the substitution of another selection for this one which has never been given before last evening but is widely known as one of the show pieces of this orchestra. It is a difficult theme and within the power of but a very limited number of orchestras, but in the hands of the Boston Symphony it was entirely safe and was presented with a perfection of tone and technique to be expected of this organization of musicians and not to be looked for from many others.

The suite is in four parts, entitled "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. The music is brilliant and melodious and so skilfully rendered by the orchestra that its difficulty is not realized by the listener. The score is filled with high oriental coloring appropriate to the character of the composition and the audience is able to follow in a general way the theme of the story with the solo violin personifying the Sultana Scheherazada as she tells her nightly story to save herself and her sisters. There had been intense interest to hear this suite in its initial performance here by this noted orchestra and the favorable verdict of the audience upon both the selection and the manner of its presentation by the musicians was unmistakably expressed by the applause which was given at the pauses in the score and the silence which prevailed during the rendition of the parts. It was rare music for Providence and was intensely enjoyed.

The other orchestral number was also postponed from the first concert. This was Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont." This is a selection which is not new to local music lovers and has never lost its place securely gained nearly a century ago as one of the great productions of musical literature. That it suffered nothing from the interpretation of Mr. Fiedler and his band of accomplished musicians needs not to be said, and that it was as warmly appreciated by last night's audience as it has ever been was shown by the reception which it was given and the expressions of approval which were bestowed upon the orchestra at its close.

Between these two orchestral numbers appeared Mr. Lhevinne in Rubenstein's concerto for piano in E-flat No. 5. This was the great pianist's first appearance in this city with this orchestra, and in fact he has played in conjunction with this aggregation of musicians only within the last two or three weeks, though he has been in America twice before. The selection which he gave last night is the one he has presented at all his appearances with the Boston Symphony and, though it is a work of exceeding difficulty he gave entire satisfaction to even the most critical and exacting hearers and showed that he has developed to a marked degree in his command of the instrument and the power to make it express all the thoughts of the great master and his pupil. On his recent appearances with the orchestra in Boston Mr. Lhevinne aroused great enthusiasm by his rendering of this work and he has no reason to be dissatisfied with the reception he was accorded in this city by last night's audience.

INDEPENDENT
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 31 1908

Mahler Concerts

Important changes are impending in the orchestral world. A number of wealthy women are endeavoring to raise a million for a permanent orchestra modeled after the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Philharmonic Society is to be taken as the nucleus, and the conductorship will probably be offered to Mr. Gustav Mahler. This eminent Bohemian was much admired last year at the Metropolitan as interpreter of operas by Wagner, Mozart and Beethoven; but the first opportunity to hear him as concert conductor was not given until lately, when he gave three concerts, one of which was entirely devoted to his own second symphony—a big work constructed out of small ideas. As a conductor he aroused such enthusiasm that no doubt remained that under his leadership a permanent Philharmonic would become an institution of national impor-

OMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R I
DEC 30 1908

BIG AUDIENCE ENJOYS BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSIC

That a large proportion of the large audience in Infantry hall last evening, was drawn by the fact that Josef Lhevinne, the brilliant young Russian pianist, was billed as the soloist for the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is unquestioned, and yet the other numbers on the program were in themselves of more than sufficient merit, both in composition and execution, to attract the lover of realy good music.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, had drawn largely upon the modern Russian school for last evening's concert, and of the three selections played one was by Rimsky-Korsakoff and another by Rubinstein. That the music of this school has become popular within the past few years is an undisputed fact, but it is to be feared that this popularity is more largely due to a fad than it is to a careful study of the music itself.

However, the public demands the works of Russian composers and such music is furnished, and it is only a question of time to develop how much foundation there is for the demand.

The symphonic suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a delightful composition, which suggests in every beat of the conductor's baton the fragrant and picturesque orient, and there is a gorgeousness, if it can be so expressed, about that appeals strongly to the senses, and illustrates vividly the several passages of the suite, but more particularly the ruin of the ship against the rocks.

The playing of Mr. Lhevinne of the Rubinstein concerto in E-flat major showed that as a virtuoso he is all that has been claimed for him. To those who heard him for the first time it was a revelation, and to those who were familiar it was a delight. The concerto itself is one that affords ample opportunity for a display of technical work upon the part of the pianist, and of this Mr. Lhevinne took every advantage, and there is no doubt that he is a great pianist.

Full of charm and a mass of true melody, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" brought the program to a close, and that it was fully appreciated was made manifest by the more than liberal applause bestowed upon the playing. Mr. Fiedler has already shown that there is a marked improvement in the work of the orchestra, and a greater attention to detail, which in the last few seasons had allowed to become somewhat lax. The program of last evening's concert in full was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(In memory of the composer, who died June 21, 1908.)
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major ..... Rubinstein
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84 ..... Beethoven

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will be given Tuesday evening, Feb. 3.

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 31 1908

Musicians of all classes are looking forward with much eagerness to the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6, because then they will have their first opportunity to hear the much-discussed violinist, Mischa Elman, whose sensational career for the past four years in Europe seems sure of being duplicated this year in America. Elman will play the Tschaikowsky concerto with the orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the prelude to "The Meistersinger."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
DEC 31 1908

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, who is to make his debut in Washington with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, will play one of the most difficult of all violin concertos, that by Tschaikowsky, in D major. It is an interesting fact that this concerto was written for and dedicated to Leopold Auer, the great Russian violinist, who discovered Elman in Odessa, and who for the last [illegible] six years has been his teacher. Elman uses this when he makes his first appearance in a city, although he is said to be equally great in the Brahms and Beethoven concertos.

[12?]

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R I
DEC 30 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Russian Pianist and a Programme of Russian Music.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Infantry Hall last evening, had a distinctly Russian flavor. By far the larger portion of the programme was devoted to the music of composers of that nationality, while the piano concerto enlisted the services, as soloist, of that brilliant young Russian virtuoso, Josef Lhevinne. "Ware the Muscovite," James Huneker told us years ago. It was a prophetic warning. In contemporary music the Muscovite has indeed come to the front with a rush. Where else do we find the freshness, the originality, the genius, the new wine in the old bottles of music, as we have it brought to us in the works of Tschaikowsky, Balikireff, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakoff and other less familiar composers of the Neo-Russian school?

It is music of a distinct and virile type. It seeks neither to revive a dead formalism nor to preach a brand-new gospel of art. It is redolent of the soil, the utterance of a new, strange and powerful voice. Standing midway between the Orient and the Occident, the Russian is the true cosmopolitan in music. He weaves the rude strength, the gorgeous coloring, the half-barbaric splendor of the one into the cunning artifices and ordered modes of expression of the other; and so we get a musical composite unknown before, a variation of art which conforms to no standard but its own.

The programme last night included the following numbers:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35.. ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(In memory of the composer, who died June 21, 1908.)
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major.... ..... Rubinstein
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.... ..... Beethoven

The symphonic suite "Scheherazade" is pure "programme music," of course, with the Arabian Nights tales as its pattern and inspiration. Necessarily, the "programme" is of the vaguest. As Mr. Hale points out in his notes, it is of little use to attempt the identification of particular incidents. Sindbad made several voyages; there is more than one Kalandar-Prince in the tales; likewise of young Princes and Princesses there are a plenty. The conclusion, where the ship goes to pieces on the magnetic rock, is the only incident to be recognized definitely. But the atmosphere is unmistakable; the hearer can reconstruct the tale to please himself. The music is of strongly Oriental flavor, as is appropriate, of the freest possible construction, a gorgeous, true picture, in short, full of surprise and incident. At a first hearing that is the chief impression. It is easy to imagine that it would grow upon one with repetition, for it is of most cunning construction and orchestrated with great skill and brilliancy.

Mr. Lhevinne's playing of the unfamiliar Rubinstein concerto in E-flat was a marvellous piece of virtuososhlp. The work itself is hardly an inspired one, but it affords great opportunity for display, especially of technical proficiency. It is, in short, enormously difficult. Mr. Lhevinne confirmed by his remarkable work the impression made at his previous appearance here in recital. He is, without question, one of the greatest artists before the public to-day.

Beethoven's beautiful "Egmont" overture made a fine contrast for the two other numbers of the programme, and was, like them, played with superb spirit and precision by the orchestra. The audience was very cordial with applause, both for the music and the soloist. The third and last concert by the orchestra for this season will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 3.

EVENING MAIL
New York City.
JAN 1 1909

Paderewski will sail for America late in January to make a short tour, during which time he will be the soloist at several concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will also appear with the orchestras of Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul. His New York recital will occur February 2 at Carnegie hall.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
From
Address New York City.
Date JAN 1 1909

PADEREWSKI sails for America the end of January for a brief tour of a few weeks, during which he will be the soloist at several concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 2

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.

[illegible], and Schubert's quartet in D [illegible]. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9. At the first concert he will play Beethoven's violin concerto; at the second Brahms's. The orchestral numbers for Thursday are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations (first time in New York) and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; for Saturday, three dances by Grétry from "Cephalus and Procris," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and W[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From COMMERCIAL
Address BUFFALO, N
JAN 6 10

MUSICAL NEWS.

Record of Local Events and Gleanings From the General Field.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th, its first appearance here under the new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mail orders for seats will be received by Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place, up to the opening of the general sale the week before the concert.

STAR
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 2 1909

MARYLAND

MISCHA ELMAN

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Lyric, Wednesday, January 6. First appearance in Baltimore.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
JAN 2 1909

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with Mischa Elman as soloist at both concerts. The programme of Thursday evening will include a first performance in New York of an original theme and variations for orchestra by Noren. It is entitled "Kaleidoscope" and caused a great deal of comment because of a singular lawsuit which delayed the publication of the work and prevented its performance for a year. The final variation No. 11, under the title of "To a Celebrated Contemporary," is built upon two motifs taken from the "Heldenleben" by Richard Strauss. Soon after the first performance of Noren's work Strauss's publisher protested, even though the composer insisted that this variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss.

The jurists held that neither the leading theme of the "Heldenleben" nor the motif of the opponents is a melody—that it might be called melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motif of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Noren permission to publish his work. The other numbers on Thursday evening's programme will be Richard Strauss's "Death and Apotheosis," and Elman will play the Beethoven concerto in G major. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be three dances by Gretry, Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," and Elman will play the Brahms concerto for violin, opus 77.

STAR
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 2 1909

Mischa Elman at the Lyric.

Musicians of all classes are looking forward with much eagerness to the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6. They will have their first opportunity to hear the much-discussed violinist, Mischa Elman, whose sensational career for the past four years in Europe seems sure of being duplicated this year in America. Elman will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto with the orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the Prelude to the Meistersinger.

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
DEC 30 1908

RARE MUSICAL TREAT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The excellence of the programme and its execution at the first concert, the skill of the new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, the announcement that the selections which were unavoidably omitted a few weeks ago would be rendered and the engagement of the noted Russian pianist, Josef Lhevinne, as the soloist, combined to attract an even larger audience to Infantry Hall last evening at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than was seen at the initial number of the series and no one in the large gathering was disappointed in any particular. The orchestra was at its best again, Mr. Fiedler conducted in the same masterly manner, with the same firm command of his musicians and the same skill in drawing out all their ability and talent, and the soloist won the admiration of his hearers and charmed them by his rare power in displaying the possibilities of the piano as a vehicle for music of the highest class.

The entire concert consisted of but three numbers, so long and difficult were the selections. First came the presentation by the orchestra of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which was at the last moment withdrawn frim the programme of the last concert because of the illness of a member of the orchestra whose presence was essential to its production. Thre was much disappointment at that time at the substitution of another selection for this one which has never been given before last evening but is widely known as one of the show pieces of this orchestra. It is a difficult theme and within the power of but a very limited number of orchestras, but in the hands of the Boston Symphony it was entirely safe and was presented with a perfection of tone and technique to be expected of this organization of musicians and not to be looked for from many others.

The suite is in four parts, entitled "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. The music is brilliant and melodious and so skilfully rendered by the orchestra that its difficulty is not realized by the listener. The score is filled with high oriental coloring appropriate to the character of the composition and the audience is able to follow in a general way the theme of the story with the solo violin personifying the Sultana Scheherazada as she tells her nightly story to save herself and her sisters. There had been intense interest to hear this suite in its initial performance here by this noted orchestra and the favorable verdict of the audience upon both the selection and the manner of its presentation by the musicians was unmistakably expressed by the applause which was given at the pauses in the score and the silence which prevailed during the rendition of the parts. It was rare music for Providence and was intensely enjoyed.

The other orchestral number was also postponed from the first concert. This was Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont." This is a selection which is not new to local music lovers and has never lost its place securely gained nearly a century ago as one of the great productions of musical literature. That it suffered nothing from the interpretation of Mr. Fiedler and his band of accomplished musicians needs not to be said, and that it was as warmly appreciated by last night's audience as it has ever been was shown by the reception which it was given and the expressions of approval which were bestowed upon the orchestra at its close.

Between these two orchestral numbers appeared Mr. Lhevinne in Rubenstein's concerto for piano in E-flat No. 5. This was the great pianist's first appearance in this city with this orchestra, and in fact he has played in conjunction with this aggregation of musicians only within the last two or three weeks, though he has been in America twice before. The selection which he gave last night is the one he has presented at all his appearances with the Boston Symphony and, though it is a work of exceeding difficulty he gave entire satisfaction to even the most critical and exacting hearers and showed that he has developed to a marked degree in his command of the instrument and the power to make it express all the thoughts of the great master and his pupil. On his recent appearances with the orchestra in Boston Mr. Lhevinne aroused great enthusiasm by his rendering of this work and he has no reason to be dissatisfied with the reception he was accorded in this city by last night's audience.

rom .....
ddress .....
ate .....

Mahler Concerts

Important changes are impending in the orchestral world. A number of wealthy women are endeavoring to raise a million for a permanent orchestra modeled after the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Philharmonic Society is to be taken as the nucleus, and the conductorship will probably be offered to Mr. Gustav Mahler. This eminent Bohemian was much admired last year at the Metropolitan as interpreter of operas by Wagner, Mozart and Beethoven; but the first opportunity to hear him as concert conductor was not given until lately, when he gave three concerts, one of which was entirely devoted to his own second symphony—a big work constructed out of small ideas. As a conductor he aroused such enthusiasm that no doubt remained that under his leadership a permanent Philharmonic would become an institution of national impor-

OMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m .....
iress .....
e .....

BIG AUDIENCE ENJOYS BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSIC

That a large proportion of the large audience in Infantry hall last evening, was drawn by the fact that Josef Lhevinne, the brilliant young Russian pianist, was billed as the soloist for the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is unquestioned, and yet the other numbers on the program were in themselves of more than sufficient merit, both in composition and execution, to attract the lover of realy good music.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, had drawn largely upon the modern Russian school for last evening's concert, and of the three selections played one was by Rimsky-Korsakoff and another by Rubinstein. That the music of this school has become popular within the past few years is an undisputed fact, but it is to be feared that this popularity is more largely due to a fad than it is to a careful study of the music itself.

However, the public demands the works of Russian composers and such music is furnished, and it is only a question of time to develop how much foundation there is for the demand.

The symphonic suite "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a delightful composition, which suggests in every beat of the conductor's baton the fragrant and picturesque orient, and there is a gorgeousness, if it can be so expressed, about that appeals strongly to the senses, and illustrates vividly the several passages of the suite, but more particularly the ruin of the ship against the rocks.

The playing of Mr. Lhevinne of the Rubinstein concerto in E-flat major showed that as a virtuoso he is all that has been claimed for him. To those who heard him for the first time it was a revelation, and to those who were familiar it was a delight. The concerto itself is one that affords ample opportunity for a display of technical work upon the part of the pianist, and of this Mr. Lhevinne took every advantage, and there is no doubt that he is a great pianist.

Full of charm and a mass of true melody, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" brought the program to a close, and that it was fully appreciated was made manifest by the more than liberal applause bestowed upon the playing. Mr. Fiedler has already shown that there is a marked improvement in the work of the orchestra, and a greater attention to detail, which in the last few seasons had allowed to become somewhat lax. The program of last evening's concert in full was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(In memory of the composer, who died June 21, 1908.)
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major ..... Rubinstein
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84 ..... Beethoven

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will be given Tuesday evening, Feb. 3.

Musicians of all classes are looking forward with much eagerness to the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6, because then they will have their first opportunity to hear the much-discussed violinist, Mischa Elman, whose sensational career for the past four years in Europe seems sure of being duplicated this year in America. Elman will play the Tschaikowsky concerto with the orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the prelude to "The Meistersinger."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
.....
.....
.....

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, who is to make his debut in Washington with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, will play one of the most difficult of all violin concertos, that by Tschaikowsky, in D major. It is an interesting fact that this concerto was written for and dedicated to Leopold Auer, the great Russian violinist, who discovered Elman in Odessa, and who for the last [illegible] six years has been his teacher. Elman uses this when he makes his first appearance in a city, although he is said to be equally great in the Brahms and Beethoven concertos.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
DEC 30
om .....
dress .....
te .....

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Russian Pianist and a Programme of Russian Music.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Infantry Hall last evening, had a distinctly Russian flavor. By far the larger portion of the programme was devoted to the music of composers of that nationality, while the piano concerto enlisted the services, as soloist, of that brilliant young Russian virtuoso, Josef Lhevinne. "Ware the Muscovite," James Huncker told us years ago. It was a prophetic warning. In contemporary music the Muscovite has indeed come to the front with a rush. Where else do we find the freshness, the originality, the genius, the new wine in the old bottles of music, as we have it brought to us in the works of Tschaikowsky, Balikireff, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakoff and other less familiar composers of the Neo-Russian school?

It is music of a distinct and virile type. It seeks neither to revive a dead formalism nor to preach a brand-new gospel of art. It is redolent of the soil, the utterance of a new, strange and powerful voice. Standing midway between the Orient and the Occident, the Russian is the true cosmopolitan in music. He weaves the rude strength, the gorgeous coloring, the half-barbaric splendor of the one into the cunning artifices and ordered modes of expression of the other; and so we get a musical composite unknown before, a variation of art which conforms to no standard but its own.

The programme last night included the following numbers:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") op. 35.. ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(In memory of the composer, who died June 21, 1908.)
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major.... ..... Rubinstein
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro.
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.... ..... Beethoven

The symphonic suite "Scheherazade" is pure "programme music," of course, with the Arabian Nights tales as its pattern and inspiration. Necessarily, the "programme" is of the vaguest. As Mr. Hale points out in his notes, it is of little use to attempt the identification of particular incidents. Sindbad made several voyages; there is more than one Kalandar-Prince in the tales; likewise of young Princes and Princesses there are a plenty. The conclusion, where the ship goes to pieces on the magnetic rock, is the only incident to be recognized definitely. But the atmosphere is unmistakable; the hearer can reconstruct the tale to please himself. The music is of strongly Oriental flavor, as is appropriate, of the freest possible construction, a gorgeous, true picture, in short, full of surprise and incident. At a first hearing that is the chief impression. It is easy to imagine that it would grow upon one with repetition, for it is of most cunning construction and orchestrated with great skill and brilliancy.

Mr. Lhevinne's playing of the unfamiliar Rubinstein concerto in E-flat was a marvellous piece of virtuososhiip. The work itself is hardly an inspired one, but it affords great opportunity for display, especially of technical proficiency. It is, in short, enormously difficult. Mr. Lhevinne confirmed by his remarkable work the impression made at his previous appearance here in recital. He is, without question, one of the greatest artists before the public to-day.

Beethoven's beautiful "Egmont" overture made a fine contrast for the two other numbers of the programme, and was, like them, played with superb spirit and precision by the orchestra. The audience was very cordial with applause, both for the music and the soloist. The third and last concert by the orchestra for this season will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 3.

EVENING MAIL
New York City.

Paderewski will sail for America late in January to make a short tour, during which time he will be the soloist at several concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will also appear with the orchestras of Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul. His New York recital will occur February 2 at Carnegie hall.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTIS
rom .....
ddress New York City.
ate .....

PADEREWSKI sails for America the end of January for a brief tour of a few weeks, during which he will be the soloist at several concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras. He will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 2

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.

(Suite), and Schubert's quartet in D [illegible]. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9. At the first concert he will play Beethoven's violin concerto; at the second Brahms's. The orchestral numbers for Thursday are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations (first time in New York) and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; for Saturday, three dances by Grétry from "Cephalus and Procris," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wag-

[127]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From COMMERCIAL BUFFALO, N.
Address .....

MUSICAL NEWS.

Record of Local Events and Gleanings From the General Field.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th, its first appearance here under the new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mail orders for seats will be received by Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place, up to the opening of the general sale the week before the concert.

STAR
JAN 2 1909
MARYLAND

MISCHA ELMAN

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Lyric, Wednesday, January 6. First appearance in Baltimore.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with Mischa Elman as soloist at both concerts. The programme of Thursday evening will include a first performance in New York of an original theme and variations for orchestra by Noren. It is entitled "Kaleidoscope" and caused a great deal of comment because of a singular lawsuit which delayed the publication of the work and prevented its performance for a year. The final variation No. 11, under the title of "To a Celebrated Contemporary," is built upon two motifs taken from the "Heldenleben" by Richard Strauss. Soon after the first performance of Noren's work Strauss's publisher protested, even though the composer insisted that this variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss.

The jurists held that neither the leading theme of the "Heldenleben" nor the motif of the opponents is a melody—that it might be called melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motif of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Noren permission to publish his work. The other numbers on Thursday evening's programme will be Richard Strauss's "Death and Apotheosis," and Elman will play the Beethoven concerto in G major. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be three dances by Gretry, Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," and Elman will play the Brahms concerto for violin, opus 77.

JAN 2 1909

Mischa Elman at the Lyric.

Musicians of all classes are looking forward with much eagerness to the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6. They will have their first opportunity to hear the much-discussed violinist, Mischa Elman, whose sensational career for the past four years in Europe seems sure of being duplicated this year in America. Elman will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto with the orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the Prelude to the Meistersinger.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 9 1909

MUSIC NOTES.

The musical feature of the coming week will be the third Boston Symphony Concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 8. As already announced, this concert will be made particularly notable by the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who has created a genuine sensation in New York. Realizing the astonishing standing of this young artist as long ago as last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made arrangements whereby he should be its soloist on its December trip, playing in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in Manhattan, in addition to two appearances at the regular symphony concerts in Boston. At his debut in Carnegie Hall with the Russian Symphony Orchestra last month, he played the Tschaikowsky Concerto, which will be the work he will use in Brooklyn. At the end of it, the audience, led by Rafael Joseffy, rose to its feet and cheered the boy, for he is only 18.

The Tschaikowsky Concerto, which Elman is to play here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of the most difficult works for the violin and curiously enough it was dedicated to Leopold Auer, the teacher of Elman, but Auer, for some reason which has never been satisfactorily explained, for years refused to study it and give it its first performance, which honor fell to Adolph Brodsky, who played it in Vienna on Dec. 4, 1881. Years afterwards, Auer took it up and became one of its most brilliant interpreters.

The symphony will be Beethoven's in C minor No. 5, and it is said that Mr. Fleicher gives this an unusual and particularly brilliant interpretation. The other number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz."

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date

great programme.

Doors Will Be Closed.

The first work on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening is Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations. These Variations last thirty-five minutes and are played without pause, therefore, late comers will miss a considerable part of the concert. Patrons of the Boston Symphony concert Thursday evening should take special pains to be in their seats by 8.15 o'clock, for after the work is begun, the doors will be closed and no one admitted until its end.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

Paderewski Coming Again.

Paderewski sails for America toward the end of this month. He comes primarily to hear his new symphony played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and incidentally he will play several times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras, and will give a limited number of recitals. One of these recitals will be in Philadelphia, and it will be the only one in this city next year. It will be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 2 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S NEXT CONCERT JAN. 6—PEABODY RECITALS

Music lovers are looking forward with much interest to the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 6, because then they will have their first opportunity to hear the much-discussed violinist Mischa Elman, whose noteworthy career for the last four years in Europe seems sure of being duplicated this year in America. Elman will play the Tschaikowsky concerto with the Orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the prelude to "The Meistersinger."

Cable Address, "ROMLIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From UNION
Address
Date JAN - 2 1909

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Famous Boston Organization to Be Heard at Convention Hall, Last Saturday of This Month.

For the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began to visit Rochester it is going to give a concert in Convention Hall the date of the concert being Saturday evening, January 30th.

The orchestra leaves Boston on Sunday, January 24th and on Monday night it plays in Buffalo, Tuesday in Detroit, Wednesday in Cleveland, Thursday in Indianapolis, Friday in Columbus and Saturday in Rochester and then goes home. As is generally known, the orchestra gives only one week of the season to a western trip for its time is so filled up with engagements in the east that longer journeys are impossible. The orchestra this year is giving a total of 108 concerts and this means for the season of thirty weeks an average of over three concerts a week, which with the traveling done and the vast amount of time given to rehearsals is about a maximum and it is more concerts in a given time than any orchestra in the world gives.

Details of the Rochester concert will be announced later.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 2 1909

A welcome concert at the Academy of Music next week will be the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday night for their third appearance here this season. The orchestral features of the concert will have no novel aspect, except in so far as Mr. Fiedler's interpretation may give them particular significance. The symphony will be Beethoven's in C minor No. 5, and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz" will be played. But the soloist for this concert, Mischa Elman, will probably provide as much of the element of personal distinction as is desirable for any concert. This young Russian, only 18 years old, seems to be a very rare artist who justifies the extraordinary praise that preceded him from Europe. His recent appearances in Manhattan have made apparent that he has unusual capabilities. At the concert next Friday he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto which he used for his debut in Carnegie Hall with the Russian Symphony Orchestra last month. It is rather interesting to note that while Elman has been to a remarkable degree a prodigy, he as always resented the term. He was a lad of a little more than fourteen when he first made his appearance in London, and even then he said he did not want to be judged as a boy, but he was willing to stand or fall compared with the great violinists of his time. It was even more remarkable that he was able to stand such comparison. His art from the beginning is said to have had a maturity not merely of technique, but of musicianship that has seemed positively uncanny. When Paderewski was in this country last year, he said that he knew of nothing like Elman. He said that it fairly gave one the shivers to see this lad of sixteen—as he was when Paderewski had heard him—play the Beethoven concerto with the surety, certainty and musicianship of a mature artist who had studied the work for years.

MISCHA ELMAN,
Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Week

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A boy of 18 years, who, despite his youth, is acclaimed one of the greatest violinists in the world, will make his Philadelphia debut next Monday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The body is Mischa Elman, a Russian. 84

Elman played in a concert when he was but five years old. In 1896 he began to study in Odessa and won his first prize, a free scholarship, at his entrance examination.

In 1902, when Leopold Auer, while touring Southern Russia, heard him, he was so impressed at the great gifts of the boy that he telegraphed to the Czar for permission to bring Elman and his parents to St. Petersburg. When this permission was obtained Auer accepted him as a free pupil. In 1904 he made his first appearance in St. Petersburg, substituting for Professor Auer in an important engagement, and achieved an overwhelming success with the Tschaikowsky concerto. He appeared later with growing success in other cities.

Elman made his debut in America with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on December 10, in New York, and duplicated his European success.

An interesting item of the programme will be the first performance here of MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," which though written in 1868, was not published until after his death this year. The programme will be:—

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 60.
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin in D Major, Op. 35.
MacDowell—"Lamia," third symphonic poem (after Keats), Op. 29. (First time in Philadelphia)
Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening will have an interesting event in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has been creating a sensation throughout Europe, and, since his arrival in this country, in New York and Boston, the only cities in which he has been heard. Although but eighteen years old, Elman has won recognition as one of the greatest living violinists, being noted for the remarkable strength and richness of his tone, the sweeping breadth and boldness of his phrasing and the maturity of his musicianship. He was born in Russia, and received his first music lessons from his father. At the age of five he played in a concert before the Princess Ourosow, and this began his remarkable career. He is now one of the most prominent figures in the musical world. His selection next Monday evening will be the Tschaikowsky concerto in D-major. An interesting item on the program will be the first performance in Philadelphia of Edward MacDowell's third symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work, although it dates back to the composer's early period, having been written in 1888, was not published until this year and had its first performance by the Boston Orchestra in Boston last October. It seems that MacDowell did not care to have it published, intending to revise certain parts of the orchestration, but after his death his widow and publisher decided that it should be given to the world. The program will open with Beethoven's fifth symphony, and close with Weber's "Oberon" overture.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mische Elman will be the soloist at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Brahms concerto. Besides Mr. Elman, the particularly interesting feature of the concert on Thursday evening will be the first performance of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations for orchestra. This work was begun in 1904, but was not completed until the Winter of 1906-7. The first performance was on July 1, 1907, at a concert in the course of the forty-third festival of Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Dresden. The first performance in the United States was at Chicago by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra on Oct. 30 last, and it was played for the first time in Boston on Friday afternoon, Dec. 11. The programme in full is as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

"Kaleidoscope" Original Theme and Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30. First time in New York.....Noren
Concerto for violin in D major, Op. 61.....Beethoven Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.....R. Strauss
Soloist, Mische Elman.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Three Dances from the Heroic Ballet "Cephalus and Procris".....Gretry
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 60..Beethoven
Concerto for violin in D major, Op. 77..Brahms
Overture to the "Flying Dutchman"..Wagner
Soloist, Mische Elman.

From WORLD,
Idress New York City.
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening at 8.15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Brahms concerto. 84

Besides Elman, the particularly interesting feature of the concert on Thursday evening will be the first performance in New York of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations for orchestra. This work was begun in 1904, but was not completed until the winter of 1906-07. The first performance was on July 1, 1907, at a concert in the course of the Forty-third Festival of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Dresden. The first performance in the United States was at Chicago by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, on Oct. 30, 1908, and it was played for the first time in Boston on Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, 1908. The work has caused a great deal of comment not only because it was the one noteworthy composition presented at the Dresden Festival, but because of a singular lawsuit which delayed publication and prevented its performance for a year. The final, Variation No. 11, has the title of "To a Celebrated Contemporary," and in it Noren has combined two motives taken from Richard Strauss's tone-poem "A Hero Life," with material of his own. While the upper voice varies Noren's theme, violincellos and horns announce the Straussian hero's theme, yet this theme is not exactly the one fashioned by Strauss. After development of this material another reminder of Strauss is introduced in the episode; the motive of "The Hero's Antagonist."

Soon after the first performance of "Kaleidoscope" the publisher of "A Hero Life" protested against the publication of Noren's theme and variations on the ground that the composer had taken, without permission, two themes from Strauss's work, this despite the fact that the last variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss. The matter was taken into court, which submitted the question to a jury of experts, the contention being that according to the copyright law of 1901 "in a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The jurists held that from the standpoint of musical composition neither the leading theme (in the "Heldenleben") nor the motive of the opponents is a "melody." The main theme of the "Heldenleben" might be called a melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motive of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Noren permission to publish his work.

The work is in eleven sections. The first is entitled "Praeambulum"; the second, "Mournful Dance"; the third, "Canon"; the fourth, "Scherzo"; the fifth, "In the Cathedral"; the sixth, "Pastorale"; the seventh, "Funeral March"; the eighth, "A Slav Dance"; the ninth, "From Far-Off Days"; the tenth, "Mazurka"; and the eleventh, "To a Celebrated Contemporary," which is a double fugue.

The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be "Three Dances" by Gretry, from the heroic ballet of Cephalus and Procris, and Beethoven's C-Minor Symphony No. 5, Brahms's violin concerto, and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

n
ress
stablishe

Ossip Gabrilowitch, the Russian pianist, seems to have carried off all pianistic palms in New York at least, so far as the season has progressed. Gabrilowitsch made his first appearance this year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date

Ignace Paderewski sails for America the end of January for a tour of a few weeks, in which time he will be the soloist at several concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and soloist with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras. He will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 3.

Established [illegible], 1884

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date

Mischa Elman is to give his next New York recital in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 28. Elman opens the New Year by playing two concerts in different cities on that day, the first in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra and in the evening a recital in Providence, R. I. The coming twelve days will be busy ones for young Elman. During that time he will play, commencing with Sunday night at the Manhattan Opera-House, a dozen times, and on Jan. 14 and 15 will make his first Western appearance in Chicago with the Orchestra. 884

[128]

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 3 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND OLD "TROVATORE"

Will Make Next Week in Brooklyn of Musical Importance.

"PELLEAS AND MELISANDE"

At One Opera, and "Le Wally" and "Tristan" at the Other.

The musical feature of the coming week will be the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8. As already announced, this concert will be made particularly notable by the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist who has created such a genuine sensation in New York. Realizing the astonishing standing of this young artist as long ago as last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made arrangements whereby he should be its soloist on its December trip, playing in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in Manhattan, in addition to two appearances at the regular Symphony concerts in Boston, and all of these appearances, save those in Manhattan, will mark his debut in the various cities. It is probable that not a few music lovers of Brooklyn have heard Elman at some of his appearances in Manhattan and they will readily testify to the profound impression he has made on all his audiences. At his debut in Carnegie Hall with the Russian Symphony Orchestra last month he played the Tschaikowsky concerto, which will be the work he will use in Brooklyn. At the end of it the audience, led by Rafael Joseffy, rose to its feet and cheered the boy, for he is only 18.

The Tschaikowsky concerto which Elman is to play here with the Boston Symphony is one of the most difficult of works for the violin, and curiously enough it was dedicated to Leopold Auer, the teacher of Elman; but Auer, for some reason which has never been satisfactorily explained, refused to study it and give it its first performances, which honor fell to Adolph Brodsky, who played it in Vienna on December 4, 1881. Years afterward Auer took it up and became one of its most brilliant interpreters.

The symphony will be Beethoven's in C Minor No. 5, and it is said that Mr. Fiedler gives this an unusual and particularly brilliant interpretation. The other number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The feature of the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, January 6, at 8:15, will be the Baltimore debut of Mischa Elman, the astonishing young Russian violinist, who for the last four years has been the reigning sensation of Europe, and since his arrival in this country has repeated the extraordinary success which seems to have placed him in a class by himself.

Mischa Elman is a Russian boy, having been born in Odessa in 1890. His father is a violinist and was his first teacher. So astonishing was the talent of the boy that at five he had appeared in a public concert and at six he won a free scholarship in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa and became the prize pupil of Professor Fiedelman.

Elman came to America last month and made his debut in New York with the Russian Symphony Orchestra on December 10, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto, which he will play in Baltimore. The papers were unanimously enthusiastic in their praise of him and audiences went wild. These scenes were repeated at his recital.

Last spring when it was announced that he was coming to America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, realizing what a tremendous artist he was, engaged him for his first appearance in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From ..... PUBLIC LE...

Address ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date ..... JAN 3 - 1909

Paderewski sails for America toward the end of this month. He comes primarily to hear his new symphony played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and incidentally he will play several times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras and will give a limited number of recitals. One of these recitals will be in Philadelphia and it will be the only one in this city this year. It will be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

SUN.

New York City.

JAN 3 1909

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Elman the Soloist and Noren's "Kaleidoscope" to Be Heard.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 7, at 8:15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, at 2:30 o'clock. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Brahms concerto.

Besides Elman the particularly interesting feature of the concert on Thursday evening will be the first performance in New York of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations for orchestra. This work was begun in 1904, but was not completed until the winter of 1906-07. The first performance was given on July 1, 1907, at a concert in the course of the forty-third festival of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Dresden. The first performance in the United States was at Chicago by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra on October 30, 1908, and it was played for the first time in Boston on Friday afternoon, December 11, 1908.

The work has caused a great deal of comment, not only because it was the one noteworthy composition presented at the Dresden festival but because of a singular lawsuit which delayed the publication of the work and prevented its general performance for a year. The final variation, No. 11, has the title "To a Celebrated Contemporary," and in it Noren has combined two motives taken from Richard Strauss's tone poem "A Hero Life" with material of his own. While the upper voice varies Noren's theme violoncellos and horns announce the Strauss hero's theme, yet this theme is not exactly the one fashioned by Strauss. After development of this material another reminder of Strauss is introduced in the motive of "The Hero's Antagonists."

Soon after the first performance of "Kaleidoscope" the publisher of "A Hero Life" protested against the publication of Noren's theme and variations on the ground that the composer had taken without permission two themes from Strauss's work, this despite the fact that the last variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss. The matter was taken into court, which submitted the question to a jury of experts, the contention being that according to the copyright law of 1901 "in a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The jurists held that from the standpoint of musical composition neither the leading theme (in the "Heldenleben") nor the motive of the opponents is a "melody." The main theme of the "Heldenleben" might be called a melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motive of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Noren permission to publish his work.

The work is in eleven sections. The first is entitled "Præambulum," the second "Mournful Dance," the third "Canon," the fourth "Scherzo," the fifth "In the Cathedral," the sixth "Pastorale," the seventh "Funeral March," the eighth "A Slav Dance," the ninth "From Far Off Days," the tenth "Mazurka," and the eleventh "To a Celebrated Contemporary," which is a double fugue.

The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." The programme for Saturday afternoon will be "Three Dances," by Grétry, from the heroic ballet of "Cephalus and Procris," and Beethoven's C minor symphony No. 5, Brahms's violin concerto and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

THE KNEISEL QUARTET

...O, N. Y.

JAN 3 - 1909

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Buffalo on Monday evening, January 25th, for its concert in Convention Hall, it will introduce its new conductor, Max Fiedler, in whom special interest centers. Mr. Fiedler is a friend of his predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck. He is a man 49 years of age, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Previous to becoming a conductor, he was known as a pianist of much repute, and also as a composer. Since 1903 he has been director of the famous Hamburg Conservatory of Music. He is also conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler first came to this country as one of the guest conductors of the Philharmonic Society of New York. The impression he made on that occasion was so favorable that it resulted in his present engagement at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert of January 25th will be his first appearance in this city.

So many inquiries have come to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the concert, as to the price of seats according to location, that the rates are here given: The first sixteen rows will be $2, the next fifteen $1.50, the next fifteen $1, the rest of the floor and the balcony seats will be 75 cents. Mail orders with check may be sent to Mrs. Smith, No. 26 Irving place.

...Union,

From .....

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

JAN 3 1909

Date .....

The musical feature of the coming week will be the third Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 8. As already announced this concert will be made particularly notable by the first appearance in Brooklyn of Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist who has created such a genuine sensation in New York. Realizing the astonishing standing of this young artist as long ago as last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made arrangements whereby he should be its soloist on its December trip, playing in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn, and twice in New York, in addition to two appearances at the regular Symphony concerts in Boston, and all of these appearances, save those in New York, will mark his debut in the various cities. It is probable that not a few music lovers of Brooklyn have heard Elman at some of his appearances in Manhattan, and they will readily testify to the profound impression he has made on all his audiences. At his debut in Carnegie Hall with the Russian Symphony Orchestra last month, he played the Tschaikowsky concerto which will be the work he will use in Brooklyn. At the end of it, the audience, led by Raphael Joseffy, rose to its feet and cheered the boy, for he is only eighteen. It is rather interesting to note that while Elman has been to a remarkable degree a prodigy, he has always resented the term. He was a lad of a little more than fourteen when he first made his appearance in London, and even then he said he did not want to be judged as a boy, but he was willing to stand or fall compared with the great violinists of his time. It is even more remarkable that he was able to stand much comparison, for his art from the beginning has had a maturity not purely of technique but of musicianship. When Paderewski was in this country last year he said that he knew of nothing like Elman. He said it fairly gave one the shivers to see this lad of sixteen, as he was when Paderewski had heard him, play the Beethoven concerto with the surety, certainty and musicianship of a mature artist who had studied the work for years. The Tschaikowsky concerto which Elman is to play here with the Boston Symphony is one of the most difficult of works for the violin, and curiously enough it was dedicated to Leopold Auer, the teacher of Elman, but Auer, for some reason which has never been satisfactorily explained, refused to study it and give it is first performance, which honor fell to Adolph Brodsky, who played it in Vienna on Dec. 4, 1881. Years afterwards Auer took it up and became one of its most brilliant interpreters.

1884

The symphony will be Beethoven's in G Minor No. 5, and it is said that Mr. Fiedler gives this an unusual and particularly brilliant interpretation. The other number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

...CO... ...O, N. Y.

JAN 3 - 1909

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual concert in Buffalo on Monday evening, January 25th, in Convention Hall, excels as a programme maker and his fame in this respect has spread to Buffalo, so that many requests are already coming in for special numbers that have been played in Boston this season. These requests have been forwarded by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, and it is probable that several numbers on the Buffalo programme will be those for which there has been the most demand.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always considered the crowning musical achievement of the season in this city and there is fresh interest this year from the fact that it will be the first appearance of the famous organization under Mr. Fiedler, who is winning golden opinions from his audiences everywhere the orchestra has played this season.

Full details concerning the concert will be announced shortly, but in the meantime mail orders for seats are being received by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, and will be taken care of in advance of the general sale. The first sixteen rows of Convention Hall are $2, the next fifteen $1.50; the third fifteen $1; the balance of the house, including the balcony, 75 cents.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

REPUBLICAN.

...s .....

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie hall, New York, on Thursday evening, the 7th, and Saturday afternoon, the 9th, will present Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Beethoven concerto, both for the first time in America. Mr Fiedler has placed on the Thursday evening program a novelty in the form of variations and a double fugue entitled "Kaleidoscope," by Noren. The other number on the Thursday evening program will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." The Saturday afternoon program in addition to the Beethoven concerto will comprise Beethoven's C minor symphony, which the orchestra will play in

---

EVENING POST,

New York City.

...ss .....

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Brahms concerto. An interesting feature of the Thursday concert will be the first performance in New York of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations for orchestra, a work which was much discussed in Germany, not only because of its own merits, but because the publisher of Strauss's "Heldenleben" protested against the printing of the "Kaleidoscope," on the ground that the composer had taken, without permission, two themes from Strauss's work, this despite the fact that the last variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss. The matter was taken into court, which submitted the question to a jury of experts, the contention being that, according to the copyright law of 1901, "in a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The jurists held that from the standpoint of musical composition neither the leading theme (in the "Heldenleben") nor the motive of the opponents is a "melody." The main theme of the "Heldenleben" might be called a melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motive of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Noren permission to publish his work. The Thursday programme will also include Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and the Saturday programme three Grétry dances, Beethoven's fifth symphony, and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

REPUBLICAN.

...

Mr Fiedler and the Fifth Symphony.

Mr Fiedler won high praise from Boston critics for his recent conducting of Beethoven's fifth symphony, which the Boston orchestra is to play at its concert in Court Square theater. The Transcript says:—

"Eroica" or no "Eroica," the symphony in C minor is the true "Heroic" symphony—heroic in idea, heroic in expression still, in spite of all the widening musical freedom and the waxing musical resources of a hundred years. Probably it is far more eloquent to us with our fuller and keener sense of the emotional qualities of music, than it was to the company who heard it dubiously in the Vienna of December, 1808. Some then called the symphony too long and over-developed. We in our turn see the heroic magnitude and fulness of the design and feel the mighty emotions that shaped and animated it. We have been attuned to heroic voice in music, of struggle, of longing, of fury, defeat and triumph. We rise instinctively to such heroic excitements as the transition from the scherzo to the finale, and answer to the thrill of the embattled chords of the first movement or of the triumphant song of the finale. For us, too, perhaps, more than for Beethoven's own generation is the deep and absorbed passion of the slow movement. The tonal weight, the tonal splendor of the modern orchestra only makes such music the more eloquent. Above all, the symphony is masculine music—the mass, the sweep, the power, the stress of it are all of the struggling, conquering, heroic male. The more broadly, vigorously and commandingly it is played the better. Mr Fiedler was truly heroic in the swelling flood of the finale. He made it molten music. He wrought the transition vividly yet without obvious calculation. There were honest vigor, masculinity and directness, and no far-fetched emphasis, in his reading of the first movement. But in the andante his particular fault once more beset him. He must have his restless contrasts at all costs. He tried to be subtle in his modifications of the pace; in his nursing of the phrase, and he was only broken and disjointed. He would not give Beethoven his head.

POST

...ess .....

JAN 3 - 1909

TO PLAY STRAUSS SYMPHONY.

Boston Orchestra to Give "Death and Transfiguration" in Washington.

The principal orchestral number at the Boston Symphony concert, on Tuesday, will be Strauss' symphonic poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Although the symphonic poems of this famous composer have been the most talked of among all his orchestral compositions, Washington never has heard but one, "Till Eulenspiegel," which has been performed here about three times.

Mr. Fiedler placed this work on next Tuesday's program, in response to numerous requests from the patrons for one of the Strauss poems. The other works of Strauss in this form are "Don Juan," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quixote," "Ein Heldenleben," and the "Symphonia Domestica."

Mischa Elman, the much-heralded violin virtuoso, will be heard for the first time in this city, playing Tschaikowsky's tremendously difficult concerto. The program stands as follows:

Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin;" Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration;" Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin in D major; and Webster, overture, "Oberon."

[129]

From Illustrated TIMES BUFFALO, N.Y.
Address
Date

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plays even half the numbers for which requests have come in, the concert by the orchestra at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th, will be practically an all-night performance. Mr. Fiedler excels as a program-maker and all the requests are being forwarded to Boston, so it is probable that several numbers for which there is the most demand will be included in the program he will make out for Buffalo.

To most music-lovers the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra represents the zenith of the musical season and there is additional interest in the coming of the orchestra this year because it will introduce the new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, who has won golden opinions since he took charge of the orchestra last October, and who is giving the people the music they want, playing much that is new and a great deal that is endeared by familiarity.

Within a few days full details concerning the concert will be made public, but in the meantime mail orders for seats are being sent to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, who is the local manager. These orders will be filled in the order of receipt and in advance of the general sale. Prices of seats are as follows: First 16 rows, $2; next 15 rows, $1.50; third 15 rows, $1; balance of the hall, including the balcony, 75 cents.

Subscriptions are coming in rapidly for the Clef Club concert to be given at Convention Hall, on Wednesday evening, January 20th. Mrs. Corrine Rider-Kelsey, the eminent American soprano, will be the soloist.

Mr. Jury and his choir of 205 mixed voices have been rehearsing weekly and it is announced that there will be some very great surprises in store for those who will hear them on the 20th.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress
te JAN 3- 1909

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS FOR FIRST TIME HERE

Prodigy of Fiddle One of the Stars of the Boston Orchestra.

THAD RICH AS SOLOIST

Conductor Pohlig Presents Famous Violinist in Superb Composition at Academy.

Although but 18, Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who is to make his first appearance here, tomorrow night with the Boston Orchestra, is already regarded as a wondrous player in Europe. He has appeared in New York with success, according to newspaper notices of the time, and concertgoing London thinks him a marvel.

This prodigy of the fiddle has been playing in public more or less since he was a mere child. His later concert career dates from 1904, in St. Petersburg. Early in the following year he played in London and afterward in Paris. He arrived in New York early in December last, and made his Metropolitan debut December 10, with the Russian Symphony Orchestra.

Elman's debut number is usually the Tschaikowsky D major concerto, which he is to play at the Academy with the Boston orchestra tomorrow night. Impressionists love it for its haunting adagio and passionate andante; technicians for its long complicated and dazzling bravura, including the elaborate cadream—almost a composition in itself.

The orchestra numbers on the Boston band's program are Beethoven's Fifth symphony and MacDowell's tone poem "Lamia"—the latter only published in October last, nine months after the composer's death.

MacDowell wrote this work twenty years ago, when at the outset of his career. It is the third in order of his orchestral works. He considered it good enough to keep for revision—a task he did not live to undertake. The music, half juvenile, half Wagnerian, is based on Keats' fantastic poem of the same title.

From
Address
Date

Paderewski will sail for America toward the end of this month. He is coming primarily to hear his new symphony played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, being engaged incidentally to play several times with that organization, and with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will give only a limited number of recitals, one of which will be in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

1884

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
JAN 3- 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening and will be particularly interesting because it will mark the debut in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the extraordinary young Russian violinist who has been creating such a sensation throughout Europe and since his arrival in this country in New York and Boston, the only cities in which he has as yet appeared. An interesting feature will be the first performance in Philadelphia of Edward MacDowell's third symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work, although it dates back to the composer's early period, having been written in 1888, was not published until this year, and had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 23 and 24. It seems that MacDowell did not care to have it published because he expected always to revise certain parts of the orchestration, but after his death his widow and publisher decided that it should be given to the world. It has been warmly welcomed wherever it has been played this year. The program in its entirety will be as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony, No. 5 in C-Minor, Op. 60.

Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin in D-Major, Op. 35.

MacDowell—"Lamia," third symphonic poem (after Keats), Op. 29. (First time in Philadelphia.)

Weber—Overture, "Oberon."

Soloist—Mischa Elman.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
JAN 3- 1909

The third Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening and will be particularly interesting because it will mark the debut in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the extrordinary young Russian violinist, who has been creating such a sensation throughout Europe and since his arrival in this country in New York and Boston, the only cities in which he has as yet appeared.

Throughout Europe and now in New York and Boston Mischa Elman is considered one of the greatest living violinists, although he is but 18 years old. He is uoted for the remarkable richness and strength of his tone, the sweeping breadth and boldness of his phrasing and the maturity of his musicianship. Violinists who have heard him say that the perfection of his technique is almost beyond belief.

A very interesting item on the program will be the first performance in Philadelphia of Edward MacDowell's third symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work, although it dates back to the composer's early period, having been written in 1888, was not published until this year, and had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 23 and 24.

The program in its entirety will be as follows:—

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 60
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for Violin in D Major, Op. 35.
MacDowell—"Lamia," third symphonic poem (after Keats) Op. 29 (first time in Philadelphia).
Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

STAR.
JAN 3- 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The feature of the Boston symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock, will be the Washington debut of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist.

Elman is a Russian boy, who was born in Odessa in 1899. His father was his first teacher. At five he had appeared at a public concert, and at six he won a free scholarship in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa. Elman came to America last month and made his debut in New York with the Russian Symphony Orchestra December 10, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto, which he will play here in Washington.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress
te JAN 3- 1909

—Paderewski sails for America during the latter part of this month. He comes primarily to hear his new symphony played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and incidentally he will play several times with that orchestra and with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras, and will give a limited number of recitals. One of these recitals will be in Philadelphia, and it will be the only one in this city this year. It will be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

1884

JAN 3- 1909

FAMOUS SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Mischa Elman Will Make Local Debut With Tschaikowsky D-Major Concerto.

"LAMIA" BY MACDOWELL

Thaddeus Rich as Feature of Philadelphia's Two Concerts. Tina Lerner at Hotel.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, and will be particularly interesting because it will mark the debut in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist who created a sensation throughout Europe and who, in New York and Boston, the only cities in which he has as yet appeared, has been received with acclaim. Although he is but 18 years old, Elman is noted for the remarkable richness and strength of his tone, the sweeping breadth and boldness of his phrasing and the maturity of his musicianship. Violinists who have heard him say that the perfection of his technique is almost beyond belief. He was born in Russia and at 4 years of age received his first music lessons from his father. At the age of five Mischa played in a concert before the Princess Ourosow, who offered to educate and adopt him, but the offer was declined. In 1896 the boy became a pupil of Professor Fiedelman, in the Imperial School of Music, in Odessa, having won the first prize—a free scholarship at the entrance examination.

In 1902, when Leopold Auer, who was touring in Southern Russia, heard Elman play, he was so impressed that he telegraphed to the Czar for permission to bring Elman and his parents to St. Petersburg. When this permission was obtained Auer accepted Elman as a free pupil. In 1904 the lad made his first appearance in St. Petersburg, substituting for Professor Auer in an important engagement, and achieving an overwhelming success with the Tschaikowsky concerto. The same year Elman played in Berlin, where he duplicated his St. Petersburg success. A triumphal tour of Germany followed.

On March 21, 1905, Elman made his first appearance in London, on which occasion he played the Tschaikowsky concerto and completely won the English critics and public. Other orchestral concerts followed in quick succession. He has repeatedly appeared in Paris, and at such great musical events as the Birmingham Festival, the Gloucester and Lower Rhine festivals and he has had two successive seasons at the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipzig. Elman made his debut in America on December 10, with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, in New York, and then as after his first recital there, the praise of the New York critics was unanimous. He will play with the Boston Symphony the Tschaikowsky concerto.

An interesting item on the program will be the first performance in Philadelphia of Edward MacDowell's third symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work, although it dates back to the composer's early period, having been written in 1888, was not published until this year and had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 23 and 24. MacDowell did not care to have the work published because he expected always to revise certain parts of the orchestration. After his death his widow and his publisher decided that the work should be given to the world. It has been warmly welcomed wherever it has been played this year. The program further includes the Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 60, and the Weber overture of "Oberon."

* * *

JAN 3- 1909

Buffalo music lovers, to whom the annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the crowning musical event of the winter, are already asking about the program when the famous orchestra comes to Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 25. Many requests for special numbers are coming in, all of which are forwarded to Boston by the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, considers program making a fine art, and he has certainly made it an art so far as his selections for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are concerned. It is probable that the Buffalo program will include several works for which there have been the greatest number of requests. Full details concerning the concert will be announced shortly, but in the meantime mail orders for seats are coming in and will be cared for as received and before the general sale. These orders, accompanied by check, may be sent to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The first 16 rows are $2; the next 16, $1.50; the third 15 rows, $1, and the rest of the house, including the balcony, 75 cents.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
JAN 3- 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The third pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven concerto and on Saturday afternoon the Brahms concerto.

A particularly interesting feature of the concert on Thursday evening will be the first performance in New York of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations for orchestra. This work was begun in 1904, but was not completed until the winter of 1906-'07. The first performance was on July 1, 1907, at a festival concert of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Dresden. The first performance in the United States was at Chicago, by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, on October 30, 1908, and it was played for the first time in Boston on December 11, 1908. The work has caused a great deal of comment, not only because it was the one noteworthy composition presented at the Dresden festival, but because of a singular lawsuit which delayed the publication of the work and prevented its performance for a year. The final variation, No. 11, has the title "To a Celebrated Contemporary," and in it Noren has combined two motives taken from Richard Strauss's tone poem "A Hero Life" with material of his own. While the upper voice varies Noren's theme, violoncellos and horns announce the Strauss hero's theme, yet this theme is not exactly the one fashioned by Strauss. After development of this material another reminder of Strauss is introduced in the episode, the motive of "The Hero's Antagonist."

Soon after the first performance of "Kaleidoscope," the publisher of "Heldenleben" protested against the publication of Noren's Theme and Variations on the ground that the composer had taken without permission two themes from Strauss's work, in spite of the fact that the last variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss. The matter was taken into court, which submitted the question to a jury of experts, the contention being that, according to the copyright law of 1901, "In a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The jurists held that from the point of view of musical composition neither the leading theme (in the "Heldenleben") nor the motive of the opponents is a "melody." The main theme of the "Heldenleben" might be called a melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motive of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Moren permission to publish his work.

The work is in eleven sections. The first is entitled "Præambulum"; the second, "Mournful Dance"; the third, "Canon"; the fourth, "Scherzo"; the fifth, "In the Cathedral"; the sixth, "Pastorale"; the seventh, "Funeral March"; the eighth, "A Slav Dance"; the ninth, "From Far-off Days"; the tenth, "Mazurka," and the eleventh, "To a Celebrated Contemporary," which is a double fugue.

The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be three dances by Grétry, from the heroic ballet of "Cephalus and Procris", Beethoven's C minor Symphony, No. 5; Brahms's violin concerto and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Wasilly Safonoff has placed on the programme of the next Philharmonic Society concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Carnegie Hall, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E minor. Leo Schulz, 'cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist of these concerts, playing Volkmann's Concerto in A minor. The concerts will open with Schubert's Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished").

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JAN 3- 1909

Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

The boyish figure of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the famous Russian pianist, has been veritably lionized in Paris, Berlin, and London. His last Washington appearance, as special soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the occasion for a genuine demonstration of approval, and he was repeatedly called back for encores. Gabrilowitsch will be heard at the new Masonic Temple Auditorium Saturday evening of this week, appearing under the joint direction of Loudon Charlton and T. Arthur Smith. Gabrilowitsch is of medium height, neither slim nor stout, but full, firm, and virile in his lines. He is modest, yet appreciative, and steadied at all times by the repose that comes from certainty of his wonderful powers. When he plays it is to bring out every shade of feeling that was in the mind of the composer, and there can be little doubt that Gabrilowitsch himself finds that he is his own sternest critic.

The appearance of the Russian pianist at Masonic Temple Auditorium next Saturday will be in the nature of a farewell. Three times previous to his present tour he has visited America and on each occasion his work has made a profound impression. The importance of the forthcoming recital seems to be fully understood by local concert-goers and a large audience is assured. The sale of reserved seats will be conducted at T. Arthur Smith's, 1411 F street northwest.

...WASHINGTON, D.C. ...
JAN 3 - 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 7, at 8.15 o'clock, and Saturday afternon, January 9, at 2.30 o'clock. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at both concerts. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Brahms Cncerto.

Besides Elman the particularly interesting feature of the concert on Thursday evening will be the first performance in New York of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," an original Theme and Variations for orchestra. The work has caused a great deal of comment, not only because it was the one noteworthy composition presented at a Dresden Festival, but because of a singular lawsuit which delayed the publication of the work and prevented its performance for a year. The final Variation No. 11 has the title of "To a Celebrated Contemporary," and in it Noren has combined two motives taken from Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "A Hero Life," with material of his own. While the upper voice varies Noren's theme, violoncellos and horns announce the Straussian hero's theme, yet this theme is not exactly the one fashioned by Strauss. After development of this material another reminder of Strauss is introduced in the episode; the motive of "The Hero's Antagonists."

Soon after the first performance of "Kaleidoscope" the publisher of "A Hero Life" protested against the publication of Noren's Theme and Variations on the ground that the composer had taken without permission two themes from Strauss' work, this despite the fact that the last Variation was intended as a compliment to Strauss. The matter was taken into court, which submitted the question to a jury of experts, the contention being that according to the copyright law of 1'901, "In a musical compositon it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The jurists held that from the standpoint of musical composition neither the leading theme (in the Heldenleben) nor the motive of the opponents is a "melody." The main theme of the "Heldenleben" might be called a melodic theme, but not a melody, while the motive of the antagonist is a direct and conscious negation of melody. On this ground the court granted Noren permission to publish his work.

The work is in eleven sections. The first is entitled "Praeambulum"; the second, "Mournful Dance"! the third, "Canon"; the fourth, "Scherzo"; the fifth, "In the Cathedral"; the sixth, "Pastorale"; the seventh, "Funeral March"; the eighth, "A Slav Dance"; the ninth, "From Far-Off Days"; the tenth, "Mazurka," and the eleventh, "To a Celebrated Contemporary," which is a double fugue.

The other number on the Thursday evening programme will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be Three Dances by Gretry from the Heroic Ballet of Cephalus and Procris; Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C minor; Brahms violin concerto and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

...ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...s

At the Symphony Concert.

A large and brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall Tuesday night for the second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the audience were noted Hon. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Rev. and Mrs. James E. McConnell, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. Anna Ellis Dexter, Boston: Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mr. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Harriett E. Barrows, Miss Geneva Jefferds, Miss Caroline Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan W. Littlefield, Mr. and Mrs. Horace G. Belcher, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Dempster, Mrs. John O. Tillinghast, Mrs. J. Earl Clauson, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Etta Fraser, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Miss Charlotte Remington, Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Thurston, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister, Miss Edith Nichols, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Margaret Dwight, Mrs. James F. Phetteplace, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. Julian Hereshoff, Miss Eleanor H. Congdon, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Mr. and Mrs. Howard D. Wilcox, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. Charles A. Gale, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B Rockwell, the Misses Rockwell, Mrs. Grace L. Johnson, Miss Ada Johnson, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Mrs. Henry I. Cushman, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Miss Caroline Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Kent Goodwin, Mrs. Frank G. Spencer, Mr. Frank Spencer, Mrs. John M. Buffinton, Miss Buffinton, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandall, Miss Harriett J. Miller, the Misses Willson, Mr. E. C. Ostby, Miss Ostby, the Misses Sherman, the Misses Vaughn, Mr. Harold B. Cranshaw.

...om ...PUBLIC...
...ldress ...PHILADELPHIA PA
...e ...JAN 3 - 1909

The third Boston Symphony ... be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening and will be particularly interesting because it will mark the debut in Philadelphia of Mischa Elman, the extraordinary young Russian violinist, who has been creating such a sensation throughout Europe and since his arrival in this country in New York and Boston, the only cities in which he has as yet appeared.

Throughout Europe and now in New York and Boston Mischa Elman is considered one of the greatest living violinists, although he is but 18 years old. He is noted for the remarkable richness and strength of his tone, the sweeping breadth and boldness of his phrasing and the maturity of his musicianship. Violinists who have heard him say that the perfection of his technique is almost beyond belief. He was born in Russia and received his first music lessons from his father when four years old. At the age of five he played in a concert before the Princess Ourosow, who offered to educate and adopt him, which offer, however, was declined. In 1896 he became a pupil of Professor Fiedelman. in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa, and won his first prize—a free scholarship, at his entrance examination.

In 1902, when Leopold Auer, while touring in Southern Russia, heard him, he was so impressed with the great gifts of the boy that he telegraphed to the Tsar for permission to bring Elman and his parents to St. Petersburg. This permission was obtained, Auer accepting him as a free pupil. In 1904 he made his first appearance in St. Petersburg, substituting for Professor Auer in an important engagement, and achieved an overwhelming success with the Tschalkowsky concerto. The same year he played in Berlin, where he duplicated his St. Petersburg success, and a tour of Germany following, there was the same sensational stir wherever he appeared.

On March 21, 1905, Elman made his first appearance in London, on which memorable occasion he played the Tschalkowsky concerto, completely capturing the English critics and public. Other orchestral concerts followed in quick succession, and he has repeatedly appeared in Paris and at such great musical events as the Birmingham Festival, the Gloucester and Lower Rhine Festivals and two successive seasons at the Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipsic. He made his debut in America on December 10 with the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York, and then, as after his first recital there, the praise of the New York critics was unanimous. He will play with the Boston Symphony the Tschaikowsky Concerto, which he has used as a mode of introducing himself in every large city where he has appeared.

MISCHA ELMAN

A very interesting number on the programme will be the first performance in Philadelphia of Edward MacDowell's third symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work, although it dates back to the composer's early period, having been written in 1888, was not published until this year and had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 23 and 24. It seems that MacDowell did not care to have it published, because he expected always to revise certain parts of the orchestration, but after his death his widow and publisher decided that it should be given to the world. It has been warmly welcomed wherever it has been played this year. The programme its entirety will be as follows:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 60. Beethoven
Concerto for violin in D major, Op. 35, Tschaikowsky
"Lamia," third symphonic poem (after Keates), Op. 29 ..... MacDowell
(First time in Philadelphia.)
Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

* * *

...of concerts of the

...ss ...
...
PHILADELPHIA PA
JAN 3 - 1909

* * *

Paderewski sails for America toward the end of this month. He comes primarily to hear his new symphony played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and incidentally he will play several times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras, and will give a limited number of recitals. One of these recitals will be in Philadelphia, and it will be the only one in this city this year. It will be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

* * *

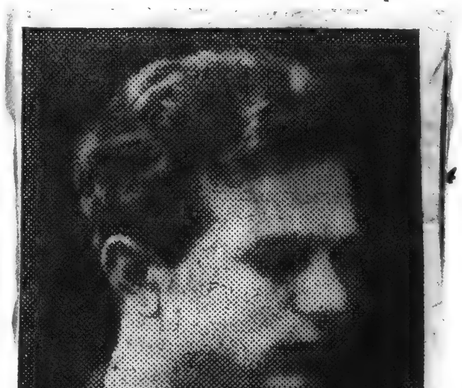
MISCHA ELMAN PROVES A WONDERFUL VIOLINIST

Young Russian Causes Storm of Applause That Almost Stops Concert.

MISCHA ELMAN

MISCHA ELMAN, the Russian violin prodigy who has, during the past four years, caused so manny sensations in Europe, last night made his first Philadelphia appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a tthe Academy of Music. He played the Tschaikowsky concerto and, at the end, was greeted by a storm of applause so long, so loud and so persistent as to threaten to bring the concert to an abrupt close then and there. Conductor Fiedler was obviously embarrassed, but the upper tiers were crowded with Elman's countrymen, and they and many of the supposedly more self-contained auditors in the lower part of the house were fairly carried off their feet by the marvellous playing of the 1-year-old boy. The furore was decidedly rude to the orchestra, but it was excusable, for the equal of this young giant of the bow has not been heard here in many years. Elman does not need the consideration usually allowed to youth. In the mastery of his art he seems already fully matured. What he will be in the future is almost beyond the realm of conjecture, for he has already arrived at the pinnacle. Combined with a technic that recognizes no obstacles, he has a masterly musical intelligence, an instinct for getting into the soul of things, that is beyond schooling and above tradition. All that can be said of the recognized geniuses of the violin can be said of him, and his youth and his magnetic presence but add to the impression. Mr. Fiedler must excuse his audience for making him wait twenty minutes while they applauded.

So much of an Elman evening was it that one almost lost sight of the orchestra. Yet their work was the same perfection that they have accustomed us to. Their reading of the Beethoven fifth symphony was purity itself, and their splendid resourcefulness was also shown in the beautiful "Lamia" symphonic poem by MacDowell, which they gave its first Philadelphia presentation.



MISCHA ELMAN
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Lyric, Wednesday, January 6. First appearance in Baltimore.

From NEW YORK HERALD.
Address BROOKLYN ... New York City.
Date JAN 4 ...

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S THIRD VISIT FRIDAY

Will Give Notable Concert with Mr. Max Fiedler, Conductor—The Institute Programme.

For their third visit to Brooklyn on Friday night, in the new Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, will give a notable programme, in which they will be assisted by Mr. Mischa Elman, violin. In detail the numbers will be:—

Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67....Beethoven
Allegro con brio. Andante con moto. Allegro; Trio Allegro.
Concerto in D major, for violin, op. 35, Tschaikowsky
Allegro moderato. Canzonetta—Andante. Finale—Allegro vivacissimo.
Overture to the opera 'Der Freischütz"....Weber

On Thursday afternoon, in the music hall, Mr. Howard Brockway will give a lecture recital on the programme of January 8.

Several new courses of lectures will be begun this week in the various halls of the academy. This afternoon Mr. Carl Fiqué will give the first of a series of six lecture recitals on "Important Chapters in Musical History," his first subject being Wagner's "Das Reingold." In the evening Professor George P. Baker, of Harvard, will begin a series of lectures on "The Drama in England and America," with the subject "What Is a Play? Some Essential Differences Between the Novel and the Play." Also this evening there will be a lecture by Professor Louis Kahlenberg, of the University of Wisconsin, on "Some Objections to the Theory of Ions."

For Tuesday afternoon there is announced the first of a series of six lectures on "The Significance of Art," by Mr. Daniel A. Huebsch. Mr. Huebsch will have for his initial subject "Art as an Historic Record."

On Tuesday evening Mr. Wallace Goold Levison will conduct a conference on "Rakestraws and the Collecting of Microscopic Minerals."

The first in a course of four lectures on "Les Femmes Ecrivains de L'Heure Actuelle" will be given in the Polytechnic on Tuesday evening by Professor Louis Delamarre.

Professor Fernbach will bring to a close his chemistry lectures on Tuesday evening with a discussion of "Starch and Its Industrial Applications."

On Wednesday Professor Burton will give his second Thackeray lecture, his subject being "The Early Essayist and Dramatist."

Mr. Alfred W. Martin will on Thursday afternoon begin a series of lectures on "Browning, the Poet of Painting." His first subject will be "Introductory; Browning's Preparation for His Art Poems." On Thursday evening there will be a lecture by Professor Edward B. Poulton, of Oxford University, on "The Value of Animal Coloring in the Struggle for Life."

Friday's evening lecture will be given by Mr. H. Snowden Ward, of London, England, on "The Marvels of Photography."

At the various branches interesting lectures also are planned. At the Jamaica branch, on Tuesday evening, Professor William H. Burr will lecture on "The Panama Canal," and on Wednesday evening, at the Flushing branch Mr. and Mrs. William Grafing King will give a violin and piano recital. The Olive Mead Quartet will give concerts at the Huntington branch on Wednesday night, on Thursday night at the Hempstead branch and on Friday at the Garden City branch.

...is even.

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

A feature of the third Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric Wednesday evening will be the Baltimore debut of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who for the last four years has been giving concerts in Europe.

Elman was born in Odessa in 1890. His father is a violinist and was his first teacher. So astonishing was the talent of the boy that at 5 years of age he appeared in a public concert and at 6 he won a free scholarship in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa and became the prize pupil of Professor Fiedelman.

son taking January 8 in place of Mme. Germaine Schnitzer and Mr. Bart Wirtz, who will give the recital of January 22.

Mr. Hutcheson, who is professor of piano at the conservatory, is one of the most gifted and successful musicians who have made

MISCHA ELMAN

He came to America last month and made his debut in New York with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto, which he will play in Baltimore.

Owing to the length of the concerto there will be but two other works on the program. One will be Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, which will be the first, and the other, the last, will be the pre...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
rom PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ddress
JAN 5 1909

BOY VIOLINIST SETS BIG AUDIENCE WILD

Mischa Elman Receives 13 Recalls and 7 More Minutes of Applause at Concert.

VAIN PLEA FOR ENCORE

Despite Remarkable Demonstration Conductor Refuses to Break Tradition.

One of the most remarkable demonstrations ever witnessed in the Academy of Music took place last night when Mischa Elman, the 18-year-old violinist, who has all European music lovers on their knees to him, made his first appearance as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For many minutes after the artist had finished his concerto the audience was simply in a frenzy over his playing. They wanted an encore and with cheers and shouted terms of approbation demanded it despite the long-standing rule at these concerts that none shall be given. Herr Fiedler, the conductor, stood firmly for the traditions of the organization and finally was victorious, but not before the people had given 13 recalls to the soloist—an almost unheard of record at any such performances. Without a doubt Elman made the greatest hit of any violinist heard here in many years.

The programme was as follows:

1. Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.
2. Tschaikowsky, Violin Concerto in D major.
3. MacDowell, "Lamia," symphonic poem. (After Keats.)
4. Weber, overture to "Oberon."

With the exception of the parterre boxes the Academy was well filled. The distinguishing features of the performance of the Fifth Symphony were an electrifying crescendo, from almost no sound at all to a tremendous volume of tone in the third movement, and the poignant climaxes of the finale, which was taken at a tremendous pace. Mr. Longy's famous oboe threaded its way through the polyphony "with the moon's beauty and the moon's soft pace," and the 'cellos sang together to beautiful effect.

The critic must throw up his hands in despair when the talk is of Mischa Elman's playing. It beggars the vocabulary at the outset, of all the substantives that connote temperament, poetry, passion. He plays as one who "hears strange things that are soundless, and sees the invisible." In certain respects he quite outdoes any other musician before the public today; but it is to be hoped that his art is "too great for haste, too high for rivalry."

Whatever the audience came to see, what they actually saw was a very boyish-looking fellow who took a long time to tune his violin with the A offered by Mr. Longy's oboe and Concertmeister Willy Hess's violin, while Conductor Fiedler sent for the librarian and had his conductor's desk raised a foot or so. Then, as if to overcome his own diffidence, Elman pitched headlong into the first bars of the music with the orchestra, warming up for the solo passages to come.

Elman played with transcendent, well-nigh superhuman art—it might have been a Martian, for such violin playing has not before been heard. The audience was utterly demoralized by it. They broke into the first movement twice with their applause, simply because they could not help it, and after this movement the applause lasted with undiminished volume for a minute and a quarter.

At the conclusion the audience began by recalling him once—Conductor Fiedler grasped his hands warmly—a second time. Concertmeiser Willy Hess did likewise; three times and a fourth, and now there were roars of "Bravo!" and "Good for you!" from every part of the house; a fifth time, and the roars were louder. With the seventh recall Fiedler returned to his desk and stood like a graven image. The applause did not let up for a fraction of a second, and white gloves were giving way. At the ninth recall the roars became as much like yells as anything the classic precincts of the Academy ever heard. And then it settled down into a contest between the audience and Fiedler with his Draconian rule of no encores (in which he is, of course, absolutely right). At the 13th recall Elman, the modest hero of the remarkable demonstration, came just within the door and boxed the compass with his bows, but it was no use. He hid himself and came out no more, but the applause lasted for seven minutes after his disappearance.

Mr. Fiedler in despair stepped down off the dais and waited for the audience to come to terms. The law-abiding portion sympathized with him and with the venerable tradition of the concerts, and roundly hissed the turbulent element who kept on applauding. Finally, a clear victory for the dignity of his orchestra and his art, Fiedler won; and the very cordial applause and the two recalls which followed the MacDowell symphonic poem were in part for the wonderfully beautiful and romantic music, and in part for Herr Fiedler's heroic stand for a matter of musical principle. The Weber overture fairly lifted the hearers off their feet and made a magnificent conclusion to a soul-satisfying concert.

m
ress
JAN 5 1909

WILD OVER ELMAN

The Boston Symphony Concert Scene of a Great Demonstration.

With Mischa Elman as the soloist in Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major for the violin, in a general program made up of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, MacDowell's "Lamia," his third symphonic poem, and Weber's "Oberon" overture, Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, unfolded a musical treat last evening at the Academy of Music.

Youth and an inspired audacity, with the true abandon of the wonder-child kind, made Elman's delicious tone, his lyrical style and his technical ability carry his audience with him in an overwhelming manner in the concerto. In fact, his friends in the body of the house and the crowded galleries were so overcome that the frenzied applause lasted twenty minutes. Called out again and again and again, fourteen times, with the rule against encores in force, the demonstration became embarrassing, and Fiedler tried to stop it, but it persisted until the applauders wore themselves out after the fashion of the gallery at political conventions.

The absolute sureness, as well as beauty of tone; the lively, captivating mannerisms; the dazzling skill in harmonies, and the mastery of all the technical tricks, made Elman indeed a real prodigy, but the transports of his admirers certainly made the occasion one long to be remembered.

As for the rest of the program, the symphony was interpreted as the Boston men know how to sing its beauties and Fiedler's variations were in no sense distracting, but on the whole made this very familiar work seem as marvelous and as glorious as ever. The Oberon overture was delightfully done, of course, and MacDowell's exquisite "Lamia," with its contrasts and splendid outbursts and tuneful measures, melodious and fine in coloring, was given an interpretation that made this great American master's work stand out. The audience was enthusiastic after symphony, and also after the "Lamia," but the Elwan demonstration made everything else seem pale.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ELMAN A GENIUS

Remarkable Demonstration at Debut of Young Russian Violinist.

To the Boston Symphony Orchestra belongs the honor of introducing to Philadelphia one of the greatest violinists of modern times, the young Russian, Mischa Elman, who, at the Academy of Music, made his local debut last night in a truly wonderful rendition of the Tschaikowsky concerto. Although but 18 years of age, Mischa Elman had already made a European reputation which preceded him to this country, but no reputation could picture or convey the genius of this young man. Hardly more than a child in appearance, small in stature, very graceful, yet with a face full of maturity and power, he makes, in his appearance, before playing, a curiously attractive impression. When he came on the stage he was given a graceful welcome in the way of encouragement and recognition. When he walked off the stage, after his astonishing performance, the enthusiasm for his genius was unbounded. It is doubtful if any artist who ever appeared on the Academy stage created a greater furore. The outbursts of applause during the concerto were a mere indication of what was to come. For fully 15 minutes the uproar was terrific. Of course, everyone wanted an encore, but despite the demand there was none given, although Elman came out and bowed his acknowledgments at least a dozen times.

It is safe to say that the majority of persons who went to the Academy last night expected to hear a performance, perhaps technically perfect, but lacking in maturity and conception—in short, a performance in keeping with the youth of the artist. What was heard was an absolutely masterly rendition of a work made familiar to us by all the great violinists of the age. Kreisler, Ysaye, all of them, have played it for us, but Elman in one particular is in a class by himself. He has a tone that probably surpasses anything ever heard in this city. His surprising skill, technically faultless phrasing, perfect rhythm all sink into insignificance before the glory of that marvelous, luscious tone. The G string was more like a deep-toned 'cello than an ordinary violin. It is only possible to describe Elman by attributing his achievements to the inspiration of genius. A violinist who can make the powerful Boston Orchestra seem thin and pale is more than a genius.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, has done a beautiful thing in bringing out the work of our great native composer, Edward MacDowell. Under ordinary circumstances his tone poem, "Lamia," would have been an event, but coming after the revelation of Elman's genius the work could not receive the judgment and appreciation it merited.

The Beethoven Fifth Symphony, which opened the program, was given a masterly reading. Fiedler has endeared himself to us by the nobility and breadth of his work. His Beethoven interpretations are wonderful classics. There were many who admired his dignity and composure, and the patience he displayed in his efforts to start the orchestra after Elman's retirement. The demonstration transcended the bounds of courtesy.

[illegible]
PA

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Debut of Mischa Elman Feature of Its Concert Last Evening

The feature of the concert in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard at the Academy of Music last evening was the first appearance in this city of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist—he is only eighteen years old—whom Mr. Hammerstein is reported to have discovered and induced to visit the United States, and of whose performance it is the highest possible praise to say that it did not at all disappoint the expectations which the heralding announcements had aroused. For several weeks the industrious press agent has been filling newspaper offices with glowing tributes to this young artist's extraordinary abilities, tributes which have been received with a greater or less degree of skepticism according to the temperament and experience of the recipient. It did not seem possible that anyone could play the fiddle as well as this gifted youth was declared to do, and at least some of those who went to hear him last evening must have been prepared to find that his praises had been exaggerated.

Strange to say, and contrary to what usually happens, the contrary proved to be the fact. Mischa Elman is indeed an extraordinary player. Young as he is, there is in his performance no suggestion of immaturity. His mastery over the technical difficulties of his instrument is complete. He can do everything with it that there is to be done with the greatest brilliancy and without the least sense of effort. His bowing is broad and free; his fingering clean and true; his double-stopping pure and accurate; his staccato singularly clear and crisp; and his tone, which is the cardinal virtue of all, wonderfully full and rich and pure and resonant. And to these merits his playing adds that of a high and sympathetic intelligence. He had chosen for his vehicle the inordinately exacting and somewhat arid concerto of Tschaikowsky in D major, Op. 35, and he interpreted this not very grateful music with a power and eloquence and sincerity of emotional expression which gave life and value even to its least inviting sections, and imparted to the composition in its entirety a significance which had not before been revealed. It was really a wonderful exhibition of virtuosity and the enthusiastic applause which it elicited was wholly deserved. Mischa Elman is one of the great violinists of the world, and he surely has it in him to become the very greatest.

The other elements in one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season were wonderfully finished interpretations of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, of Weber's "Oberon" overture, and of MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," which had not before been heard here, and which, although not of distinct importance, proved to be very well worth the hearing. Max Fiedler conducted.

[illegible]
om
dress
te

BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 6- 1909

BALTIMORE DEBUT OF MISCHA ELMAN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The feature of the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Lyric this evening at 8.15 o'clock, will be the Baltimore debut of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who for the last four years has been the reigning sensation of Europe, and since his arrival in this country has repeated the extraordinary success which seems to have placed him quite in a class by himself.

Mischa Elman is a Russian boy, having been born in Odessa in 1890. His father is a violinist and was his first teacher. So astonishing was the talent of the boy that at 5 he had appeared in a public concert, and at 6 he had won a free scholarship in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa and became the prize pupil of Professor Fiedelman.

Elman came to America last month and made his debut in New York with the Russian Symphony Orchestra on December 10, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto, which he will play in Baltimore. The papers were unanimously enthusiastic in their praise of him and audiences went wild.

Owing to the length of the concerto there will be but two other works on the program. One will be Beethoven's symphony in C minor No. 5, which will be the first, and the other, the last, will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

NEW YORK PRESS,
New York City.
JAN 6- 1909

The first work on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening in Carnegie Hall will be Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations. These Variations last thirty-five minutes and are played without pause. Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should take special pains to be in their seats by 8.15 o'clock, for after Noren's work is begun the doors will be closed and no one admitted until the end.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.

Thursday night there will be another overflow of music of the most attractive qualities. The Boston Symphony, with Elman as soloist, will play at Carnegie hall; Dr. Wullner, the great lieder interpreter, will give his fourth recital at Mendelssohn hall, and the Marum quartet will give its first concert at Cooper union, with the assistance of Ernest Schellin, pianist.

Musical Enthusiasm and Good Manners

Last Monday evening at the Academy of Music, when a new planet in the person of Mischa Elman, the violinist, swept into the ken of local music lovers, there was almost unprecedented enthusiasm. The manly personality and commanding art of the player deserved the spontaneous part of the tribute. It was to be regretted, however, that the legitimate enthusiasm of the major part of the audience degenerated, among a small minority, into a kind of emotional hysteria that entirely forgot its good manners and allowed its hero worship to go beyond the bounds of dignity and decorum, and defy certain conventions of orchestral concerts at the Academy which are worthy of respect and entirely proper to be observed.

To be specific, the first movement of the Tschaikowsky concerto was twice interrupted with applause, although the orchestral accompaniment, an essential part of the music, was in full blast. Such interpolations are confusing, for in a concerto there are no places to pause momentarily, such as there generally are after arias in the opera. There is more excuse for punctuating the opera with the noise as of many waters, made by the meeting palms of thousands, for an act of an opera consumes a considerable length of time in the performance, and perhaps it is expecting too much of human nature to ask an audience to keep its enthusiasm bottled up until the curtain has descended. But one movement of a violin concerto is not long enough to justify such sacrilegious interpolations. The applause should come afterward, and not interrupt the playing.

And when the concerto was finished it was a breach of the customary courtesies and an unpardonable offense against the ethics of the concert room for a handful of persons to keep applauding when the majority had agreed to defer to the sensible "No encore" tradition. Three or four times, when silence was apparently restored, these persons seized upon the instant when Conductor Fiedler raised his baton to renew their demonstrations. No wonder that at one time it looked as though the game would be called, and as though the gentlemen from Boston might fold up their stands and, like the Arabs, steal away. In the long run the good sense of the law-abiding majority prevailed, and Mr. Fiedler's course in abiding firmly by the unwritten rule was unreservedly commended by those who realized, with Mary Cholmondeley, that "the devil's greatest ally is want of perception," and that those who were "going it blind" in the matter of applause were wholly in the wrong and clearly censurable.

Mr. Fiedler, though there were moments when the victory trembled in the scale, made a firm stand on Monday evening for the dignity of his art, the integrity of his artistic conception and the traditions that properly govern these orchestral concerts, not merely for the Boston Orchestra but for our splendid local organization as well. That he did not capitulate, that he made no concession in an important matter of musical principle, reflects honor upon him and upon the profession he represents.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

THE NEWS MAIL BAG—BEETHOVEN'S GREATEST SYMPHONY AT BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S NEXT CONCERT

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

A splendid program is promised for the next concert of the Boston Symphony on January 6—the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Tschaikowsky violin concerto and Beethoven's greatest and most famous work—the Fifth Symphony.

To quote from Hector Berliotz in the program notes, "the Symphony in C minor seems to us to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrows, his concentrated rage, his reveries charged with a dejection, oh! so sad, his visions at night, his bursts of enthusiasm—these furnish him the subject; and the forms of melody, harmony, rhythm and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual and new as they are powerful and noble."

Perhaps the two most notable performances of the Symphony given in Baltimore were the performance under the direction of Theodore Thomas on the occasion of his last and never-to-be-forgotten concert in this city and the performance of it by Dr. Muck at his first Baltimore concert. Although so often played, it can never be played too often. The great conductor, Theodore Thomas, gave it more than 2000 times in the course of his famous career, and even to those very familiar with the score each hearing of the great master's wonderful Symphony reveals new beauties in the music. Perhaps no better description of the Symphony, from the standpoint of the average concert-goer, has ever been written than that contained in the charming sketch recently published by Dr. Henry Van Dyke entitled "The Music Lover," and from which I quote the following:

The lover of music had come to his favorite seat. It was in the front row of the balcony just where the curve reaches its outermost point and, like a rounded headland, meets the unbroken flow of the long, rolling, invisible waves of rhythmical sound. . . . He knew that his coign of vantage, by some secret confluence of architectural lines, gave him the very best of the delight of hearing that the vast hall contained . . . He had arrived at an oasis in the day; since morning he had been toiling through the Sahara of the city's noise—arid, senseless, inhospitable noise; roaring of wheels, clanging of bells, shrieking of whistles, clatter of machinery, squawking of horns, raucous, strident voices; confused, bewildering, exhausting noise; a desolate and unfriendly desert for the ear. Now he found himself in a haven of refuge. It needed something more than the absence of harsh and brutal and meaningless noise to satisfy him; it needed the presence of melody and harmony; and this he found flowing all around him, entering deeply into him, filling all the parched and empty channels of his being, as he listened to Beethoven's great Symphony in C minor. There was nothing between him and the orchestra. He looked over the railing of the gallery, which shaded his eyes from the lights above the boxes, straight across the gulf in which the mass of the audience, diminutive and indistinguishable, seemed to be submerged, to the brilliant island of the stage. . . . The noble interpretation of the composer's musical idea flowed forth at the leader's touch as if each motive and phrase, each period of melody, were waiting somewhere in the air to reveal itself at his light signal, and through all the movement of the allegro con brio, with its momentous struggle between fate and the human soul, the orchestra answered to the master's will as if it were a single instrument. . . . In the pause that followed the andante the lover of music let himself drift quietly with the thoughts of peace and concord awakened by this loveliest of andantes. The beginning of scherzo found him in a new relation to the visible image of the orchestra. The wierd, almost supernatural music, murmured at first by the cellos and double bases, then proclaimed by the horns as if by the trumpet of Fate itself, the repetition of the same struggle of emotions which had marked the first movement, but now more tense, more passionate, more human, the strange fantastic mingling of comedy and tragedy in the trio and the fugue with its abrupt questions and answers; all this seemed to him like the moving picture of the inner life of man. . . . The grizzled head of the cellist bent over his instrument with an air of quiet devotion; the burly form of the player of the double bassoon behind his rare and awkward instrument waiting for his time to come in had the look of a man who could not be surprised or troubled at anything; one of the bass violinists had the rough-hewn figure and the divinely chiseled, sorrow-lighted face of Lincoln; others were children of the every day; the clarinettist, with his dark beard and high temples, might have sat for Rembrandt's picture of "The Philosopher," and the rotund kettle drummer, with his smooth head and sparkling eyes restlessly turning his little keys and bending down to listen to the tuning of his grotesque music-ports, seemed impatient for the part in the score when he was to build the magical bridge on which the Symphony passes without a break from the third to the last movement. "All these persons," said the inner voice of the lover of music, "have their own lives and characters. They have known joys and sorrows, failures and successes. They have hoped and feared. All that Beethoven poured into this music from his experience with poverty, of conflict with physical weakness and the cruel limitations of fate, of baffled desire, of loneliness, of strong resolution, of immortal courage and faith, these players in their measure and degree have known." . . . The lover of music drew a long breath. The storm of applause did not disturb him. He did not notice that the audience had arisen. He was looking at the orchestra, already beginning to melt away. Presently a cane was stretched out from the row behind him and touched him on the shoulder. He turned around and saw the face of his friend the dreamer, the Brushwood boy, with his bright eyes and disheveled hair. And beside him was the radiant presence of the Girl Who Understood.

"Lieber Meister," said the boy, "you are coming now with us. There is a bite and a sup and a pipe and an open fire waiting for you in our room. Bitte komm."

Surely one must enjoy the Fifth Symphony the more for having read Dr. Van Dyke's entrancing description of a performance in Carnegie Hall, New York.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.
Baltimore, Jan. 4.

The News invites contributions to its Mail Bag columns, and especially short, vigorous letters on questions of public interest. It cannot undertake to publish letters exceeding 250 words, and reserves the right rigidly to condense communications which are of greater length. Letters must contain the name and address of the writer, but these will not be published if request to that effect is made.

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Mrs. Roosevelt Occupies Box at National Theater.

FAIRBANKSES ENTERTAINED

Miss Roosevelt Guest of Honor at Brilliant Ball Given by Mrs. Richard Townsend—Secretary and Mrs. Straus Give Dinner Party—Ambassador and Mme. Nabuco Are Hosts.

Mrs. Roosevelt occupied a box at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. In her party were Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Christine Roosevelt, of New York, and Miss Hagner. Mrs. Straus, wife of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, was in a box also, and had with her her daughter, Mrs. Hochstadter, and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Percy Straus.

m EVENING SUN,
ress New York City.
e

Noren's "Kaleidoscope" is new music at to-night's 2,659th Boston Symphony concert, in Carnegie Hall. The doors close at 8:15 o'clock and the eleven variations, lasting thirty-five minutes, are played without pause.

Late comers will hear Elman's Beethoven concerto and the "Transfiguration" of Strauss.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HEAR NEW STRAUSS MUSIC.

Large Audience at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its third concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before a large and enthusiastic audience. The program was as follows: Prelude to "Lohengrin" (Wagner); tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24 (Richard Strauss), first time in Washington; Concerto in D major, for violin, op. 35 (Tschaikowsky); Overture to the opera "Oberon (Weber).

The soloist was Mischa Elman, who made his first appearance in Washington on this occasion. The event of greatest importance on this program was the performance of the Strauss number, for there can be no soloist, however celebrated, whose premiere in a city may be rightfully ranked above the premiere of an important work by one of the greatest living composers.

In this, as in his other symphonic poems, Richard Strauss illustrates his theories of "program music" or music written to suggest, represent, or illustrate a definite idea. Various composers have produced music of this description, and each has had his pet theory as to just how far it is possible to make music a medium of definite expression.

Liszt explained Beethoven's object in "program music" to be not the actual imitation of sounds in nature, nor the representation of external objects in the music idiom, but the reproduction of the sensations or mood effects created on the mind of the hearer by those objects. Schumann's notion of the function of the "program" or story of a musical work was different from that of Beethoven, for his music was conceived independently of any acknowledged concept. But after completing his piece, Schumann added a superscription in words, meant to place the hearer in the correct frame of mind for its proper reception and appreciation.

Edward MacDowell, America's great composer, held that so long as music was good music, the "program" would do it no harm, and it is this standard by which the longevity of Richrad Strauss' tone poems will be measured. If they are good music, they will survive the centuries; if they correctly describe or illustrate some poem, fable, fiction, but are poor music, they will have an early death.

It is perhaps too early to forecast the fate of Richard Strauss and his "program" music. The representation of the sick man, his fatal illness, and his passage into a new world is realistically portrayed in "Death and Transfiguration," but whether the music is great, considered as music alone, is a problem difficult to determine after a single hearing. To our present-day ears, attuned to the harmonies (once discords) of Wagner, Strauss, in this poem, still stands cacophonous. There is a glimpse now and then straight from the realms of melody—melody that can be recognized by the concert-goer of today as such, but whether or not the rest of the vision—that portion which now seems cloudy to our aural vision, is the melody of the future, is a matter which the future must decide.

Washington has now, thanks to Dr. Fiedler, heard two of the much-talked-of symphonic poems of Richard Strauss, the other being "Till Eulenspiegel." The latter has been played three times in this city, and improves with acquaintance. Doubtless the same may be said of yesterday's tone poem when next it is played in this city.

The Tschaikowsky concerto was performed here last, I believe, by Alexander Petchnikoff. It was given a poetic interpretation yesterday by young Elman, who proved himself to be an artist fully worthy of the encomiums now being lavished upon him.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

Cutting Bureau in the World

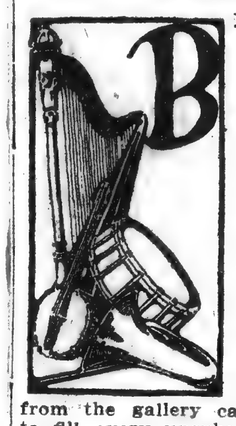
NORTH
ress PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 5 1907

LOUD CHEERS GREET VIOLINIST AT ACADEMY

Remarkable Reception for Mischa Elman, Boston Symphony Soloist.

WONDERFUL SKILL

Great Audience Applauds for Fifteen Minutes at Conclusion of Number.



BRILLIANT virtuosity marked the Philadelphia debut of Violinist Mischa Elman at the Boston Orchestra's third concert of the season. The Academy was crowded with star worshipers, who had heard from afar wondrous stories of Elman's genius. From the 2000 or more turned away from the gallery came recruits enough to fill every unsubscribed parquet seat.

After the violinist's masterly playing of the Tschaikowsky D major concerto, ensued a scene without parallel since Paderewski's initial appearance here. The idol-worshipers filled the air with tumultuous applause, mingled with ecstatic cries and hoarse, excited shouts. This continued for nearly a quarter of an hour until the star, wearied with trips to the footlights, confined his recognition of applause to perfunctory bows from the side entrance.

Elman is a wonderful player, with extraordinary temperament, remarkably perfect technique, and maturity of interpretation that is almost incomprehensible and incredible.

Only the vast tonality of earlier great masters was lacking. There was no lack of power, apparently, because of the artists resolute repression of piano passages. The entire second movement of the concerto was thus played, with a beautiful legato that imparted artistic authority to the violinist's conception.

Elman is bound to be the musical sensation of the day. He looks even younger than his years should indicate; his stature is low—almost dwarfish—and he employs none of the ad captandum devices with which violin stars are wont to tickle the fancy of audiences.

Critical comment on his playing is, necessarily, measured by and confined to phrases of laudation. This is a real "wizard of the bow," and not a fictitious imitation. Such delicacy of expression, concentrated artistry of technique and commanding genius of temperamental interpretation has not been heretofore disclosed to this generation.

There will be ample further occasion to note at length the phases of this young musician's fascinating art. Music audiences love to be violently moved by manifestations of genius, and Elman's violin playing comes clearly within this category.

Other numbers on the program were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, performed with customary precision by the orchestral veterans. MacDowell's "Lamia," a symphonic poem in his earlier Wagnerian manner, which MacDowell himself rightly withheld from public hearing, and Von Weber's "Oberon" overture. In the latter number, by the way, the curious might have discerned the essence of the final movement of MacDowell's symphonic poem.

MISCHA ELMAN, PHENOMENAL YOUNG VIOLINIST, MADE FIRST APPEARANCE ON CONCERT STAGE WHEN BUT FIVE YEARS OLD

"I played my first concert when I was only 5 years old," said Mischa Elman, the phenomenal young violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played in Baltimore last night.

"I made my debut as a virtuoso in Berlin when I was 14, playing the Tschaikowsky concerto—the one I have just played.

"I cannot say that I haye any favorite composer, but I dearly love Tschaikowsky. He is so typically Russian. This is especially seen in the last movement of the concerto."

The orchestra had just started the opening bars of the "Meistersinger" prelude, and Elman stopped long enough to hum a few bars of it. "That is a great thing," he said. "Some of Wagner's music carries me away; some of it—well, puts me to sleep. But don't say that," he hastened to add; "people might misunderstand.

Memory Is Quick.

"I have a good memory and am a rather quick study. I learned the concerto in a week. Of course, I am only human, though, and my memory might slip."

"Do you ever feel nervous at your concerts?" was asked him.

"A little sometimes before I start to play. Never after I begin, for then I am lost, absorbed and my audience is forgotten.

"This is my first American visit, and I am very much pleased. I find Americans most appreciative and responsive, and not hard to play to. In fact, I like them better in some ways than Europeans.

"My violin is a Strad and was formerly owned and played on by Joacim. I love it dearly. Hasn't it a beautiful tone?

"And now you must excuse me, for I must hurry away. Be sure you don't say I think Wagner a bore," and jumping into his big fur coat and pulling a soft felt hat down over his head, he left the theater.

Is A Well-Built Man.

Elman is short and swarthy but well built and not so handsome at close range as his pictures indicate. He looks just about his age—18. He took his calls in a nonchalant, matter-of-fact way, quite as if it were a matter of course. He is not at all spoiled and displays no evidence of egotism. He does not run to excessive hair as do many of his confreres; it is plentiful, however, and combed straight back from his forehead. Altogether he is a normal looking and acting young fellow, with no freakisms, and entirely lacks all "prodigious" qualities.

[133]

BALTIMORE, MD.

MISCHA ELMAN A WONDER

Youthful Soloist Of The Boston Symphony Scores Triumph.

GAVE TSCHAIKOWSKY CONCERTO

Beethoven's Masterpiece And Wagner Prelude Given Fine Readings By Mr. Fiedler.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last evening at the Lyric Theatre, was made the medium of introducing to the local public the young violinist, Mischa Elman.

The two preceding concerts have served to fully establish the reputation of Mr. Max Fiedler as a great conductor, as a profound musician and as a fine program maker. His conception of the works he has presented indicates a refined and musical temperament and a thorough perception of the intricacies of symphonic writing.

True, he is not the strict drillmaster that Mr. Gericke was, and consequently the wonderful finesse of orchestral playing that has placed the Boston organization on the top rung of the ladder is not always so much in evidence.

The remarkable precision and unanimity of thought that actuated the various members of the orchestra, are no longer so keenly designated, but a warmth of interpretation, an all-pervading temperamental feeling—these form the keynote of Mr. Fiedler's readings. And these are the sentiments that appeal first and foremost to the musician and the music lover.

Handsome Gowns Worn.

Among the beautiful costumes noticed were the following:

Mrs. Jesse Tyson—Black chiffon and lace.
Mrs. Henry C. Matthews—Handsome gown of rose pink satin, embroidered.
Mrs. Jere Williams Lord—Light blue chiffon and satin.
Mrs. J. Hemsley Johnson—Smoke-colored cloth, with Irish lace.
Mrs. Frank P. Clark—White lace and chiffon.
Miss Elizabeth Stokes—White silk and lace.
Miss Jennie Applegarth—Pomegranate-colored satin, with gold embroidery.
Miss Bessie Campbell Clark—Pink embroidered mull.
Mrs. W. Stuart Symington, Jr.—Black chiffon and lace.
Mrs. John B. Whitehead—Black satin with jet.
Mrs. Yates Pennington—Pink liberty satin and lace.
Mrs. Nathan P. Gorter—White silk and gold embroidery.
Miss Grace Turnbull—Crimson crepe.
Miss Eleanor Turnbull—White chiffon, embroidered.
Miss Louise Symington—Pale pink liberty silk, with lace.
Mrs. Randolph Barton, Jr.—Gray satin and gray chiffon.
Miss Katharine Robinson—Violet chiffon cloth and Irish lace.
Miss Rosalie Robinson—Black satin, embroidered.
Miss Gertrude R. Jenkins—Black satin, with touches of scarlet.
Miss Edith Duer—Pale blue silk mull.
Miss Elizabeth Reid—Blue messaline satin and lace.
Mrs. Franz Bornscheine—White lace.
Mrs. Harry Jenkins—Black lace, combined with white applique.
Miss Elizabeth Boone—Toupe-colored cloth.
Mrs. Ernest Hutcheson—Pale blue embroidered chiffon.
Miss Mary Carrington Brown—Light blue mull.
Miss Elizabeth L. Clark—Violet panne velvet.
Miss Bertha Jenkins—Black chiffon over satin.
Miss May Hough—Embroidered black chiffon cloth.
Mrs. Henry W. Rogers—Black lace.
Miss M. Coulsen—Embroidered white batiste.
Mrs. John Tompkins, Jr.—Black satin, with gold.
Mrs. J. C. Van Hulsteyn—White embroidered mull.
Mrs. Charles J. Taylor—Black satin, with spangled net.
Miss Katharine Taylor—Handsome black satin, with point lace.
Mrs. Harold Randolph—Steel-colored satin and chiffon.
Mrs. Henry Wood—Soft white silk, with Venetian lace.
Miss Esther Murdoch—White chiffon cloth.
Mrs. Robert W. Wood—Golden brown chiffon and satin.
Miss Elizabeth Ames—White liberty silk.
Mrs. E. Parkin Keech, Jr.—Violet-colored cloth and lace.
Mrs. Charles B. Penrose—Black lace over satin.
Miss Rosalie Rutherford—Cream mull, embroidered in green.
Mrs. John Staige Davis—Black satin.
Mrs. W. W. Ford—Oak-colored chiffon cloth.
Miss Annie Perrin—Pale blue mull.
Mrs. H. S. Clark—Violet liberty silk and lace.
Mrs. James Anderson, of Kansas City—Light blue embroidered satin.
Mrs. H. L Muller—Black satin, with point lace.
Miss Louise Sheldon, of Norfolk, Va.—Pale yellow chiffon and lace.
Miss M. L. Potter—Biscuit-colored embroidered mull.
Miss Florence Sadler—Black satin, with jet ornaments.
Miss Mary Randall, of Annapolis—Claret-colored cloth, with lace.
Miss Esther Gottlieb—Black and white chiffon.
Mrs. Wesley Tucker—Black velvet and lace.
Miss E. E. Starr—Dark red silk, with Irish lace.
Mrs. Robert Chamberlaine—Black chiffon cloth, with gold embroidery.
Miss Rose Sutro—Blue cloth and lace.
Miss Ottilie Sutro—Black chiffon.
Miss Elsie Gittings—Alice blue chiffon cloth, with lace.
Miss Mary S. Gittings—Pale pink silk mull.
Miss Louisa Riach—Black lace over white.
Mrs. William S. Thayer—Pale blue cloth, embroidered.
Miss Frances Kerr—Blue satin and chiffon.
Mrs. Harry S. Taylor—Black satin, with point lace and chiffon.

SYMPHONY PLEASES.

Large Audience Hears Boston Orchestra in Third Matinee.

A delighted audience left the National Theater yesterday afternoon at the end of the third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At none of the other concerts this season has the enthusiasm been so prolonged and so spontaneous, or the interest so keen as in the programme, and the performance thereof, yesterday.

The leading number on the programme and the one which probably attracted the most attention was the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major for violin. The soloist, Mischa Elman, had hardly performed the first movement before his hearers recognized that they had before them an artist of the first rank, a technician so extraordinary as to excite their undivided attention. The concerto, which is in three movements, I Allegro moderato, D major; II, Andante, G minor; III, Allegro vivacissimo, D major, had a varied and perhaps unfortunate history, in that it was first pronounced by the composer's critics as impossible to play, but in spite of the many difficulties which it presents, with its extraordinary but beautiful harmonies, it has been successfully rendered on many occasions on this side of the Atlantic. The programme yesterday afternoon detailed these performances. The execution of Elman yesterday, therefore, leaves little room for anything but the most profound respect and the highest praise. Nothing more brilliant than the passage-work of the concerto which the violin soloist accomplished has been heard here in concert for some time. In spite of the set rule for the banishment of all encores, it seemed for a time as though the artist would be obliged to respond in that way to the clamor which followed his number, but the audience was forced to be satisfied at last with the repeated acknowledgments which he made.

The Richard Strauss tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," was the subject of much interest also, and as a piece of descriptive music it ranks very high. The work of the orchestra, and especially of the violas in this part, was remarkably clear-cut and distinct. However unimpressive the conducting of Max Fiedler may be—and there are those who hold him to be colorless—the intelligence of the reading yesterday afternoon, not only in the Strauss number, but in the two other orchestral pieces, was undeniable.

The presence on the programme of two such popular classics as the "Oberon" overture and the "Lohengrin' prelude cannot but be remarked as a commendable move on the part of the management. More than one, or at the most two, symphonic movements, or concertos render the afternoon too top-heavy, as it were, for those musical but non-professional people who are apt to find themselves confused by an embarrassment of riches. The "Oberon" oxerture was never played better than it was by the orchestra yesterday, and the "Lohengrin" prelude furnished just the mood for the greater enjoyment of the piece de resistance which followed.

JAN 3 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Max Fiedler Gives a Programme of Modern Music and Beethoven Elman Plays.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their January concert last night at Carnegie. The management had seen fit to break away from its policy of suppressing the soloist and had engaged that very admirable artist, M. Miscna Elman, the violinist, to play the Beethoven Concerto in D. Unfortunately concertos indulge the soloist rather than the orchestra, and there were a great many people in the audience last night who would have preferred to have heard another purely orchestral number rather than the ministrations of a soloist even as brilliant as Mischa Elman. Soloists we have always D; but the perfect tone, the beautiful instruments, the unerring taste of the Boston Symphony Orchestra we hear but twelve times a year. The programme had but three numbers—a theme and variations by Noren; the Beethoven Concerto in D, for orchestra and violin, and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

The first, intensely and deliberately modern music, educed from the orchestra some of its most effective playing.

M. Max Fiedler's reading of the portentous and somewhat harrowing score of Strauss' tone poem had the merit of absolute lucidity and intelligibility.

Mischa Elman's playing of the Beethoven concerto had not quite the force and volume which we have learned to expect after his Manaattan Opera House appearances.

[134]

FULL-GROWN VIOLIN WONDER

Perhaps the Greatest Exhibition of Bowing Seen In the City.

Carried on by the irresistible ripple of music from the violin of Mischa Elman, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra view with the audience that packed the Lyric last night in an effort to applaud the player until an enchore was granted.

Vain effort. Though the demonstration lasted ten minutes and the young artist appeared upon the stage 14 times he came empty-handed, and the enchore is still unheard.

Elman, at the age of 17, shows more maturity of appreciation and execution than many a virtuoso of twice his number of years and experience. To this he adds the fire of youthfulness.

His bowing is most wonderful. On accented slurs covering three or four bare the rapidly following notes dropping off the strings with all the precision and completeness of harp tones. The effect was startling to a high degree. But no more so than his execution of the softer and delicate tones when by a method apparently his own the sound of the note would appear to reach the audience several seconds before the eye could detect any movement of the bow.

It gave the delightful hallucination that the bow was a sort of magnetic wand, and that as it poised within a hair's breadth of the strings the notes leaped up half way to meet it.

Elman's most beautiful tones were taken between the fifth and eighth positions on the "d" and "g" strings, though the very high notes on the "a" possessed a power and clearness that is not often heard. The higher notes on the "e" were at times a trifle squeaky and the lower one on the "g" were sometimes rough. His theme was Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, which furnished ample opportunity for a technical display, as well as melody and harmony.

Mischa Elman was born on January 20, 1892 (the date 1891 is also given), at Stalnoje in the government of Kiev, Russia. His father, a schoolmaster, recognized the boy's great talent, and at the age of 5 Mischa played before a select audience at a concert arranged by the president of the village, a lady of nobility, when the youthful performer astonished his hearers by playing several pieces on a small violin. He had no knowledge of notation, but played by ear familiar and popular pieces which his father had previously played to him. His father finally succeeded in taking his son to Odessa and in gaining his admission to the Imperial Music School of that city. He was there taught the violin by Fidelmann, and his extraordinary ability became known outside of Russia. Early in 1903 Leopold Auer invited him to St. Petersburg to study with him.

He then played in public for the first time early in October, 1904, at a concert of the German Singing Club in St. Petersburg, and ever since has led the life of a virtuoso.

His first performance in Berlin was on October 15, 1904. His first public appearance in England was at one of Charles Williams' concerts in London, March 21, 1905, when he was hailed as a great and mature violinist at the age of 13. He played in the United States for the first time at a concert of the Russian Symphony Society in New York, December 10, 1908 (Tschaikowsky's concerto). His first recital in New York was on December 17, 1908.

Beethoven's C minor symphony and the prelude to "Die Meistersingers" furnished an ample conveyance for the orchestra as a whole. Their work is too well known to need any analyzation, but less refinement, which has now almost reached the point of constraint, would cause a better appreciation by the average audience.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date

WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

INTEREST in the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night centred in Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, played here for the first time, and Mischa Elman's performance of Beethoven's concerto. The youthful violinist again showed his masterly command of his instrument, producing a full, mellow tone and rousing his audience to extravagant applause.

The final composition of the unusually interesting programme was Strauss' impressive tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," played by the great orchestra with power and dignity. Mr. Fiedler conducted.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Third Concert Under Max Fiedler, With Mischa Elman As Soloist.

Last evening's program was in every respect a model one. Each of the three numbers of which it was composed is a masterpiece in the line of musical eloquence which it represents; the time required for the performance was not too long, and the symphony was played at the beginning of the concert, and consequently to fresh and eager listeners. No one with tired faculties can keep his or her responsiveness keen through a long, earnest work. Symphonies should therefore be always played early.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was on Dr. Muck's first program in Baltimore, and we are familiar with Mr. Gericke's reading, and so may glance at the musical individualities of Herr Fiedler and his two great predecessors as mirrored in their distinguishing treatments of this work. Gericke's interpretation was without doubt the most perfect in technic, the most refined, and the most logical that the musical world has heard. The adjustment of detail to consistent unity was marvelous, but this immaculate transparency was secured at the cost of a measure of the vigorous warmth which we sometimes like to hear. The symphony in Dr. Muck's hands lost a little of the transparent clearness which so distinguished Mr. Gericke's reading, but as amends, the Doctor, when it was justifiable, allowed enthusiasm full sway, thus securing a wide range of dynamic expression, and satisfying those who chafe under suppression. Dr. Muck's tempi was also a little more elastic than were Mr. Gericke's.

Mr. Fiedler has unlimited vigor and enthusiasm, and he knows his scores well, but he does not secure the exquisite ensemble from the orchestra to which Gericke and Muck had accustomed us. This was especially noticeable in the attacks at the beginning of phrases, but Mr. Fiedler's greatest weakness was his lack of sensibility in adjusting tempi. Music is a live thing, and its pulsations should fluctuate with changing moods. Without elastic tempi music becomes a purely mechanical device. Mr. Fiedler sometimes exaggerates speed or repose and pauses, but his more common fault is holding rigidly to tempi when episodes should be treated with especial consideration. In spite of this comparative inadequacy, the performance of this great symphony was a delight.

The 6th of January, 1909, should be starred on all future Baltimore musical calendars, for on that date Mischa Elman made his debut in our city. He is a boy (some say 17 and others 19 years of age), but he is a full-grown artist, with head, heart and technical resources which savor of normally matured genius. His beauty of tone, impeccable facility, and musical understanding place him in the very highest class of violin virtuosi; he has indeed unique virtues, which make one forget the mechanical processes, in wondering at the exalting eloquence of his singing. The audience last evening recalled Elman many times, in a more or less perfunctory manner, whereas it should have shouted in the joy of having witnessed anything so noble, and almost ethereal. Such experiences as Elman's presentation of the Tschaikowski are rare in a musical life. Let those who were present at the Lyric last night, and were capable of appreciating his art, be profoundly thankful.

The program was:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67. (Performed for the first time December 22, 1808, in Vienna.)
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: Trio.
IV. Allegro.
Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 35.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Canzonetta; Andante.
III. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

O. B. B.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

1909

Young Elman Hub Orchestra Star.

Extravagant as the ambition seemed, even to his friends, Mischa Elman arose to as great a height as has been attained by any violinist within memory when he played Brahms's concerto in D major yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall. In technique and in expression the little Russian proved himself a wizard with the violin and reached the highest level this city has known him to attain. To play Brahms's concerto seemed an audacious attempt for one so young, but Elman's performance was nothing less than great. It held a big audience entranced, and it brought forth loud bravos. Max Fiedler conducted the concert, which began with three dances from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procis." The orchestra was in fine form. Especially effective was the minuet. "The Nymphs of Diana." Beethoven's Fifth Symphony followed. Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was the acceptable close to the afternoon.

...per Cutting Bureau in the World.

...TIMES.
...INGTON, D. C.
JAN 6- 1909

RARE TREAT IN MUSIC IS YOUTHFUL VIOLINIST

Mischa Elman Takes the Symphony Orchestra Audience By Storm.

ANOTHER KUBELIK, GENERAL DECISION

Fiedler's Program for Afternoon Not Best That Could Have Been Chosen.

Mischa Elman, a young violinist, whose fame abroad had been classed and qualified with that of many another musical wonder, by a nod of his head and a sweep of his bow has captivated the musical public of Washington.

Although he was brought here as the assisting soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, young Elman had the center of the stage yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater in theory as well as in fact. He tripped on after the Strauss "Tone Poem," and the audience saw a boy carelessly carrying a violin under his arm. He looked to be hardly more than sixteen years of age, and his frank face, as he looked out squarely into the audience, completely won those in front even before he had played a note. If the truth were known, the audience was almost willing to permit a few shortcomings for the sake of the boyish frankness with which Elman challenged the men and women he faced. One thought instinctively of the time when Josef Hoffman first appeared several years ago, and as the opening bars of the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major were played by the orchestra, Elman stood there, anxious for the signal that would bring his bow to his strings.

MISCHA ELMAN.

A Real Artist.

When it came, the audience heard the deep, melodic tones of the solo violin score played, not unusually, but with sureness and promise. As the minutes went by and the succeeding score of the first movement was read, music lovers in the theater began to realize that, instead of a musical prodigy, a real artist had come across the water, and in this boy who stood there swaying to every movement of his bow, the world had found another Kubelik, another Ysaye.

Elman's only distinctive mannerism is his restlessness. Throughout his performance, whether playing or not, his body swayed from side to side, and when reading, he frequently turned toward the orchestra so that his back was to the audience. But at the conclusion of each brilliant passage in the concert he would draw his bow decisively across the strings, and as he dropped it to his side, his head would be thrown back and he would face the house as if to say "There!"

The absolute boyishness of his manner was delightful, and at the conclusion of his brilliant reading of the first movement, the little musician was given an ovation. So spontaneous and sincere was the applause and so prolonged, that it was several minutes before Max Fiedler made any attempt to guide the orchestra into the succeeding movement.

Recalled Many Times.

Elman played only two, instead of the three movements programed, but at the end of his performance he was brought out again and again, while the big audience testified in the most unmistakable manner to the genius of this exceptional boy.

Mr. Fiedler's program [illegible] not the happiest he could have [illegible]. The "Tone Poem" of Strauss, which was the principal orchestral number, did not prove pleasing. The Prelude to "Lohengrin," however, was beautifully read, and the lighter and distinctively tuneful score of the overture to Weber's "Oberon," which was the concluding number, was well received.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.

ELMAN PLAYS WITH FAMED BOSTONIANS

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

The vast audience which last night attended the first of the third pair of concerts given here, at Carnegie Hall, this season by the famous and admired Boston Symphony Orchestra were treated to a programme which, so far at least as length and variety went, was more than generous.

As to the composition of the programme, with submission to Mr. Fiedler, there may be room for even the most loyal supporters of the Bostonians to differ.

The "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss have been heard here frequently of late years, and though they may seldom have been rendered as finely and intelligently as last night, the need for performing that work again just now was not apparent.

Neither did there seem to be any particularly cogent reason for devoting the time and artistry of so notable an organization as the Boston Orchestra to the interpretation of the novelty with which the concert opened, "The Kaleidoscope, Theme and Variation," of Heinrich Gottlieb Noren. The work, though cleverly and ingeniously scored, is hardly of sufficient importance to warrant its being dignified, as it was, with a place next to Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major.

Mischa Elman was last night the violinist who played the Beethoven Concerto. Though not quite in such splendid form as when last heard here, he delighted his hearers by the breadth, sincerity and intellectuality of his interpretation. His technic was no less wonderful than on previous occasions, and the ease with which he surmounted the difficulties of his cadenzas was in another way remarkable.

While it may not rank with the most beautiful of Beethoven's achievements, the Concerto is of compelling interest. It was listened to with attention and gratitude.

From EVENING SUN,
New York City.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

HEINRICH NOREN'S MERRY JOKE ON RICHARD STRAUSS.

And Mischa Elman's on Beethoven, to Say Nothing of the Boston Orchestra's Quiet Little Way with Our Encore Fiends—Sembrich Leads an Opera Out of Riot's Way—Wuellner and the Poet Tennyson—Quaker Opera.

Col. Henry L. Higginson, whom our Brooklyn neighbors to-night acclaim with President Eliot and Dr. George A. Gordon, of the New Old South, respectively and collectively, as "the three most useful citizens of Boston," was seeing New York last evening from a Seventh avenue car. Swept by icy breezes, he stood on the crowded rear platform with the air of one born to the sub-Arctic sailing weather of Massachusetts Bay. And to a friend who, with this modest Mæcenas of music down East, had just heard his visiting virtuoso orchestra here in our Carnegie Hall, and who inquired, "Are you fond of Richard Strauss"? the gallant Colonel answered never a word. He declined to be interviewed. He looked back with a twinkle of the eye as he fled away from lower Broadway's glare to as secluded a hostelry as any patronized by his concert-master or first oboe.

Conductor Max Fiedler, a gruff and gray man of the Thomas type whom New York again welcomed, has at last come to know the superb instrument he was this season called to command. He risked a good deal by not knowing his Boston men at the start. He gave last night his most masterly programme and he and a house sold out heard it masterfully played. Among the things that the touring Manager Comee's books of returns did not show was the fact that his audiences remain the most musical assemblies of our town. Note this illustration of it. Though a star soloist had filled all the last rows last evening with a record attendance, the attempt to break encore rules over his young head was met, after reasonable patience, with two rounds of hissing that were better than music to hear. It shut up the encore fiends.

Noren's "Kaleidoscope," the novelty that shut out some hundreds of angry late-comers during a half-hour and more, need not be taken too seriously. Its "Slav Dance," "Mournful Dance," "Mazurka," were as rhythmic as its "Preamble," "Canon," "Scherzo," were spirited, or its fifth episode "In a Cathedral," seventh "Funeral March" and ninth "From Far-off Days," were melodious.

Ten pauses preceded the strong meat of the Norenspiel, which wasn't the original theme, but a carefully selected cacophony from Strauss. A German judge with a sense of humor had said that as these notes weren't a "melody," they couldn't be copyrighted as such.

Noren out-Straussed poor Richard by writing a rip-roaring double fugue on his "critics," or rather their jarring theme, out of "Heldenleben." The Bostonians made a whirlwind finish of it. The house talked it over while the band took a recess and the crowd in the lobbies was seated.

Little Mischa Elman came bounding out with his buoyant gait and extravagant, courtly bows, and played with exquisitely lovely tone the violin concerto of an old master. The heart of a child is his, and not Beethoven's. He put in the two or three cadenzas, said to be Leopold Auer's, at the points where Beethoven himself left blank spaces for them.

If the joke wasn't on Beethoven, then it was certainly on a form of art that's as old as the musical prodigies of centuries ago. What master writes solo concertos now? Or cadenzas?

Mr. Fiedler had his well-chosen climax in a "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss's own, which has never been played here with more exalted beauty.

There are programmes as cleverly old-new and grave-gay in Brooklyn to-night and in Carnegie Hall to-morrow.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
Address
Date
Boston Symphonie-Konzert.

In Carnegie Hall fand gestern Nachmittag ein Konzert der Bostoner statt, dessen Gipfelpunkte die von Hrn. Max Fiedler in großem Zug dirigirte 5. Symphonie Beethoven's und das von Herrn Mischa Elman mit genialem Schmiß gespielte Brahms'sche Violin-Konzert waren. Wir werden im morgigen Blatt einen ausführlicheren Bericht über diese Veranstaltung bringen.

...BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 7- 1909

YOUNG VIOLINIST SCORES TRIUMPH

Mischa Elman Work Feature of Boston Symphony Concert.

Mischa Elman, the youthful Russian violinist, who has been creating such a profound impression in London for the past three years, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Lyric. Mr. Elman, who is now only about 16 years of age, has been playing in public for the past five years, having made his debut in St. Petersburg in 1904. His work last night proves him to be a master who when time has broadened him into maturity will probably be one of the world's great artists.

The program was as follows:

Beethoven.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
Performed for the first time December 22, 1808, in Vienna.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro; Trio.
IV. Allegro.

Tschaikowsky.
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 35.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Canzonetta: Andante.
III. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

Wagner.
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The Beethoven Symphony has been played so often—Theodore Thomas alone is said to have directed it over 2,000 times—that it would hardly be possible for a director to get anything new out of it. Mr. Fiedler, however, is blessed with a quality, unfortunately not universal with orchestral leaders, of appreciating relative balance of tone, hence he gives us piano passages of exquisite delicacy and fortissimos which please without deafing. The Symphony last night was beautifully played, especially the third movement.

The Tschaikowsky Concerto is one of the masterpieces of this composer. It abounds in wierd Slav rhythms and melodies and is so rich in color that one critic has described it as saying things that are not proper. Mr. Elman fully realized its possibilities, a fact the appreciation of which the audience showed by recalling him 8 or 10 times by tumultuous applause.

The Meistersinger Overture was so well played that it made one hope all the more that Mr. Dippel will give us the whole opera this year.

...
ss ...
...

Fashion Attends Concert.

Society, as usual, was well represented at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. Mrs. Roosevelt occupied one of the boxes, and among others had with her Representative and Mrs. Longworth. The British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce also were hosts at a box party, as were Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons and Mrs. Charles A. Williams.

In the audience were Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Straus, wife of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, with Mrs. Hochstadter and Mrs. Percy Straus; Mme. de Blanpre, the Hon. Mrs. James, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Nicoll Ludlow, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Townsend, Mrs. George Howard, the Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Lee Phillips, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Mabel Boardman, Miss Robeson, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Miss Grace Jarvis, Lady Harrington, Miss Kean, Mrs. Harlan and the Misses Harlan, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Walcott, Miss Erlougher, Mrs. Carter, Miss Annie Irwin, Miss Elizabeth Wolcott Parker, Miss Alice Gordon Parker, and Miss Eleanor Wayne Parker, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Huntington Wilson, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. Livingston Hunt, Mrs. Tiffany Dyer, Mrs. Wetmore and the Misses Wetmore, Admiral and Mrs. Cowles, Admiral O'Neil, Mrs. Henry Oxnard, Miss Swope, Miss Lovering, Mrs. Emmons, Mrs. Roscoe C. Bulmer, Mrs. Nathaniel Wilson, Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page, Mrs. Thomas Lindsay, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Audenreid, Mrs. Merriam, Mrs. Talbot and Miss Talbot, Miss Sherrill, Mrs. Gherardi, Miss Oliver, Miss Carlisle, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. John O. Evans, the minister from Sweden and Mme. de Lagercrantz, and the Misses de Lagercrantz, the minister from Norway and Mme. Gude, the minister from Denmark and Countess Moltke, Mrs. Huidekoper, and Mr. Reginald Huidekoper.

Mrs ...liam F. Draper ar... Mrs. ...

[135]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC.

ELMAN AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

None but the truly memorable musical occasions of the last decade in this city could provide a parallel for the artistic delight conferred last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall upon the splendid gathering of auditors that filled the great room. There are concerts designed to please mainly the casual listener, and other concerts avowedly intended to interest the connoisseur, but it is none too often that, as was the case last evening, a programme can be so arranged and so translated into musical sound as to captivate both classes of hearers. The list of pieces prepared by Mr. Max Fiedler for this concert was short, but skilfully chosen, and each work was thrice admirably played. Heinrich Noren's "Kaleidoscope" theme and variations, Op. 30, was the evening's novelty, and after it came the Beethoven violin concerto, performed by Mischa Elman, and Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." These sufficed to fill the space of two hours with thrilling musical beauty, and their respective performances were worthy in every way of the very best traditions of the Boston orchestra. In the superlative doings of the evening young Mr. Elman played a distinguished, indeed, an extraordinary part, setting a new standard by which he must hereafter be judged.

Heinrich Noren's name is new to local concert rooms, but it can scarcely fail to become better known here, for the theme and variations heard last night prove him not merely a master of orchestral writing but a musician of fertile ideas and of genuine feeling. The title, "Kaleidoscope," suggests the ever new combinations that scintillate through these variations, but it fails to convey a sense of the moving and compelling beauty that gives this work character and power. The original theme is simple enough, but the eleven variations extract from it a world of rich color and of eloquent meaning, without once straining the bounds of plausibility, so to say, or exceeding the limits of orchestral good taste. Whether Noren carries the listener through the measures of a "mournful dance," or into the regions of idyllic and mischievous humor, or sets him in the dim nave of a vaulted cathedral (and he does all these things and many more), this music is legitimate and sincere. Even the final variation, entitled "To a Celebrated Contemporary," with its highly ingenious play upon Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben" themes, strikes one as having musical as well as technical interest. Incidentally, it is not easy to see why Strauss's publishers invoked the law, in Germany, to prevent publication of Noren's score on this ground, since the quotation is in some respects superior to the original.

Mischa Elman's performance of the Beethoven concerto re-enforced the impression gained by his previous playing of less serious music and proclaimed him, beyond all doubt, a mature artist of high rank and still higher possibilities. Elman's present stage of development corresponds to the first period, so-called, of many a great composer or painter of the past. What he does now is as perfect, in its way, as could be wished. His playing has the fineness and precision of contour, the firmness, even the strictness, of line that is one of the precious qualities of youth. When Elman is ten years older there may be a larger sweep, a freer touch, in his playing, but it could not well be purer in intonation, juster and truer in its phrasing or more appreciative of every nuance and shade of the composer's meaning. It was good to hear him perform the Beethoven concerto, and there will be high anticipations of his promised playing of the Brahms concerto at to-morrow afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" has seldom, if ever, achieved a finer effectiveness than under Mr. Fiedler's ministrations last evening. There is noble music in it, and it was nobly set forth.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 9 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mischa Elman, the Young Violinist, Aroused Great Enthusiasm at the Academy.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night offered an ideal programme from any point of view. For the music lovers there was Beethoven's noble Fifth Symphony; for the devotees of soloists there was Mischa Elman, most wonderful of young violinists, in the difficult Tschaikowsky concerto; and there was a dash of romance from the overture to "Der Freischutz," with which the audience was dismissed after two hours of ideal enjoyment.

From the point of view of novelty, precedence goes to Elman; neither he nor the Tschaikowsky concerto had been heard here before last evening. This boy of 17 years, who is playing in long trousers for the first time this season, is beyond question one of the world's great violinists. The interest lies not in his youth, though that undoubtedly lends zest and fire to his playing, but in his genius. The quality which commands respect for his work is not his virtuosity—although, of course, that is great or he never could play the notes even of this titanic concerto—but in his breadth and musical quality, as shown especially last night in the andante and as has been proved in other concerts by the playing of simple and world-famous melodies. And with his genius, which has been acknowledged the world over, and his technical skill, which amazes the violinists of the orchestras which play with him, young Elman has a simple, frank and unspoiled manner which adds greatly to the charm of his playing.

As for the Tschaikowsky concerto, the first hearing of it leaves upon the mind chiefly amazement at the difficulties which the composer piles up for his soloist. The andante is indeed melodious and moving, and there are suggestions of Russian airs in the first and last movements which might become musically interesting with frequent hearings. Frequent hearings of it are something from which audiences may well pray to be spared, however. Maud Powell, Adolph Brodsky and a few other violinists have played it in this country, but it is not meat for the ordinary wielder of the bow. Its general character suggests that Tschaikowsky piano concerto which Carreno played one Saturday afternoon at the Baptist Temple with Damrosch's symphony orchestra. Under Carreno's muscular fingers those piled up masses of sound were indeed magnificent, but it was a performance which warned lesser pianists to give the composition a wide berth. So with this violin concerto. So long as Elman plays it, it is bound to be interesting as well as wonderful. Technical difficulties seem to exist merely for the greater glory of this youth, while there is an underlying musical quality to his playing that lifts him far above the class of virtuosi who astonish at first acquaintance but familiarity with whom breeds, if not contempt, at least indifference.

There is nothing new to be said of the Beethoven symphony. It belongs with the old friends and the old wine, whose welcome is always warm. It is the warmer for such a perfect performance as the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave of it last night. If any hearers had doubts whether Fiedler might not be too dramatic for Beethoven, or whether his fiery zeal might not blur the delicate edge of perfection which Gericke put upon this orchestra with his years of patient rehearsal, their fears must have been allayed last night. Power there was in the climaxes—Fiedler dearly loves to hold up a sonorous forte until the last thirty-second of the last measure has rolled itself gloriously on the ear—but there was the utmost delicacy in the pianissimo passages of the scherzo, also. Such delicacy could only be achieved by the perfect strings of this wonderful band, and Fiedler made the most of his instrument. The climaxes of the last movement were taken with a continent balance of tone in consonance with the delicacy of the softer passages. The brasses did not blare, and the composer strove for no effects of novelty or virtuosity. He was content to speak the speech of Beethoven as that master has pronounced it to conductors to the end of time. It went trippingly upon the strings, without mouthings or rantings to detract from its noble beauty. The music seems wonderfully simple and restful in these days of Strauss and Debussy. Its andante stands as a beacon light to proclaim the fact that to be great a composer need be neither complex nor obscure.

The "Freischutz" overture served not only to bring to a happy ending a programme of great beauty, but to arouse regrets that in these days of search for operatic novelties no manager sees fit to revive the romantic work of Weber. There is a whole generation of opera-goers to whom it would prove a novelty, and probably far more welcome than the Wallies and the Willies of youthful Italian ambition.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 9 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH MISCHA ELMAN.

A feast of music and a flow of harmony it was yesterday to those who, starting in with Safonoff and Tschaikowsky's "Fifth," to say nothing of Schubert's "Unfinished," at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, wound up with the Boston Symphony at our own Academy of Music in the evening. Here again was a fascinating programme, a vital and vitalizing conductor, the wonderful violin of Mischa Elman in place of the seductive 'cello, and an audience brimful of appreciation and enthusiasm filling every chair. The occasion began with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, played as the Boston only can play it, carrying the immortal score on the wings of its marvelous strings, with a rich background of wood-wind and contra-basses, till it seemed as if but little more would float the soul to Paradise. In mere technique the first movement surpassed perhaps any performance ever heard here; it was flawless in its art and its energy—somewhat more impressive, possibly, than the popular Andante. Yet on this occasion both paled before the magnificent Scherzo, which, in its strange savagery, so skillfully brought forth by the conductor and his men, made a profound impression, despite its familiarity.

The heavenly beauty of Beethoven was followed, after the intermission, by the brilliant Tschaikowsky concerto, said to be the most difficult composition for the violin in existence, and undoubtedly entirely new to almost everybody present. Repudiated by the violinist to whom it was dedicated, Leopold Auer, for many years, as impossible to play, it was finally undertaken by the distinguished virtuoso Adolph Brodsky, and last evening was used as the vehicle for young Elman's amazing talents. Certainly Elman was not conquered by the exactions of the Concerto, and a churl he must be who would not admit his undoubted triumph. The audience gave way to the wildest enthusiasm over his masterly treatment of the bizarre harmonies and technical problems, which seemed to resolve themselves with promptness and ease. It was one of the few cases when the emotional excitement over a soloist, in the presence of a great orchestra, itself far more wonderful than any single player, could be understood and sympathized with, so youthful was the player and so stupendous his task.

The young man, short, but with the exotic Slav look in his face, under a smooth, healthy skin, at first seemed restless, if not distinctly nervous, swaying from foot to foot. But once at the heart of his music he forgot everything, the vast throng of listeners before him, the hundred skilled musicians, each evidently deeply interested, in whose midst he stood. He threw himself at white heat into his task, with the certainty of a master, but the zeal of nineteen. Not once did he falter or slip, and when at the end they called for him again and again, his stocky little body went back and forth as if constructed on steel springs, instead of the sensitive mechanism of a musical wonder.

Mischa Elman was the climax of an evening which closed with a spirited performance of the overture to "Der Freischutz."

RATHER PRACTICAL QUESTION.

To the Editor of The Standard Union:

In accordance with the announcement on the front page of the front cover of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme, we yesterday asked at the news counter in the Long Island Railroad depot, Flatbush avenue and Ashland place, for programme books of the evening's concert, only to receive from the thing in charge, which looked like a man, a rude and insulting answer. What can we do except to tell you and through you the public, that other women may be spared a similar indignity?

TWO WOMEN.

WORLD,

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS 'KALEIDOSCOPE.'

Works of Noren, a New Composer, and Beethoven and Strauss, Make Notable Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

Heeding the advertised warning that thirty-five in a draughty corridor awaited the careless latecomer, I was promptly in my seat for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night to listen to the new "Kaleidoscope" variations by Noren that the management had been at such pains to allow the audience to hear undisturbed.

From what I could discover Noren, a composer unknown in this country save through this work, which has been performed in Boston and Chicago, a Moravian by birth, was a little teacher in minor music schools in Crefeldt and Berlin, born in 1863, and now residing in Gratz.

But this work, with which he burst upon astonished musical Germany at a concert of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musik Verein, in Dresden, in July, 1907, is neither little in size or interest, nor of minor artistic importance. I generally despite "themes with variations," where an unoffending theme is taken and contorted and distorted out of all recognizable shape. Mr. Noren spared us that, for after the first two or three of his eleven variations he cleverly made his original theme do the vanishing act, which was a pity, as it possessed decided quality.

Mr. Noren, who struck me as a bearable ultra-modern mixture of Schumann and Brahms, is interesting when gay and rather dull and cumbersome when serious. Gems of the variations, the scherzo, Slav dance and mazurka—all with the original theme twenty miles away—fairly sparkled with brilliant cleverness, orchestral ingenuity and strikingly varied color, while "In the Cathedral" and "From Far-Off Days," in sober and sentimental vein, grew frankly tedious.

In the now celebrated variation No. 11, "to an esteemed contemporary," in which Noren used two themes from Strauss' "Hildenleben" and was sued by the composer, is so complex and chaotic with its double fugueing and "antagonistic" melodies in opposition, that I am inclined to agree with the learned judge who tried the case and who held that Noren could use Strauss' themes as he pleased, as they were in no sense "melodies" within the meaning of the law, as I do not think Noren's own musical utterances either very melodious or highly interesting. The number was played with that orchestral virtuosity which distinguishes the Boston players who, however, under Mr. Fiedler play with less finesse and more heavily than formerly.

I have been waiting to hear Mischa Elman, the soloist of the concert, in something classic and sober and serious, like the Beethoven concerto, where the glamour of his wonderful tone and dash and enthusiasm would count for less and real artistic interpretation for more. To play this concerto well is a test of matured musicianship for any violinist, and I was certainly disappointed, if not wholly surprised, to hear Elman play Beethoven much as he would Vieuxtemps or Paganini. There was an almost entire absence of dignity and classic elegance and repose in his playing of the first movement, and his irreverence in introducing into a master work of this kind a paltry, showy cadenza which was not Beethoven cannot be too strongly reprehended.

The larghetto was almost mawkish in its over-sentimentality, and the finales, played with a graceful appreciation, alone came near expressing the true Beethoven tradition and spirit.

Elman is already a great artist, nay, a very great artist. But to attain the greatness of which he is capable, he should remember that the artist must at times forget the virtuoso and never let mere virtuosity overshadow and obscure true artistic feeling. Hurrah Sunday concerts are a poor preparation for legitimate and balanced artistic work.

A noble performance of Strauss' mighty tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," brought an interesting concert to an impressive close.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Kaleidoscope by Boston Players.

It is doubtful that Noren's variations, "Kaleidoscope," which had its first performance in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, would have been heard by so huge an audience had it not been for the appearance of Mischa Elman as soloist. But the big crowd attracted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert of the season gave a far better reception to the new work than these estimable gatherings of the social and musical elect usually see fit to bestow on novelties.

This composition is not nearly as great an achievement as many other works that have suffered a less agreeable fate from the Boston Orchestra's New York subscribers. Still the spirit of interest shown toward the variations was decidedly encouraging.

The full title of Heinrich Gottlieb Noren's opus 30 is "Kaleidoscope: original theme and variations for orchestra." It contains eleven variations; but of these only nine were performed last night, the third and sixth being omitted. There is a decided growth in interest as the work proceeds. The first variations, though they contain pleasing moments, are rather superficial. Somewhat startling is the short introduction to the work, which opens with the growlings of a snare drum. The theme, proclaimed in E minor by horn and bassoon, offers a good subject for treatment. Its old church-mode flavor gives it a charming tinge of melancholy.

The first variation, "Praeambulum," sounds too much as if it had been made at the piano and then orchestrated. In the next variation, "Elegischer Reigen," there is an effective passage, decidedly Tschaikowskian in character, in which a theme for violins and horns is reflected against the leading melody sounded by 'cellos, violas and bassoons. Variation No. 3 is daintily pretty; No. 5 has noble sonority; No. 7 is a vigorous funeral march; No. 8 represents a Slavic dance, and No. 10 is a wild mazurka. The most interesting variations are the ninth and eleventh. In the ninth there is exceedingly skillful part-writing, but the division of the strings into as many as sixteen parts presents a difficult problem in pure intonation.

Variation No. 11 is dedicated "To a Celebrated Contemporary," meaning Strauss, from whose "Heldenleben" Noren made almost literal quotations. It was this part of "Kaleidoscope" that made Strauss's publishers ask for an injunction, but the court ruled in favor of Noren. With all respect to the German jurists, it must be said the strongest and most impressive material in this variation is due directly to Strauss's genius. Noren not only quotes slightly varied forms of the "Hero" and "Critics" themes of Strauss's tone-poem, but makes similar use of the material thus borrowed.

It is an interesting musical experiment, however, and Noren has accomplished the task with surprising eloquence, particularly in the double fugue, the first theme of which is that of the "Heldenleben" "Critics" and the second Noren's original theme. The work ends with the triumph of Noren's musical idea and the subjugation of the critics.

Altogether this composition must be set down as an interesting and often effective composition, but one successful rather through clever workmanship than because of originality of invention.

Mischa Elman's playing of Beethoven's violin concerto was greeted with much enthusiasm. The sturdy young violinist had to acknowledge the applause more than half a dozen times. There was lack of repose in the first movement; but maybe that was due rather to the conductor, who adopted too fast a time at the outset, than to the soloist. Elman's intonation was not always impeccable, but his tone sounded noble, eloquent and vital. He played cadenzas by Leopold Auer, his St. Petersburg teacher. These, however, were distinguished by difficulty rather than by appropriate beauty.

The concert ended with a performance of Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung," which had admirable points, but was not perfectly balanced dynamically. The orchestra, under Fiedler's baton, accomplished the best results in the Noren number.

[136]

EVENING POST,

New York City.

JAN 9

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Musical Kaleidoscope.

An audience can indicate by its applause that it does not like a composition, but is pleased with the performance. This was the case at Carnegie Hall last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Noren's "Kaleidoscope." After the last bars there was no outburst of enthusiasm such as follows a piece that has made a deep impression, but the applause grew as the conductor turned to bow, and it kept on growing till the players had all got on their feet and made their bow, too.

In thus making a difference between the piece and its performance, the audience showed its intelligence. Mr. Fiedler and his men certainly played the new German piece in a manner worthy of the best traditions of this orchestra; but the novelty itself was not worth importing. It got a certain notoriety through a lawsuit brought against its publisher, because Noren had borrowed some themes from Strauss; but even this notoriety did not save the piece from being condemned by mild applause in Berlin, as it was here last night. Noren is another one of the Germans of whom Tchaikovsky wrote that they "strive to atone for their extraordinary poverty of invention by exaggerated coloring." The composer himself called attention to the importance he attached to the coloring by choosing the name "Kaleidoscope" for this set of variations. He is not so offensively dissonant and noisy as some of his colleagues, but his inability to create a new, individual melody is quite as manifest. Music like this is interesting to write and to play, but to listen to it is wearisome, except to professionals who admire constructive skill and feats of fugal juggling, even when not associated with melody and emotion, which are the essence of music.

The doors were closed last night so that late comers had to wait nearly forty minutes before they were admitted. While those who were left out were doubtless anxious to get in, there were probably not a few of those within who would have been glad to be out. But the end came at last, and the second number was music with melody and emotion—Beethoven's violin concerto. It was not played as well as the Noren piece, the orchestra being frequently at odds with the soloist. Mischa Elman did not make so good an impression as at some of his earlier appearances. He lacked the breadth required in the first movement, and he sentimentalized the second. His tone was beautiful and his technic marvellous, but more is required for a satisfactory interpretation of Beethoven Hans von Bülow said there were three stages in the development of an artist. he must first play correctly, then beautifully, then interestingly. Elman plays correctly and beautifully, but he will need years of growth before he can play this concerto as interestingly as Kreisler plays it. Some day he will perhaps realize this, and then maybe he will not any longer pose before an audience as if he thought he was the greatest musician that ever lived.

The last number on the programme, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," is one that the Boston Orchestra never fails to play well. Concerning this piece and its composer, it is interesting to read what Grieg wrote from Christiania on January 1, 1906, to his friend Dr. Roentgen (whose Reminiscences, with 199 Grieg letters, are to be published soon in Leipsic); "Heaven knows, his fame is hardly commensurate with his renown. I must confess, however, that when I heard his 'Death and Transfiguration,' two weeks ago, I was moved to tears. I find it a delightful work. But afterwards it ceased to arouse my sympathy, when I discovered the object with which it was written, which is not an ideal one."

SUN,

New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

NOREN'S "KALEIDOSCOPE" IS HEARD HERE.

First Performance of a Novelty Long Delayed—Splendid Piece of Composition—Mischa Elman Essays the Beethoven Concerto With Little Success.

The programme of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night contained but three numbers, but it was nevertheless too long. The three numbers were "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations by Heinrich Gottlieb Noren; the Beethoven violin concerto, with Mischa Elman as the solo performer, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." The first of these three was a novelty and was heard for the first time in this city.

Its first performance anywhere was at a concert of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein in the Dresden Opera House on July 1, 1907, Ernest Schuch conducting, and THE SUN's reviewer, who was present at the performance, can testify to the enthusiasm with which an audience of musical experts from all parts of Germany received the composition. That an audience of New York concertgoers should have been less certain that they had heard something of uncommon merit is not astonishing, but there was a goodly anount of approval last night.

There are eleven variations of the theme, which is in itself simple and well conceived for its purpose. The variations are entitled, "Preamble," "Mournful Dance," "Canon," "Scherzo," "In the Cathedral," "Pastoral," "Funeral March," "Frisch," "From Far Off Days" mazurka, and "To a Celebrated Contemporary."

This last variation, out of which the finale of the work is developed, was the cause of the long delay in the publication of the composition and its introduction in this country. The celebrated contemporary is Richard Strauss, and Mr. Noren quoted two themes from "Ein Heldenleben," the hero theme and the theme of the critics, using both in counterpoint to his own theme.

The German copyright law forbids the borrowing of melodies in this manner, and a legal action was begun to prevent the publication of Noren's music. But the learned Judge, as full of the resources of the law as old Bellario himself, decided that the borrowed themes were not melodies and that hence there had been no transgression of the law. It is a pity that the point was ever raised, for Mr. Noren's treatment of the themes was surely an honor to Strauss. He has used them with extraordinary ingenuity, developing even the cackling of the critics into real music, and learned fugal music at that.

But this is not the only excellent achievement in this composition. It is one of the finest sets of variations written since those of Brahms. It has invention, learning, resource in orchestration and withal musical imagination from beginning to end. The variations are in some instances whole movements developed out of the fundamental thematic material and possessing picturesque and delineative powers within themselves.

This is especially the case with the variation called "From Far Off Days," which was not heard at the Dresden performance. The effect of the solo trumpet playing the theme softly under a wonderfully rich harmony of divided strings is most beautiful. So, too, the "Mournful Dance" and the "Cathedral" variation are deeply charged with fancy and alive with character, while the scherzo, humorous as its name implies, is a splendid specimen of absolute music exquisitely scored.

But to enter into detailed description of this composition is impossible within the limits of a newspaper account. Musicians will gather some notion of its masterly workmanship from the statement that the double fugue of the finale is built of the critics theme as a first motive and Noren's own theme as the second, and that the development of the fugue leads to a gradual rise of the Noren theme to supremacy and its final proclamation in a superbly written choral. Perhaps it was this conquest which aroused the ire of the celebrated contemporary.

Mr. Elman is a great violinist, but he is also a very young one. His artistic experience has not yet led him into the realms of the purest classicism. At any rate that was the inference to be gathered from his remarkably sentimental and inadequate reading of the Beethoven concerto. At the best one could say of it only that the young man read Beethoven as a Euripides and not as an Æschylus. Those who remember how Aristophanes ridiculed Euripides for making his heroes pitiable and clothing them in rags in order to excite factitious sympathy will better understand the application of this comment.

There were beauty of tone, clarity of enunciation and brilliant finish of technic in Mr. Elman's performance, but there was neither depth of insight nor reality of emotion. His inability to conceive the true meaning of Beethoven was lamentably illustrated by his choice of cadenzas.

Those which he played, particularly the long one of the first movement, were as far removed from the spirit of the work into which they were rudely thrust as Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" from the spirit of the elder Greek tragedy. The orchestra played most admirably in the Noren composition, and Conductor Max Fiedler deserves hearty praise for his conscientious study of the work and his intelligent presentation of it.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Gives an Inspired Reading of the Beethoven D Major Concerto—Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Arouses Interest—Dr. Wullner's Recital.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

At the third Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Carnegie hall last night Mischa Elman was the soloist and the audience was unusually large. The well made programme included a work by Noren, heard for the first time here; "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, and between them Elman played the Beethoven D major concerto for violin. Noren is a German of Moravian descent who lives in Dresden, and this work bears the opus number 50.

Its general characteristics are not unlike those of the balance of the young German school, and there is much that is interesting in his style and in the treatment of his orchestra. There is a good firm hand and the evidence of an easy flow of ideas. The name "Kaleidoscope" precludes criticism on the basis of the fragmentary nature of the composition, which consists of a theme and eleven variations, of which Max Fiedler presented nine. They are not equally interesting, but all are strongly representative of the idea which the composer intended them to depict.

Of these the second, "Mournful Dance," the ninth, "From Far-off Days," and the eleventh, "To a Celebrated Contemporary," are the most replete with musical interest. The last was the cause of a lawsuit brought by the publishers of Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben" because the composer used one of the Strauss themes upon which to build the variation. After delaying the publication of Noren's work for a year, the suit was lost, upon the claim that there was no appropriation of melody because there was no melody.

It is probable the audience agreed that there was no melody. It is, however, a clever piece of work and deserved the time and attention received at the hands of the great orchestra which appeared to a better advantage in the wonderfully beautiful and impressive work of Richard Strauss.

Elman, who has shown so many sides of his marvelous equipment and intellect, again aroused the audience to a high degree of enthusiasm by his reading of the Beethoven concerto, which gave him every opportunity to show his musicianship as well as his superb control of the instrument. His interpretation was commanding, well poised, and he showed both breadth and spirituality, the latter to a marked degree.

The second movement was played with a wonderful legato and the melodic line stood out not aggressively, yet clearly defined and with well measured dynamic effects. His intonation was without flaw, especially in the harmonics, which he handles with uncanny dexterity.

The third movement was played with the joyousness of youth but without its immaturity, and his double stopping, especially the intonation at these movements, has never been surpassed. He used cadenzas by Leopold Auer, his teacher. These were not worthy of the work, and are not to be compared to the cadenzas of Helmesberger.

Elman was recalled six or eight times. He will play the Tschaikowsky concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight in Brooklyn, and to-morrow in Carnegie hall at the afternoon concert he will play the Brahms concerto in D major.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

JAN 10 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SUPERB CONCERT

Mischa Elman, as Violin Soloist, Gives Ultra-Brilliant Performance.

Another brigade of the music-mad army of New York crowded into Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The occasion was the third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony, and the programme was as follows:

Three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris," by Gretry (given in New York for the first time); Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor; Brahms's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra; and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," by Wagner.

As a usual thing, the feature number in the programmes of this orchestra is the symphony, but yesterday afternoon the Brahms concert, Mischa Elman playing the solo violin, was the chief attraction.

It was the masterful handling of this very composition in London that capped the growing popularity abroad of this Russian youth, and in it at yesterday afternoon's concert he exhibited such an amazing brilliancy, such power, and gave so excellent an example of his mental grasp of the composer's intent that one wonders to what heights this nineteen-year-old artist will reach.

The first movement ends with an unaccompanied cadenza, and Elman played one composed by Joachim, full of almost hopeless difficulties, but overcome with a rare ease which was little short of marvellous.

The opening number of the afternoon was the excerpt from "Cephalus and Procis," an eighteenth century composition, written just previous to the marriage of the Count of Artois and Princess Marie Theresa, in 1773, and given as a ballet on that occasion. As it was played yesterday (an arrangement by Felix Mottl) it consisted of three movements—Tambourin, Minuet and Gigue.

The symphony followed and received a superb reading. It is said that Beethoven named this symphony "Recollections of a Life in the Country," and as nearly as music can describe sadness, or joy, or rage, or visions, so nearly has this master of exquisite melody and great harmony gathered the essence of these emotions and put them into his Fifth—and, as some critics claim, his greatest—symphony.

The applause that followed this number was so great that Mr. Feidler, the conductor, was recalled five or six times and took the last call with the members of the orchestra standing.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" closed the programme.

The next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony will be given the evening of February 18 and the afternoon of February

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

JAN 10 1909

Boston Orchestra Concert.

Enthusiasm marked yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, given before an audience that filled the auditorium to its capacity. As at the Thursday evening's concert, the soloist was again the violinist, Mr. Mischa Elman. On this occasion he played the Brahms concerto. So far as the technical difficulties were concerned he tossed them off as though they were child's play.

Years ago, when this concerto were new, some musical wag said it was not one for the violin, but against the violin. With Mr. Elman the work sounds distinctly as though it were written for the violin. He played it superbly. There was the same assurance that characterizes all his playing, and the beauty of tone was delightful. At the end he was recalled many times, most of his auditors applauding, while some shouted their "Bravos."

The remainder of the programme contained these Gretry dances:—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The Gretry numbers are from the composer's ballet "Cephalus and Procris," and the arrangement played was one that was made by Mr. Felix Motti. They sounded well, even if they did suggest the thought that they were modernized a bit by the arranger, and the Beethoven symphony was given a very effective interpretation. Mr. Fiedler again conducted with authority, and the orchestra played wonderfully.

[137]

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 9 1909

MUSICAL.

Third Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Introduces Mischa Elman, the Violinist.

For the third time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night added appreciably to the significance of Brooklyn's first winter of musical enjoyment at the Academy of Music, and again the occasion illustrated how firm a hold of popular approval these concerts have taken. The programme offered three notably fine specimens of concentrated excellence in musical composition, and furthermore distinguished itself by introducing to Brooklyn a soloist of rare efficiency, the young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman.

The orchestral numbers were the Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C minor, and Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, two works that may be classed among the "stand-bys" of orchestral programmes. The symphony in particular is well known as one of the loviest and most ingratiating symphonic works ever written and this conviction regarding it was materially fortified by last night's rendering. Mr. Fiedler's conducting followed up the impression made at the former two concerts with a further suggestion that he is given to precise, business-like methods of interpretation which is quite positive in results through a hearty, earnest devotion to bringing out desired effects. He has not, as yet, given any definite intimation of particular originality in conception or of aspiring idealism in interpretation. He is content with the certainty of a wholesome unity in ensemble. In this respect the performance of the symphony was thoroughly enjoyable, and the overture as well.

Young Mr. Elman gave a startling revelation of skill and quickly satisfied his hearers that he is one of the exceptionally gifted and accomplished artists who now and then come to the front and demonstrate that they seem to possess superhuman power. He played the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D, Op. 35, a work of tremendous difficulty, especially in its complicated and ornate first movement, and gave an astonishing display of interpretative perception, executive surety and exquisite tone. It was an exhibition to make the listener marvel how this young man of nineteen could compass such difficulties, and do it with the accompaniment of the polished refinement he displayed. Truly young Elman illustrates wherein violinists are born, not made. The experienced players in the orchestra seemed to take as much delight in showing admiration of the young player as did the audience, who recaled him again and again, presumably in the hope that the rule against encores at these concerts might be set aside this once, but it was not.

The concerto itself is a work of rare quality. The first movement is a somewhat elaborate test for the performer. In the second movement (Canzonetta) we have one of those melodies of melancholy tinge into which Tschaikowsky's personality infused itself from time to time, and the last movement he makes brilliant use of Russian folk song melodies. As a whole the concert was a very satisfying and really inspiring offering to the intelligence and good taste to a host of listeners who filled the auditorium as it has not been filled for any important musical event this season.

TIMES,
New York City.
JAN 10 1909

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Gretry, Beethoven, and Wagner Played—Mischa Elman Again Soloist.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert yesterday afternoon, a large audience derived much pleasure from the beautiful playing of the orchestra in three dance pieces from Gretry's ballet, "Cephalus and Procris," Beethoven's fifth symphony, and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" and was much absorbed in the remarkable playing of Mischa Elman in Brahm's violin concerto.

Gretry's three dance pieces have been arranged for concert performances of a modern orchestra by Felix Mottl, and were heard here for the first time. They are very charming music of the older spirit, especially the minuet, and most of all the third, a gigue. They are full of a blossoming melody, and there are many delightful instrumental touches in them. Whether these proceed wholly from Mr. Mottl's work or are in part to be found in Gretry's original score; passages for the wood wind instruments, as the flute and oboe and bassoon, were exquisitely phrased and passed from one to the other.

Mr. Fiedler's performance of Beethoven's symphony was one to be enjoyed for its sincere reproduction of Beethoven's music, without exaggerations or attempts to find new effects. Some of the tempos were somewhat fast, as that of the last movement. The much discussed preliminary measures at the opening of the symphony were taken with an emphasis somewhat deliberate, though not with the exaggeration into which some have fallen in treating them. There was much life and a fine rhythmic quality in Mr. Fiedler's performance; and the tone of the orchestra glorified the music.

Mr. Elman's performance of Brahms's concerto was the finest he has given since his first appearance here. It had fewer of the faults of conception that marred his playing of Beethoven the other evening, and the music is in some ways better adapted to his present style. There would still have been a gain if he had played with more poise and repose; and in certain passages, as in the last movement, with a greater firmness of rhythm. But his playing was, on the whole, something to bewilder and to delight. It was wonderfully full of fire and vitality, and it was in tone, throughout, of that incomparably rounded, rich and poignant quality that is one of the most notable features of Mr. Elman's art. He mastered all the technical difficulties of the concerto with an amazing security and apparent ease; and the difficulties are very great in the way of double stoppings and arpeggiate passages. His wonderful bowing, so elastic, so free and potently energetic, sent the pulse of life through his playing from beginning to end. There were places where a little less portamento and sentimental turn of the phrase could have been wished for, and it might be too much to say that the player has at present the breadth of view and the ripeness of feeling to make him an absolute master of this composition, one of the higher summits of modern art. Yet there was a sense of mastery in his performance as well as a sympathetic and magnetic quality that took captive the listener, as there has been in hardly anything else he has hitherto done here. He has before shown plenty of defects, some that seemed fundamentally rooted in his artistic nature; he has never revealed so much of the potentiality of great and supreme artistry as he did yesterday—an artistry that shall be able to clear itself of the slag of the virtuoso and the prodigy with advancing maturity and ripening intellect.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN - 9 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mischa Elman, as Soloist, and Max Fiedler, as Conductor, Render Excellent Programme.

A noteworthy programme formed the attraction offered last night at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The incidental Brooklyn debut of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violonist, who won American fame with his first American appearance, added particular importance to the event, and it had best be stated at the very beginning that no exaggeration was contained in the advance reports which described the youthful virtuoso as a budding Paganini. Elman is a great artist whose youth has been no drawback to a marvelous development, nor a bar to a deep understanding of his art.

The great Tschaikowskly concert in D major served Elman as medium for his production. Once upon a time the composer called it "an ungrateful piece," and Leopold Auer, the man to whom it was dedicated, hesitated long before matching his technique against its difficult passages. There is power almost amounting to violence in its first, the allegro moderato movement; too much perhaps for musical comfort, but the right quantity to afford the artist opportunity to show his virtuosity. Elman took advantage of the chance with astonishing verve and an assurance that was justified only by his supreme ability. It is the second movement, the Canzonetta, which constitutes the real beauty of the composition. Its tender, enchanting melody swings in the lofty measure of a rhapsodized national melody, and while the first movement taxes the physical power of the player, the second puts to test his mind and his heart and yields its fragrant charm only to the artist who fully appreciates its meaning. At this task Elman showed himself a player of almost poetic inspiration. His strings sang under the pressure of his bow and when the finale, the boisterous allegro vivacissimo followed the soothing Polish air, it was as though a sigh of regret, the impatient movement of a sleeper being awakened from a fairy dream, passed through the vast auditorium.

Max Fielder was the conductor of the orchestra. The latter's interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is not new to Brooklyn music lovers. It is a masterly presentation of one of the greatest compositions of all times, and Mr. Fiedler's control of his musicians, especially in the difficult and almost disordered first movement, was truly remarkable. In the andante con moto the 'cellos and violas did brilliant work and received clear and resonant support from the wind instruments in the development of the theme.

Weber's rousing Freischuetz overture formed the last programme number. Every seat in the Academy was filled.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

HEINRICH GOTTLIEB NOREN'S "Kaleidoscope," an original theme and variations for orchestra, which was much discussed on account of the curious lawsuit of which it was the subject about a year ago, was played for the first time in this city last evening at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The composition was announced for performance by the Boston orchestra during the season of 1907-08, but the performances did not take place as the publication of the work had been suspended pending the result of the lawsuit. It was alleged that Noren's use of the Strauss theme was a violation of the copyright law, but the court held that there had been no violation of the law on the ground that the motives were not melodies in the meaning of the law. The other numbers on the programme were Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, and Richard Strauss's third tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Mischa Elman was the soloist.

The Noren composition is a masterly work, in which fancy and invention are happily combined with learning and skill.

MISCHA ELMAN,
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

The variations are of a free character. The composer does not reproduce in them the theme in easily recognizable disguises, but uses it in combination with new material, or merely as a suggestion in making a series of tone pictures or sketches. The theme itself is not especially striking or promising, a rather ordinary theme suggesting an tonality one of the old church modes. The variations, of which there are eleven, are, however, varied and individual in character, now elfish and playful, now solemn and serious, and again contemplative in the mood of reverie. Particularly attractive are No. 4, entitled "Scherzo"; No. 5, "In the Cathedral," an impressive suggestion of great architectural designs; No. 8, "A Slave Dance," and No. 10, a mazurka. No. 7, "Funeral March," is impressive, while No. 9, "From Far Off Days," has a tender reflective charm.

The celebrated variation is the last in which the Strauss themes occur. This is a double figure, ending with a figured chorale, in which Strauss's "Hero motive" and Noren's theme are the subjects. The learning and skill displayed in the construction of this number are such as to excite admiration, especially as they appear to be used not as ends but as means. Apparently Noren has attempted in this variation to depict an artistic combat of rivalry between himself and Strauss, and to prophesy its ultimate result, which, of course, under the circumstances, is the triumph of Noren.

The Strauss "hero motive" is combined with the Noren theme, and later the "hero's antagonistic motive" from the Strauss poem is introduced. In the stretto the Noren and Strauss themes crash together in a mighty climax, and the result is the emergence of the Noren theme as the melody of the chorale with the Strauss themes as accompanying figures. The orchestration, while not especially rich in novel effects, is luminous and richly colored. In the performance the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed to a marked degree.

Mischa Elman's playing of the Beethoven concerto revealed the fact that he is still young as an artist. The first movement of this work is a supreme test of the artistic development of a violinist, and in his playing of this Mr. Elman was disappointing. His performance of it was lacking in breadth and dignity, and was unsteady in rhythm and deficient at times in clarity. In the second movement he played with better effect, and with beautiful tone, but with unnecessary exaggeration of sentiment. He was at his best in the last movement.

TIME
...ER, N.
JAN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pensions Its Retired Members

One of the chief factors which makes for the supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not only in this country, but abroad, is the length of service of its members, showing that there has been a minimum of change in its personnal. An orchestra is a most highly strung organism. To get its best ideals, its members must be not merely accomplished musicians but they must have that musical sympathy with each other which comes only through long association. An orchestra that is constantly changing in its membership cannot hope to attain the highest standards that an orchestra does which perserves the same members, retiring only thos whom age has made unable to keep the pace.

This year the Boston Symphony Orchestra began to pay pensions to 13 of its former members who had been retired from the Orchestra for one reason or another. Before a member of the Orchestra becomes eligible to a pension he must have been in its ranks for ten years. Retiring aften ten years' service he receives a minimum pension, the pension increasing up to 25 years of service which is the maximum pension. The moneys for the pension fund are raised in three ways; by annual assessment on the members of the Orchestra; by the receipts from two special concerts given each winter by the orchestra in Symphony Hall; and by gifts made to the fund by friends of the orchestra.

Some rather interesting statistics were brought out recently regarding the membership of the orchestra. The number of musicians employed is 97. Of these 80 have been in the Orchestra more than four years. There are three mn in th orchestra today who were in it when it was organized, 28 years ago. They are Paul H. Fox, flute; J. Akeroyd, second violin, and Daniel Kuntz, first violin. The average length of service for these 80 men who have been in the orchestra four years or more is just less than 16½ years. The three named men have been in the orchestra since its organization. Two have been in the orchestra 27 years, three 26 years, seven 24 years, three 23 yars, four 22 years, one 21 years, one 20 years, five 19 years, five 18 years, one 17 years, six 15 years, two 14 years, three 13 years, one 12 years, six 11 years, four 9 years, four 8 years, one 7 years, two 6 years, two 5 years. The greatest changes in the orchestra were made in the fall of 1907 when Dr. Muck brought quite a number of new men from abroad to take the place of some who were retired on account of age. It is certain that no orchestra in this country and it is doubtful whether any orchestra in any country can show a table of service to compare with this.

The only appearance of the orchestra in Rochester will be in Convention Hall, Saturday evening, January 30.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date JAN

As Safonoff in Carnegie Hall on Friday showed Fiedler, Hess and Schroeder, of Bostonians present and past, his wonderful and compelling way with the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, so Fiedler on Saturday invited the Russian to hear his Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

The matinée audiences might either one have been that million dollar women's committee that to-day announces its two Mahler-Philharmonic concerts on March 31 and April 6.

Elman at the Boston men's matinée not only heard how Beethoven should be played, but also showed that he can play Brahms better. The cadenza was his own fault.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,
Address New York City.
Date JAN

The Boston Symphony concert on Saturday included a masterful performance of Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," under Fiedler. Mischa Elman again aroused the utmost enthusiasm in Brahms' Concerto.

[138]

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

JAN 11 19

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Herr Max Fiedler hat sich durch die Wiedergabe der 5. Beethoven'schen Symphonie im Nachmittags-Concert der Bostoner am verflossenen Samstag als ein Dirigent erwiesen, der würdig ist, an der Spitze der berühmten Bostoner zu stehen. Wir haben hier große Dirigenten gehabt und elektrisirende Ausdeutungen von Beethoven's genanntem Werk, aber Herr Fiedler kann den Vergleich mit ihnen kühn aushalten, denn seine Interpretation war nicht nur großen Stils und von echter innerer Antheilnahme getragen, er respektirte auch den Geist des Werkes und enthielt sich aller eigenmächtigen Nüancen, die beim Publikum oft so viel Anwerth finden, der klassischen Tradition aber so gewaltig widersprechen. Schon das machtvoll akzentuirte, pathetisch deklamirte Eingangsthema, wo „das Schicksal an die Pforte klopft", bereitete auf die kommende Leistung vor, und als die letzte Note verklungen war, stand das Publikum im Bann einer machtvollen Verkündigung von Beethoven's Genius.

Wie Herr Fiedler, dem wir anfangs gewaltthätige Akzente vorwerfen mußten, das herrliche Instrument erkannt hat, das er zu spielen berufen ist, zeigte auch die äußerst feinfühlige und charakteristische Wiedergabe von drei Tänzen aus Grétry's reizvollem Ballet „Cephalus und Procris", von Herrn Felix Mottl für den modernen Concertgebrauch sehr effektvoll eingerichtet. „Tambourin", „Menuett" und „Gigue" nennen sich diese entzückend feinen Stücke, von denen namentlich das letztere eine stilvolle geschliffene und herzlich bewegte Ausführung fand, die das Publikum wahrhaften Genuß brachte. Das waren die Bostoner in ihrer glücklichsten Verfassung. Der Beifall klang nach diesen Nummern überzeugt und schallkräftig, und auch eine sehr gelungene Wiedergabe der „Fliegender Holländer"-Ouverture fand die verdiente Anerkennung.

Geradezu begeistert war das Publikum durch die Wiedergabe des Brahms'schen Violin-Konzerts durch Herrn Mischa Elman. Das Brahms'sche Werk ist bekanntlich sehr widerhaarig, geistig schwer zu erfassen und technisch ganz ausnehmend schwierig. Es gehört zu den kleinen Wundern der modernen Musikentwicklung, dieses Stück Musik, das gut und groß zu spielen den Ehrgeiz des gereiftesten Künstlers bildet, von einem 19 Jahre alten Jüngling mit so genialem Schmiß und großem Zug nur so hingeworfen zu sehen. Sichtlich ohne die geringste Anstrengung bewältigte Jung-Mischa diesen Koloß, gestaltete den ersten Satz zu einem wahren künstlerischen Erlebnis, erfreute im Adagio durch den seelenvollsten Gesang und zeigte auch im dritten, der einer noch subtileren Durchgeistigung fähig ist, daß er der Mann der Zukunft sei, dessen glänzende Gegenwart einer noch höheren und tieferen Durchbildung fähig ist. Der junge Künstler wurde geradezu enthusiastisch gefeiert.

H.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A varied programme was presented at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. A novelty from another century, three dances from 'Cephalus and Procris," an heroic ballet by Grétry, "freely arranged" for concert use by Felix Mottl, headed he programme. Then came Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. After this symphony anything is usually an anti-climax, but Saturday Brahms's violin concerto, with Mischa Elman as violinist, followed it, and then the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" brought the concert to a close. The resulting anti-climax was less marked than if the symphony had been played more impressively and the concerto less so.

The Grétry dances proved charming and seemed to please the audience greatly. The first is a tambourin, the second a menuet ("The Nymphs of Diana"), the third a gigue. No doubt some hearers preferred one and some another, but all are beautiful with their suggestion of Watteau, moonlight, and Versailles, and the orchestration, however the honors are to be divided between Grétry and Mottl, is a delight.

The performance of the Beethoven symphony was particularly notable for the splendid tone of the orchestra in playing it. Some passages, the first measures of the andante, for instance, were of surpassing beauty. But the performance as a whole seemed a little tame in comparison with others the same work has had here in the last few years. And it is not necessary to be an advocate of novel "readings" and "interpretations" to be of this opinion.

The finale of the symphony was taken a trifle faster than is usual. This innovation and the wealth of gesture in Mr. Fiedler's conducting of the work did not add noticeably to the distinction of the performance.

In playing the Brahms concerto—after the Beethoven concerto, the noblest in the literature of the violin—Mischa Elman may have wished to atone for his comparative failure with the latter composition on Thursday. At any rate he achieved an absorbing performance of Brahms's work. Mr. Elman is young and will doubtless gain in repose of style as the years go by. But even to-day he can do wonders in the Brahms concerto. He played it Saturday with wonderful loveliness of tone, with mastery of the technical difficulties, with warm feeling, and with dignity, as well as with the fire of youth. Seldom has such a scene of enthusiasm been witnessed in Carnegie Hall as that which followed the performance of this concerto. The great audience recalled the young violinist with a persistence that suggested a belief in some minds that encores could happen at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

None happened, and at last the 'Flying Dutchman" overture had a chance to be heard. It was played with magnificent vigor.

J. P. S.

SUN,

New York City.

JAN 10 19

THE MUSIC OF ONE DAY

MATINEE OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mischa Elman Plays the Brahms Violin Concerto Better Than He Did Beethoven's—Three Charming Dances Played From an Old Ballet by Gretry.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon began with old news. It was a novelty from the treasure house of Grétry, who died in 1813. This novelty consisted of three dances from the heroic ballet "Cephale et Procris," arranged for concert performance by Felix Mottl. This work was not a ballet in the sense understood by theatregoers of to-day, but one of those early French entertainments which utilized much of the material now found only in opera. There was a libretto and singers were needed in the performance, but the graphic dance contributed largely to the telling of the story.

The three dances heard yesterday were a tambourin, a minuet and a gigue. All proved to be charming, as Grétry's dances invariably were, and the gigue in particular captivated the audience by its piquancy and the interesting treatment of the instruments.

The performance of these dances was in accord with the best traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Fifth Symphony was played respectfully, but with little depth of insight. The finale was taken at a lively pace and the balance of the parts was not always perfect.

The sole performer was again Mischa Elman, and this time he played the Brahms violin concerto. His reading of this grand composition went far to atone for his insufficient interpretation of the Beethoven concerto on Thursday night. In the first place it was a delight to find the work in the hands of a violinist to whom its appalling technical difficulties were as ripe fruit.

Elman played every measure of the composition with magnificent sweep, dash, certainty and mastery of the finger board and bow. Further than this it can be said that his reading had dignity and warmth excellently combined. His treatment of the slow movement was reposeful and yet tender, and his playing of the finale had the uncommon merit of beautiful clarity.

In the first movement Mr. Elman did not play the Joachim cadenza, which is generally employed. That which he did play was not familiar, but it was suspiciously similar in style to that of Elman's teacher, Auel, heard in the Beethoven concerto on Thursday evening, and it fitted just as little the august company into which it was audaciously thrust.

This cadenza was not an artistic development of the thematic matter of the movement, but a smart investiture of it with a variety of finger-board tricks with no finer purpose than to make a fiddler's show. When Mr. Elman has learned to reverence art more and to adore violin playing less he will put aside such cadenzas. That of the first movement yesterday was in sharp contrast to his own playing of Brahms's music.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 11

MUSIC

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

It was an excellent but not a remarkable concert that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Max Fiedler's direction, offered yesterday afternoon to an audience that filled Carnegie Hall. Perhaps its lustre was dimmed by the glories of last Thursday evening's performance, which will assuredly figure among the season's red letter occasions, and possibly, therefore, those who heard both these concerts were minded to give yesterday's music less than was its due of appreciation. But miracles every day are too much to expect, and, after all, the level which the Boston visitors maintained was a lofty one.

The orchestral programme comprised three dance pieces from Grétry's "Cephalus and Procris," freely arranged for modern concert hall use by Felix Mottl; Beethoven's C-minor symphony and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The soloist was again Mr. Mischa Elman, and he played the Brahms concerto for violin.

The Grétry dance music, from his heroic ballet upon one of the touching episodes of classical mythology, is not unfamiliar here in its original form, and, if memory serves, fragments of this work have figured in the lists of Mr. Sam Franko's concerts of old music. But Mottl's orchestration of the tambourin, minuet and jig, played yesterday, had not before been heard in this city. Of the three pieces, the jig seemed most worth while, and it proved to be a bit of infectious musical gayety, happily simple in its instrumental voicing. The tambourin and minuet endured less well the burden of latter day orchestral raiment, but they, too, exerted considerable rhythmic charm. Mr. Fiedler and the band performed these dances with just appreciation. The C minor symphony brought out strikingly, in its opening measures, the energy and the decision of conductor and orchestra. Throughout the symphony's performance there was a fine sense of tonal values and a consistent beauty of utterance, but there have been more weighty, more significant readings of the work.

In the Brahms violin concerto young Mr. Elman renewed the admiration aroused by his playing of the Beethoven concerto three nights ago, so far as his purity and fluency of tone were concerned. But this music, even more than the Beethoven concerto, demands a tone of large diameter and swelling opulence, and the limitations of Mr. Elman, which are mainly those of youth, and not to his discredit, were felt more than was expected. With these allowed for, the Russian lad's performance was one of sustained loveliness, and it wanted only a multiplication of its dynamic factors to be of complete potency. Not too much, however, can be said in favor of his choice of cadenzas in either the Brahms or the Beethoven concerto.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

rom New York City.

ddress

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Im gestrigen Abend-Konzert der Bostoner hat uns Dirigent Herr Max Fiedler eine interessante Novität vorgesetzt, für deren Wiedergabe wir ihm dankbar sein dürfen. Noren's „Kaleidoskop", Originalthema und 11 Variationen, ein Werk, das namentlich eine ganz exquisite Orchestertechnik aufweist, womit nicht gesagt sein soll, daß es nicht auch schöpferisch von Bedeutung ist.

Der Titel ist insofern gut gewählt, als er die schillernde Buntheit der einzelnen Stücke gut charakterisirt; andererseits nimmt er den Abtheilungen etwas von ihrer Bedeutung, denn es handelt sich um mehr als blos geschickte Variationen. Die meisten dieser Abwandlungen könnten auch vom Ganzen losgelöst auf Beachtung Anspruch machen. Das Thema ist gut erfunden, prägnant und ausdrucksvoll, wenn auch etwas fragmentarisch klingend.

In dessen Verwendung und Verarbeitung macht sich bei aller blühenden Phantasie die große Klarheit und Bestimmtheit der Zeichnung und des Kolorits bemerkbar. Den gewaltigen Kontrapunktiker zeigt besonders die Doppelschlußfuge. Bei aller Gelehrtheit sind manche der Variationen aber geistreich, und auch Humor steckt darin. Die Instrumentation arbeitet mit den blendendsten modernen Effekten, ohne den eigenen Zug zu verleugnen.

Herr Fiedler holte aus diesem dankbaren Werk große Wirkungen hervor. Er dirigirte mit einer Freiheit und einem Schwung, den wir nicht oft an ihm bemerkt haben und erwies sich als bedeutender Kolorist. An dem Orchester konnte er seine Freude haben. Auch wir hatten sie, denn glänzender und geistreicher kann das kein Orchester der Welt behandeln. Die Novität hatte sehr freundlichen Erfolg, und Herr Fiedler konnte wiederholt für den warmen Beifall danken.

Der Solist des Konzerts war Herr Mischa Elman, der uns einmal ganz klassisch kommen wollte und sich mit Beethoven's Violin-Konzert als ein Virtuose von überraschender Vergeistigung und Reife erwies. Es lag etwas unendlich Sonniges und Heiteres in der Art, wie er dieses Wunderwerk behandelte, das man gewöhnlich nur von reifen Männern spielen hört. Es glänzte die hoffnungsfrohe, freudige Jugend des Künstlers darin. Mag sein, daß er den dritten Satz in einigen Jahren noch überlegener, vertiefter bringen wird — an der Wiedergabe der beiden ersten Sätze ist wahrhaftig nicht viel mehr zu ändern.

Es vibrirte etwas Lerchenhaftes in den holden, jubelnden Passagen des ersten Satzes, und die weitgespannte Kadenz Prof. Auer's wurde in der Art einer freien Improvisation gebracht. Ruhiger, seliger Friede schwebte über dem Larghetto, dem er den süßesten Ton der Nachtigall lieh. Daß er die schwierigen Doppelgriffe und vollgriffigen Akkordpassagen des Rondos sicher meisterte, das bedarf wohl nicht erst der ausdrücklichen Versicherung. Der Erfolg des jugendlichen Künstlers war ein durchschlagender. Er mußte immer und immer wieder erscheinen und danken.

Strauß' Tondichtung „Tod und Verklärung" schloß in würdiger Weise ein genußreiches Conert ab.

H.

TIMES,

New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations Played for the First Time—Mischa Elman, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York yesterday on its third visit this season, and at its concert in Carnegie Hall gave a programme consisting of three works—the "Kaleidoscope," variations of Heinrich Noren; Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Mischa Elman, and Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Noren's variations have been much spoken of recently because of an absurd lawsuit of which they have been the subject in Germany—the point at issue being the use in them of two themes from Richard Strauss's tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," which was claimed to be a violation of copyright, but declared by the court not to be such on the ground that these themes are not melodies.

But the variations themselves are much better worth considering from a musical point of view. The work created a deep impression at its first performance in Dresden a year and a half ago, (before the lawsuit had been thought of,) and has made a name for the composer since. It is a remarkably fine composition, and is all the more notable as coming from a composer already in middle life of whom nothing had ever been heard before.

There are eleven variations in which the composer has worked with the freedom that the moderns have developed in this form, making of the theme only a starting point for free and unrestrained fancy, and keeping no firm hold of it in molding and shaping the successive movements to which it gives rise. These variations are full of a rich and vigorous imagination, and are the product of a remarkable musical skill. There are in them a dexterous command of the learned forms of musical art and of the most modern applications of thematic treatment; but these are employed with an art that conceals art, and with a freshness and spontaneity of musical invention that make the music alive with interest from the beginning to the end, with a rapid shifting of mood and a wide reach of imagination.

The composer is a master of orchestration, and falls into few of the extravagances of the modern use of that art; his color is restrained, yet full and rich, and he commands great resources of instrumental combination. Their merit is that which must be accounted the supreme merit of giving the right and inevitable expression of the musical thought.

The most notable of these variations are the nobly beautiful ninth, entitled by the composer "From Far Off Days," elegiac and tender in feeling and full of lovely instrumental effects, and the final one, the eleventh, in which the composer pays homage to Richard Strauss, entitling it "To a Celebrated Contemporary." It is in this that he has used the two themes from "Ein Heldenleben," in combination with others of his own. It is a tour de force of musical learning and skill; but is much more, in that it is music of absorbing interest and moving power.

The attentive listener wondered at the manner in which a truly musical effect is wrought from the treatment of the unpromising cackle of the theme, representing in Strauss's own music his critical antagonists; the manner in which it is made to yield further effects from its inversion; the adeptness with which Strauss's themes are polyphonically developed with Noren's own material, and, finally, the ease and flexibility with which all this is worked into a double fugue that, while it is full of contrapuntal skill, is treated with the freedom of the modern art, and is made splendidly sonorous and stimulating to the musical intelligence. Such a composition is the work of an artist of no mean power; and it cannot long remain his only contribution to the modern literature of the orchestra. It was superbly played, with much finesse on the part of the orchestra, and conviction on the part of Mr. Fiedler.

Mr. Elman's performance of Beethoven's concerto was in many ways remarkable, but it showed the limitations that still hedge the playing of this extraordinarily talented artist. There was the rich, rounded, and searching tone that he commands, the vitality and energy of bowing, the dexterity and accuracy of his left hand—and on this occasion Mr. Elman reached much nearer to perfect intonation than he did at his recent recital here. There were many beautifully played passages. What was missed was the lofty serenity of the music, the repose and breadth that are of its essence. There was still the trace of restlessness in Mr. Elman's playing. There was not always the perfect security of rhythm that this music needs above all other.

While there were certain exquisite bits of cantilena, he did not keep it always on the plane of high nobility. These are things that, with all the brilliancy and remarkable talent of this bewildering young man, disconcert those who would see him reach the place to which his rare gifts and accomplishment entitle him. Mr. Elman played cadenzas by Prof. Leopold Auer, his master, that are not worthy to be inserted in Beethoven's music, even in those places that are supposed to be reserved for the artist's unrestrained fantasy; they are cheap and trivial in their employment of Beethoven's themes.

Mr. Elman was most enthusiastically applauded for his performance and was recalled to the platform time and again.

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," which closed the programme, was played with much impressiveness.

[139]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRENCH AND GERMAN MUSIC, OLD AND NEW

Debussy for a Modern and Berlioz for a Classic on the French Side—Schillings and Schubert for Germans—A Rather Empty Fragment of Schillings's "Moloch"—"The Afternoon of a Faun" Again

Schubert in heroic size, Debussy refining his musical phrases into the most elusive subtleties, an excerpt from an opera of Schillings, and the riotous rhythms of Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," composed the programme of the twelfth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra. The piquancy of the contrasts it presented was an ample substitute for the personal interest usually aroused by the entrance of a soloist. Schubert in an Olympic mood (not unstreaked, be it confessed, with the sentiment common to Germanic notions of Greek deities) and Debussy at the opposite end of the scale—not only harmonic, but mythological—the two are as far apart as the formal symphony and the subjective fantasy, as the faun from the deity. But the antithesis demands this modification; that the scale must be regarded as horizontal rather than vertical. These divisions would have been still more emphatic had the pieces been played in the order in which they appeared on the programme, which would have made Debussy follow Schubert directly after the intermission. This, however, was announced as an error in the printing, and the order observed was:

Schubert: Symphony in C major, No. 7.
Schillings: "The Harvest Festival," from the Opera "Moloch."
Debussy: Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Berlioz: Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

From the number of those who departed before the beginning of the Overture by Berlioz, it might be gathered that a generous share had come to share the reveries of Debussy and that not a few declined to subject them to the possible blur of Berlioz's exuberant scoring. And the filmy grace and lightness brought to the eclogue by the players instilled sympathy with such a retreat. Debussy, in common with other moderns, clears a space for individual virtuosity, less that of technique than of tonal coloring. It is not enough that the flute in its bend of chromatics announcing the chief theme, should sound the bucolic note. Debussy is not content with the conventional symbols—staff, pipes and a grazing herd in the prospect. His notes must convey what they conveyed as played yesterday afternoon in tones of warm rich languor—the silken shimmer of still air, trembling glow of yellow sunlight, the peace of wild things undisturbed, the peace of wild, half-divine beings, unvexed with notions of right or wrong. Golden afternoon; greenery, rich and luxuriant in ripe, midsummer growth, spots of wavering sunshine on cushiony turf, the tinkle of a stream, and the faun lying in a swoon of drowsiness among golden-headed lilies; the catlike grace of his supple body in repose, tips of hairy ears with their peep of the animal, the hint of a smile—playful without viciousness—the longish look under half-closed eyelids—such a faun as looked down from one of the niches of the hall; such a faun lay among the golden-headed lilies of Mallarmé's verse; such a faun breathed out of the strings and wood winds of Debussy's score. Creature of vague, wistful passions, rolled in the embrace of the thick turf—shall he yield to the soft persuasion of the hum that pervades the wood, or urge his drowsy senses to recall a visit of nymphs, swan-white—or was it a visit, or was it a dream? If reality, he would resign his divinity to search it out and claim it for his own. But the yellow sun grows too bright for these twilights of memory; the air palpitates with its golden radiance. His eyes turn to smoking Etna, and his thoughts not to a nymph, but a goddess. And while he trembles at such presumption, the day again exerts its spell; his long lashes meet and the smile of wild innocence melts into the curves of the slumber smile and a deep sigh as of 'cello notes comes from the parted lips. Flakes of sunshine tremble in the golden air.

These, or something next of kin, were the images which haunted the mind of the composer, and these were what he sought to convey, and does convey, in the measures of his ejaculatory score. Its melodies come in jets and spurts out of billowy tones which stretch the silken strands of their weaving. The throb of the initial flute notes is developed in masses of writhing and crawling chromatics; a solo violin speaks in pensive soliloquy, with flute reminiscent; up sweep the chromatics, and down; and in passionate undertones the sustained background of wind notes—a parenthesis of sound, always expressive, and often explicit. All at last—visions, harp glissando, sigh of cellos, solo violin—melt into silvery mist and fade to gray silence. Such music may or may not "last." It is. And considering the difficulty of predictions, it cannot well be overlooked.

With Shubert's symphony (still-born, but christened with a rhapsody from the critical pen of Schumann) the case is far otherwise. In lateral dimensions, at least, the work is gigantic. The same might be said of its melodic proportions. The fertility of invention, responsible for so much that is best in Schubert, and much also that is commonplace, did not desert him here. He practises no husbandry with his themes. Material that would have prompted a score of his peers to niggardly hoarding, he lavishes in ornamental detail. He sings with a score of throats. He is, moreover, magnificently deliberate. Here is no deference to suburban trains and dinner hours; but the rounded episode, the complete development of his idea, orderly and loquacious, if you like, with the pregnant loquacity of the elder novelists like Fielding, who "brought his armchair into the proscenium to chat in the lusty ease of his fine English." As Schubert paced the four-square paths of the Academe in this [illegible] Mr. Fiedler was heard at his best—scholarly, robust and apt in his sense of the contrasts in which the work abounds. As an illustration, consider his generalship at a certain climax of the second movement. It grew in volume and in import, like the preparation for great events, it gathered head and gained intensity; it became a vial of tempests, burst, and smote a dead silence of human stupefaction, after the manner of great historical climaxes. A few measures of philosophic comment and the preceding themes picked up their routiné employments to go on as before, also after the manner of what follows historical climaxes. All these and other matters of moment came in response to the minatory flourishes of Mr. Fiedler's baton—sharp accentuations of rhythm which told like a bold line, military blares of brass, abrupt thunders, remote horn calls, Schubert's dropped stitches of melody in obscure nooks of the band, caught and thrust on the ear in their fleeting phrase; themes briefly announced and finely amplified, and always the string choir's limpid undercurrent of sound. To scan the pages of this symphony is to see at a glance how Schubert relied on this last device, the chanting of strings, as a mass against which to build his themes. Increasing in volume as the end is approached, never perfunctory, but always vitalized with melody, these members mount like clustered columns, springing their light tracery into the upper recesses of groining where all is rich, intricate and dim. Considered as the music of tracery, still all is disciplined—pure design before the inroads of the flamboyant, when still for every member in the column exists a member in the arch, interrupted, it may be, by the flowers and foliage of the capital, but resuming above in firm continuity of line. Such music was born of a reverence for the schools. Perhaps do not write that way now from choice. Perhaps we cannot.

For the rest, the prelude to the third act of Schillings's "Moloch," bearing the label of "The Harvest Festival," frank and full-lunged, gave a demonstration of how to perform intricate orchestral evolutions, to avoid the extravagances of "distinguished contemporaries" and keep within the law up to within half a score of measures from the end, there to admit a riot of strange [illegible] which may be supposed to follow in the train of Moloch. The overture of Berlioz, heard many a time at these concerts, freely exhibited its kaleidoscopic colors from the red of brasses to the blue of muted strings in its thick instrumentation. Again the English horn (deliciously appropriate) arrogated to itself the singing voice of Benvenuto in his melody, "O, Teresa, vous que j'aime," in strains that would have left that worthy completely bewildered and inexpressibly flattered. Berlioz and Cellini; indeed, why not? The fervid romanticist pouring the rich glow of his fancy about the image of the glorious, æsthetic thug? If it succeeds, as in this case we are bound to admit that it does, so much the better for art and biography. Benvenuto mounts from the naive to the heroic. A failure can be attributed not to romanticism but to the romanticist, whose wings were weak (or to the librettist whose fable was silly). But Berlioz and Benvenuto, romanticist and romantic, thinker and thing thought—the two were ordained twins in a metaphysical heaven. A psycho-picaresque overture remains as fruit of the union.

ELGAR'S SYMPHONY

MR. FIEDLER TO UNDERTAKE IT NEXT WEEK

The Expectancy and the Admiration That the Music Kindled in England Last Month—A Symphony Without a Programme—The Form, the Course and the Mood of the Piece—Elgar's Traits as They Play in It—A Dissenting Voice from Chicago

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, as another column announces, their public will hear for the first time Elgar's new symphony that has excited English audiences for six weeks past and that American audiences in New York and in Chicago, have already heard. At the least, it is notable music provoking to wholesome debate, if not always to admiration. Here, then, follows a hint of the unusual mood of English hearers toward it; a summary statement of its form and contents and the highly divergent impressions that two American reviewers received from the music.

ENGLISH ADMIRATION

Discussing a few weeks ago the amount of interest which had been excited by Elgar's first symphony, a cultivated lady of foreign birth who has long been settled in London caused much mirth by the innocent inquiry: "Has not any other English composer ever written a symphony?" The remark was illuminating. For the speaker was not only highly cultivated, but also a keen lover of music and a regular concert-goer well acquainted with the condition of musical affairs in this country. But though she had attended many concerts here, she had never happened to hear a British symphony, and was consequently unaware that such a thing even existed. Of course, she had to be told that many of our native composers have written symphonies, some of them of much excellence; but also it had to be confessed that not one had so far succeeded in establishing its hold upon the public, or was ever performed in the ordinary way. No wonder, therefore, that a symphony by Elgar was awaited with no ordinary amount of interest.

Ever since he wrote his "Enigma" variations his powers as a writer for the orchestra have been widely recognized. But, unfortunately, he has been strangely tardy in redeeming his early promise in this regard. Instead he has preferred to devote his attention to a long-drawn series of oratorios which, if conceived in lofty spirit and testifying on every page not only to his earnestness of purpose, but also to his abounding skill, have none the less had only a limited appeal so far as the general musical public is concerned. There has, indeed, been something of irony in the situation. At last, after many years, we have produced a composer capable of holding his own as an instrumental writer with eminent foreign masters. Yet what does this provoking composer do but steadily refuse to devote his talents to the field which they were most conspicuously fitted to adorn, and prefer instead to expend them in another direction altogether. Glance over the list of Elgar's compositions, and it is equally astonishing and deplorable to note how few are the purely instrumental pieces. The aforesaid variations, the overtures "In the South" and "Cockayne," the introduction and allegro for strings, and a few marches, these, with the juvenile "Wand of Youth," practically exhaust the list. About half a dozen compositions, mostly in the smaller forms, all told—and these from one who is by general admission a master of the orchestra! Small wonder that there were rejoicings when it became known that at length he had put his hand to a symphony, and that hope and curiosity ran high when the time for its performance arrived.

Last summer Elgar finished the symphony and it was played for the first time on Thursday, Dec. 3, by the Hallé Orchestra at Manchester, under Richter, to whom it is dedicated, and was repeated on Monday by the London Symphony Orchestra under the same experienced guidance in London, in each case with unqualified success. In the few weeks that have since elapsed London has heard the symphony no less than five times. Long ago Elgar expressed the conviction that music of the highest kind was that which was self-sufficing, and it is such music that he has written. His symphony, he has explicitly declared, has been conceived apart from any definite programme, though this has not availed, of course, to prevent many from discovering in it all sorts of esoteric meanings. In this particular matter, the position of the modern composer is really rather helpless. Apparently he must write "programme symphonies" and music with a meaning whether he likes it or not. Elgar has declared that this is not a "programme symphony." He has expressed his own decided conviction that music of the highest class requires no such basis. None the less, his critics know better, and so we are bidden on all hands to regard the music as what its own author has expressly said it is not. I have heard of an irascible old gentleman who was so incensed by the obstinacy of a fellow-diner at a restaurant who declined his proffered condiments that he eventually burst out: "Damn it, sir! you shall take mustard!" The attitude of certain modern musical critics seems to be much the same. In Manchester the rumor was rife that in some mysterious manner General Gordon's life was depicted by Elgar in terms of music, but this was emphatically denied by Elgar himself, and it may be added that neither Gordon nor any other concrete hero was called to mind by the music as it passed. [London Truth.

MATTERS OF FACT

The symphony bears no motto; it gives no indication whatever of a hidden meaning. For its title there stand these words, and these only: "Symphony by Edward Elgar. To Hans Richter, True Artist and True Friend." (Why, in these circumstances, the "inventor" of the Gordon myth did not suggest Hans Richter as the hero it is not easy to say.) It has been made public that Elgar denies having set out to illustrate any particular story or phase of life. He has written in the fulness of a life's experience, and such "poetic basis" as he has used is implied by the statement—I believe, Elgar's own—that, roughly, there is expressed here the contrast between the actual and the ideal in life, the innumerable phases of joy and sorrow, struggle and conquest. Emphatically, joy is triumphant.

Whatever the aim, the result is unity of idea as of material. One theme dominates the entire symphony yet it is in no sense to be regarded as a "fixed idea" in the sense in which Berlioz applied the principle and the words. This strong, healthy, diatonic melody (or some member of it) is seldom completely out of sight—a fact which in itself makes for unity—though in its full form it reappears only in the finale. Again, let him whose mind flourishes on conundrums seek the "solution" of the composer's use of the identical notes of the scherzo for the theme of the slow movement, but with the rhythm and phrasing entirely different). The solver of conundrums will find much to his taste here. But for myself I am content to marvel at the inventive power which created the central melody, and at the ingenuity which evolved the slow movement from the piquant scherzo. But the note of almost tragic emotion which dominates much of the symphony is by no means the only note. There is a manly vigor, a concentrated power, a persistency of strongly masculine rhythm that are equally noteworthy. The theme of the opening Allegro, for example, strenuous and passionate, yet smooth and graceful, is no less characteristic and striking than the march-like theme with which the concluding movement begins. [The London Telegraph.

THE COURSE OF THE MUSIC

Elgar has substantially followed the accepted symphonic form in four movements. He has packed them full and very closely with matter; and the listening demands the most concentrated and sustained attention. It may be said at the outset that the impression left by a first hearing is of a fine and nobly sustained ideal. It is music of profound seriousness, strong, severe, much of it even stern. Sir Edward rarely yields to a contemplation of the lighter side of life in his music; though he has done so on occasion. This symphony is assuredly not one of the occasions. There are no lascivious pleasings, even in the scherzo, and there is little of the sensuous or of warmly spontaneous song even in the adagio. We feel ourselves in the atmosphere of "The Apostles" or of "The Kingdom," with little even of the mystical idealism of "The Dream of Gerontius."

The melodic material of the music is wholly characteristic of the Elgar that has previously been made known to us, except that certain of the melodic phrases have a longer breath, a larger flight. Many such phrases of Elgar, plastic though they are under his hands, lack absolute musical beauty and freshness, the quality of poignantly reaching the heart and transporting the imagination. They sometimes, indeed, seem a mere collocation of notes that have a meaning only by adept devices of employment. The composer has followed a significantly modern tendency in the "community of theme" he has given to the several movements, the use of transformed and transfigured versions of one and the same melodic phrase in different connections and contexts. It is a device which has been used by Schumann, Liszt, Brahms, Dvorak and many more modern composers. It has the advantage of a unifying power, the establishing of a strong logical connection between the different movements of a symphonic work; it has also the danger of turning homogeneity into monotony. The result all depends on the skill and resource with which the device is treated, and in Elgar's symphony these are ample to gain the advantage, with little sacrifice to the danger. Thus there is a "central idea," stated broadly, heroically, at the outset, returning in part through all the movements, and completely in the finale; the theme of the adagio is note for note the same as that of the rushing scherzo (but with an almost complete transformation of its musical significance), and there are other similar borrowings.

The first movement, with a noble and dignified slow introduction, is the most elaborate portion of the work, the richest in thematic material, the most elaborately developed. There is a wonderful wealth of instrumental color in it, and there are innumerable touches that only a master of orchestration could have evolved. Yet the movement as a whole lacks the broad sweep of development, the sense of inevitable progress. It is episodic, and though many of these episodes are of beauty, the result fails to carry the listener along with an unceasing absorption in the music. The second movement, the scherzo, though not so entitled, has a rushing, piquant theme, and a truly beautiful trio. It leads directly into the adagio, ingeniously developed from the same theme. Here is perhaps the fullest blossoming of purely musical beauty that the symphony can show, the embodiment not only of the deepest thought, but also of the deepest feeling. The finale is noble music truly, but perhaps the most austere and inaccessible of any in the symphony. If it is marred at all, it is by the appearance of a theme that uncomfortably suggests one from the second act of "Aida," a suggestion more or less trivial, as such reminiscences often are. There can, of course, be no question of plagiarism here, since the spirit and the treatment are so different. Much more subtle, more elusive, is the suggestion of "Parsifal" that in more than one extended passage of the symphony can hardly fail to strike the listener fresh from a hearing of Wagner's solemn drama; but here, too, there is no question of plagiarism, beyond an assimiiation of the mood and the instrumental color that saturates the music. [The New York Times.

A DISSENTING VOICE

The symphony is rich in melody, the melody of one who says to himself, "Go to; I will contrive a multiplex message. It shall be a message of profound prolixity and intensely discursive sapiency." It is all that, and more. But as to "the greatest symphony since Brahms," let us not be too hasty with our loud Hosannas. Give us D'Indy or Bruckner or the martinet Mahler; for this music of Elgar's manufacture is more "tone-poem" in thought and in treatment than four-movement symphony. There are sections of transcendent beauty. Two middle parts of the second movement are of wonderful effectiveness. Part of the long-drawn adagio seemed to prophesy the real Elgar, the poet of virile melody. The last movement is grandiose, especially the coda. But, like all things grandiose, it sounds too big to be true.

The orchestration is of course done with a sure mastery. Elgar is too finished a craftsman to permit one detail to escape him. Elgar is of the moderns very modern; hence it naturally follows that the work is rich harmonically. It is bursting with melody, several melodies at a time, sensuous, strong, suggestive, platitudinous melodies. In these senses, the new symphony is an epic work. But as for striking a definite note, as for proclaiming a definite personality among symphonists, one racks his memory in vain for a single scrap of evidence. It was therefore a grievous disappointment. One went to the hall prepared for a soul-compelling performance of a new symphony. The orchestra [Mr. Damrosch's] did not compel. Neither did the symphony. Not that, like the Athenians, one goes only to hear some new thing; the music of this giant among latter-day composers has given proof of his great endowment before this year of grace. But one went to hear a master's voice in an expression of supreme wisdom, and heard platitudes. [The Chicago Record-Herald.

[140]

BOSTON POST,
SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1909

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 12th public rehearsal of the season by the Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Fiedler gave an individual and engrossing reading of Schubert's glorious symphony in C major. We make this general statement trustfully, courageously, for we heard some 30 measures of the andante on the wrong side of the entrance doors and the remaining two movements. Those 30 measures were moving more quickly than they usually do. There were drastic tonal contrasts, and the effect was highly dramatic.

It is generally conceded that the unfinished symphony in B minor stands at the head of Schubert's creations in this form. It is certainly more concise than the work heard yesterday, but consider the tremendous scale upon which the C major symphony is evolved, the colossal and inexhaustible ideas that fill the mighty mould.

Now there will probably be many to find objection to this reading, which wandered from the beaten track. We are thankful that we have not detailed knowledge of the wonderful and familiar symphony. Sometimes such knowledge is an encumbrance, for it is very liable to result in previously formed conceptions, and a set point of view is a deadly foe to appreciation of other ideas. Mr. Fiedler bore to us the message of that incomparable music. He struck the Olympic note. The famous Cs in the finale were as the stamping of a god. The horns are gloriously employed throughout the score, and they were permitted to show as much as possible. The whole work was bathed in glorious color. The rhythms bore one on upon a rushing stream of joy.

"The Harvest Festival," festival music in dance rhythms from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch," was played for the first time in Boston. The scoring is superlatively brilliant, the melodies and rhythms are pleasing. The music made a good impression, though it is primarily conceived as the accompaniment of a scene on the stage, hardly as a work for the concert room.

Then there was an estimable performance, though not, to our thinking, absolutely what Debussy would have desired, of that composer's marvellous, elusive and intangible "Afternoon of a Faun." Finally, Mr. Fiedler gave the best performance that has been heard here for years of Berlioz' flashing overture, "The Roman Carnival."

THE BOSTON TRAVELER,
SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1909

MUSICAL EVENTS

For next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Fiedler announces for the Symphony concerts the first performances in Boston of Sir Edward Elgar's new symphony in A flat. These concerts will also mark the first appearance in Boston of Miss Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist. She will play Saint-Saens concerto in G minor No. 2. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will close the concerts.

* * *

The fourth Symphony concert in Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, will be given next Thursday evening. The programme will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem "A Hero's Life." Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture and Saint-Saens concerto in G minor, the last-named marking the American debut of Miss Germaine Arnaud.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL
—MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1909

Symphony Season Is Now Half Over

Saturday's Symphony concert marked the end of the first half of the season. So far as the performance goes, the leading feature was Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." This strangely beautiful music was most effectively played. The audience enjoyed it greatly. There was also a novelty on the program, the "Harvest Festival" excerpt from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Judging by the perfunctory applause, it made but a slight impression. Evidently it was out of place. The other numbers were Schubert's famous seventh symphony and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which were played with rare spirit.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1909

Notes of the Day

The orchestral parts for Elgar's new symphony have failed to reach Boston in time for sufficient rehearsal for performance at the next pair of Symphony Concerts. Next Sunday, moreover, the orchestra departs for six concerts in the West and Mr. Fiedler has, therefore, to defer the preparation and the performance of Elgar's music until next month. He has made, accordingly, a new programme for the concerts of Friday and Saturday that keeps Weber's overture to "Euryanthe' and Saint-Saëns's concerto for piano in G miner, with Miss Arnaud for a new pianist, from the pieces already announced and replaces Elgar's symphony by Brahms's in F minor, and a new "Overture to a Comedy by Shakspeare" by a young German composer, Schweinpflug.

[illegible] DAILY ADVERTISER,
SATURDAY MORNING,
JANUARY 16, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT WHOLLY ORCHESTRAL

EFFECTIVE PERFORMANCE OF SCHUBERT'S C SYMPHONY

Schillings, Debussy and Berlioz Also Contribute to the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert—Symphony in C.
Schillings—"The Harvest Festival."
Debussy—Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Berlioz—"Roman Carnival Overture."

Dvorak, some time ago, wrote in an American Magazine that Schubert was greatest in his instrumental works. It was, we think, an entirely false estimate. Schubert thought vocally and his instrumental works are merely transcriptions of various phases of song. Beautiful melodies, effective contrasts, symmetry of themes are there, but not that development that keeps a large work constantly interesting.

A symphony should be a perfect blending of the melodic and emotional on one hand, and the intellectual on the other. Made up entirely of the first two elements it will pall. Therefore we felt less attracted to Schubert's largest symphony than we had been in previous years. Yet it is well to hear it occasionally. A new generation of concert-goers is growing up and to them the work comes with most attractive freshness, and they are probably ready to vociferously contradict the older critic who has watched some portions of the great symphony grow threadbare.

This fading process is found chiefly in the first two movements. The second might be much benefited by an application of the blue pencil; it requires several amputations to restore its vigor. We of the 20th century are not as patient of repeats as they were at the beginning of the 19th. Mr. Fiedler omitted the first repeat of the work but more "cuts" are necessary, in both movements.

The third movement, however, remains throughout attractive. It is one of the most genial of scherzos and it has a beauty of melody that wears better than the gypsy theme which eternally bubbles up in the Andante. The trio here is the finest part of the work. It received an exceptionally fine reading, but it was scarcely necessary to observe all its repeat marks. The finale, too, with its powerful four strokes (were they copied from the four accents of the chief figure of Beethoven's violin concerto?) is still an exciting bit of composition and it was played with a vigor that drove its points well home.

The performance was very effective. When one remembers that the Viennese Orchestra shelved this work because it was "too difficult," one realizes the advances made in orchestral technique since the classical epoch. The resolute trombone passages in the coda of the first movement sounded as fiery as ever, and the violins dashed through the chief theme of the finale with clearness in spite of the lightning speed taken. One must also chronicle the excellent work of the oboes in the chief theme of the Andante and the perfect ensemble of the great crescendos and diminuendos of the finale. Altogether, then, an excellent performance.

Schillings' "Harvest Festival" was a picture of a merrymaking in ancient Thule. If the old Thulians had "harvest-homes" like that we imagine that they planted bombs and reaped explosions. The music seemed inflated and not very full of ideas in spite of some very skillful orchestration. We hope that Schillings will not imitate the example of the bad penny of the proverb.

From this the programme swept to the opposite extreme and gave the ultra-delicacy of Debussy's Faun. We have now passed several afternoons with this party and have not become reconciled to his melancholy yet. It is an over-refined picture of a mood into which we cannot enter. This may be our misfortune; the noisy minority, who always force the applause when Debussy is played, will undoubtedly think so. They recalled the conductor at the end of the work and he caused the orchestra to rise as accessories in the matter. The careful performance deserved the tribute.

Then came a totally different French school. We do not think Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture one of his strongest works, but it is at least tangible and intelligible. There is some melancholy in this work also, which was finely expressed on the English horn, but this sadness was made into an excellent foil to the hilarity of the Carnival, and the Saltarello was played with much animation.

Yet we have had better performances of this overture. There was a certain forcing of the pace that took away the natural gaiety of the work. It was rather vehement than light-hearted.

At the next concert we are promised the much-discussed new symphony of Sir Edward Elgar. No one can accuse our conductor of not being sufficiently modern. The first half of the season is now over and he has given us as much of the modern school as any conductor of them all. He has also proved himself a careful conservator of the technical excellence of our orchestra—a most important matter, since even the German music journals begin to acknowledge that Boston possesses the "best orchestra of the world."

Mr. Fiedler makes an interesting announcement that on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will give the first performances in Boston of Sir Edward Elgar's new symphony in A-Flat, a work which has been creating something more than a sensation in England and has aroused considerable interest where it has been played in America.

Another interesting feature of the concert will be the first appearance in Boston of Miss Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, who has been making such a stir during the past 18 months in France and parts of Germany.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 17, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Echoes of Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

People's Choral Union Tonight —Geraldine Farrar Coming.

Interesting Recitals of the Current Week.

No soloist appeared at the 12th Symphony rehearsal and concert, the orchestra having things its own way in the following program: Symphony in C major, Schubert; "Harvest Festival," from Schilling's opera, "Moloch," first time in Boston; Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz. Schilling's work was the only novelty, a somewhat heavy piece largely in dancing rhythm with once in awhile a note of joyousness suggesting merriment of the dancers, but not specially typical of festive scenes. Unanimity of performance resulting in the usual standard of ensemble playing by the men made the piece effective, even though there was not anything of particular interest to the auditor.

Schubert's symphony is such a glorious composition that the first part of the program really overshadowed the second part. One composer against three, and the one won. From the horn passages in the first movement, through the march themes of the second, the pathos and humor of the trio and scherzo and the brilliant finale, the work of the orchestra was as lucid and expressive as one could desire.

In the first part brasses and woodwinds were in beautiful harmony, and all the complicated "conversations" and elaborated repetitions of the second movement were admirably voiced by the different choirs. The charming scherzo and the trio, with its tinge of melancholy, were each given with fine effect. The well-known "four notes" oft repeated were impressively introduced and the strings managed their terribly difficult score with commendable smoothness. All in all the finale was a notable performance.

"The Afternoon of a Faun" gave the flutist, Mr Maquarra, a chance to reveal an exquisite tone and with his fellow players to set forth the languorous and dainty moods of Debussy's idyl in delightful tonal colors. The Berlioz overture was given with the energy and variety necessary to characterize the ideas of the composer.

This week the orchestra will give the first performances in Boston of Sir Edward Elgar's new symphony in A-flat, a work which has been creating a sensation in England and has aroused considerable interest where it has been played in America.

Another interesting feature will be the first appearance in Boston of Miss Germaine Arnaud, a French pianist, about 18 years old, who will play Saint-Saens' G minor concerto. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will close the program.

Fourth Cambridge Symphony.

The fourth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. On account of the reception to Pres Eliot, which is to be that evening, following the concert, the length of the program will be limited to one hour and a half so that the concert will be ended by 9:30 o'clock.

The program will comprise "A Hero's Life," by Richard Strauss; overture of Weber's "Der Freischutz" and Saint-Saens' G-minor piano concerto, with the French pianist, Miss Germaine Arnaud as soloist. Miss Arnaud will make her American debut at this concert.

Paderewski Coming.

Paderewski sails from England on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse next Wednesday and is due to arrive in New York Tuesday, Jan 26. His stay in this country this year is limited to a few weeks, although the enormous demands made for concerts have made it necessary for him to stay longer than he at first intended. His first concert of the present tour will be in Waterbury, Conn, Jan 28; Jan 30 he will play at Newark, N J; Feb 2, New York; Feb 3, Philadelphia; Feb 4, Washington, and Saturday, Feb 6, in Symphony hall. Tickets are on sale.

The Bonci Concert.

A concert of more than ordinary interest will be given in Symphony hall Tuesday afternoon, Feb 9, by a quartet of opera singers from the Metropolitan opera house of New York, headed by Alessandro Bonci, who shares with Caruso the first honors of modern tenors. The other members of the quartet are Marie Rappold, the soprano, who was heard here with the Symphony orchestra some weeks ago; Marianne Flahaut, a French mezzo soprano, and Herbert Witherspoon, American basso, who this year for the first time has been appearing in opera in New York. The tickets will go on sale Feb 3, but mail orders may now be sent to L. H. Mudgett, Symphony hall.

[141]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW LAMPS FOR OLD, BRAHMS AS MAGICIAN

The Discreet Conjuring of His F Major Symphony and the Music of Impassioned Scholarship—Its Symbolic Qualities—A Familiar Concerto of Saint-Saens and a Pianist of a Type New to These Concerts—The Unusual Impression She Created, Together with a Few Reasons Why It Could Not Be Safely Duplicated—A Piano Concerto in the Vein of Impersonation—An Old Overture and a New

A programme which declared a multitude of texts, mostly romantic, was furnished at the thirteenth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Curiosity was piqued by a new name affixed to an overture for an unspecified comedy of Shakspeare; further range for conjecture, especially as the piece bore the parenthesis of "first time in America." It was an afternoon of music in which more is meant than meets the ear. Saint-Saëns's concerto, from being interpreted turned interpreter. It was a season of odd inversions—a strange pianist and a familiar concerto, an old symphony uttering old truths a new way, transfigured by ardent players and impassioned leadership to meanings much wider than those of pure music, even with the purity of Brahms. The symphony became a metaphor. There remained, to conclude, Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe," at its familiar task of vitalizing the rattling wooden Byronism of its period. In detail, then, the programme was:

Scheinpflug: Overture to a Comedy of Shakspeare (with use of an old English melody of the sixteenth century) for full orchestra, Op. 15.
First time in America.
Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 22.
Weber: Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe."

The wide range of reference which lurked in this performance of Brahms's symphony can best be gathered by going outside of music for a start. And this is fair, for the music went outside itself. All artists and all arts pause at some turning of the path between the forks of the old and the new. Scholarship to one is a vital issue; nothing of lasting value, he holds, can be accomplished without it; to another it is a burden of dusty tomes; it is a blazed trail or a vexatious thicket. The whole dilemma was once tersely stated in an odd letter from Grimm to Emerson in which he complains that to know the valuable portion of what has already been produced requires the best part of a man's productive years. The application of this is readily seen upon recalling the youthful Brahms who scorned universities and the mature Brahms who celebrated academics in a special work. The ideal, a union between scholarship and imagination, seems to be beyond even most of the "shining ones." But this modest youth, heralded by Schumann like another Baptist, was endowed with a kind of clairvoyance by which he digested and assimilated the vast bulk of what had gone before, made it his own, and reared his work upon it in the relation of figure to pedestal. This feat is the badge of intellect. Mere lyric rapture smothers or surrenders in the press of traditional forms. Long before the inception of his third symphony, then, Brahms had outgrown his apostasy and thought as a man and understood as a man. His passion for expression was fiery as ever, but his reverence for the old models exercised a firm controlling power. This lofty and rarified music was played by the orchestra as by a company of impassioned scholars—if such a thing can be imagined. The band enunciated, both as a unit and by groups, its unique and vivid phraseology—unsuspected timbres as of some instrument not yet invented, deep commotions of 'cellos and wood wind, melodies in sober ecstasy, and the haunting horn call of three chords, repeated throughout the first movement with an odd insistence. Both the playing and the conducting expressed what the symphony expresses, a quiet man deeply moved. Rarely, while Mr. Fiedler has sojourned in Boston, has a symphony given such a summons to his ripest qualities as a leader. Here was no marshalling of bold contrast, or forcing of effect, but a fineness and firmness of judgment which assigned to each nuance its due emphasis. This score of surprisingly sparse notation, for pages apparently little more than a duet of wood wind and strings, expressing itself to exact shades of meaning, intricate and orderly, was taken for exactly what it is—an impassioned paradigm. Great actors have recited alphabets in strange tongues and moved their audiences to tears. The parallel fails because Brahms dealt in terms more complex than an alphabet. But his symphony and its structure have the same elements of the simple and the arbitrary. Its restatement of orchestral truisms in novel forms, its skimming chromatic runs, sharp but edgeless in their clarity; its choirs of hymning wood wind; its subtle orchestral colorings, show the hand of a draughtsman who left vast omissions without vacancies. Whether he works with a sculptor's chisel, as in the heroic proportions of the finale, or in the Andante, where he turns his hand to the minute reliefs of a medal, there is the same chastity of design. As the work was conceived so it was played at Mr. Fiedler's behest, with a kind of intellectual passion. Brahms began where his predecessors left off, and carried on the torch. It has seldom burned more brightly than it burned yesterday afternoon, fanned to a steady glow by the sober enthusiasm of Mr. Fiedler and his players.

The next, by every token, was a portent. Most of those in Symphony Hall had heard at one time or another Saint-Saëns's piano concerto in G minor, knew its polish and glitter as they knew the high polish and black glitter of the instrument which shouldered in among the players on the platform. Not so many seasons ago its voluble fleetness had been heard from the same station at the hands of the composer himself. The deep-throated prologue, the lilt of the merro allegro scherzando, and the finale alternating trills and triplets were tolerably familiar matters. What, then, had Miss Arnaud to utter in this brilliant and tricky medium? Those who went predisposed to hear a conservatory graduate of some distinction heard something quite different and considerably more—just what it requires some qualification to declare. The first movement was uneven. Miss Arnaud was plainly asked to talk in an alien tongue. The result was that she could see in part and prophesy in part. When her hands swept the treble the instrument throbbed and sung with the joy and freshness of birds in a shower, and with much the same quality of tone, evoken by that singular deftness of a feminine touch. But the excursions into the instrument's bass bore corresponding resemblance to that shower when it strikes the dusty road. The pianist was here in the enemy's country, and fortunately for the balance of her performance these excursions were brief, infrequent and confined almost wholly to the first movement. For the flash and sparkle of the two remaining movements called for no such masculine sonority. It was thus that the soloist found her true voice in the matchless scherzo. Her playing became impersonation. Its irresistible rhythms, now shy, coy, modest or hoydenish, laughed like the chatter of a maidenly frolic. Up went its serpentines in spouts of holiday fire—the white fire of Saint-Saëns, which gives out radiance without sultriness. Up went its spirals, tuneful as larks. Still in the finale Saint-Saëns was the songster—in the triplet roulades which advance the themes; in the warble of trills which the pianist rippled off her nimble finger tips, while the wind choir drowsed and droned woodsy noises. Her appearance at a concert of these proportions partook of the nature of an experiment. Such experiments, on frequent repetition, are likely to prove detrimental. It is equally certain that Miss Arnaud was either wise or lucky in her choice of a concerto. It would be idle as well as unjust to pretend that she has attained any thing like her full stature of artistry. It befell yesterday afternoon that, in a concerto happily attuned to her range and endowments, and accorded a chivalrous deference by the band, she started thrills of surprise and delight. She left her audience pounding its palms with a general smile, and it was good to see the players beam paternally on her reappearances as they whacked the backs of their instruments. Hitherto no one had suspected that Saint-Saëns could be so jaunty.

The formal novelty of the afternoon, Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakspeare," gave challenge by its venture of heavy instrumentation on a thin old English melody. If the overture is to remain Elizabethan in spirit, the scoring of Strauss and Mahler hints the anachronism. The work, for its first half, hugs its principal rhythm with some anxiety. When this is finally cast off the synthesis seems to have departed. English tune and chief theme of the introduction reappear, but in structure which is less architectural than stratified. Its chief virtue is that of dominant, if interrupted, melody. Again and again the voice of the orchestra bursts into lusty song which does suggest the bluff jollity of the crew in doublet and hose. If the overture is to match edges with Shakspeare, however, it must be with the Shakspeare of early work—preferably "Taming of the Shrew."

For the end came the overture to "Euryanthe," which it is the custom to lament as the well-preserved portico to a mansion fallen into decay because the contractor was dishonest, or, which is the same thing, the librettist nodded. But on its romantic side alone this overture has enough individual character to commend itself to the programmes of the future. For a musical restatement of that romanticism of the supernatural which ran riot in the beginning of the last century, which is responsible for the worst of Byron and the best of Scott, we shall probably continue to turn these pages. They sublimate its melodrama and vitalize its crude symbols. There is little prospect of shelving Weber while he so persistently refuses to be shelved.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1909

GIRL PIANIST AT SYMPHONY

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Germaine Arnaud, pianist of 17 or thereabouts, who has been making herself known in Europe since she took the first prize for piano playing at the Paris Conservatoire in 1907, made her debut in this city at the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Miss Arnaud played the Saint-Saens G minor concerto with elegance and swiftness and authority, with not a little of the fire of the conquering and experienced virtuoso as she sped over the keys.

She has accomplished much, and there is much that she will yet accomplish. Her frank, though demure, enjoyment of her own playing and the applause that it roused was not the least pleasurable feature of the performance.

She played her prelude with breadth and sure conviction, and, in fact, her conception of the work as a whole was admirably free-from preponderance of detail.

She had always the main structure of the concerto in mind, and her attention to it was never distracted by passing episodes or taxing difficulties which often demanded every ounce of her ability.

Miss Arnaud has the requisite fleetness and elegance of technique, so requisite for the middle movement.

This young lady took the finale at a pace nearly twice as fast as that taken by the composer himself, when he played the concerto here three years ago; but her guardian angel was on hand, she emerged, triumphant, though rather breathless. She had often been compelled to hammer, to force tone, but her enthusiasm, tempered by presence of mind, had carried the day, and there was loud applause.

Play Scheinpflug's Overture

An overture to a Shaksperian comedy, by Scheinpflug, a young German, hitherto unhonored and unsung in Boston, was played for the first time here. The composer uses his orchestra with taste and with brilliance.

We are not informed as to which comedy he had in mind.

Among some of those present there was contention as to the likelihood of its being "Much Ado About Nothing" or "Love's Labor Lost." There is humor and there is lightness of mood, but this is usually a trifle manufactured.

Like the man who saw things, Scheinpflug is most humorous when he does not make a special point of being so. We shall remember the piece chiefly for its sparkling instrumentation.

The greatest moments of the afternoon were provided by Mr. Fiedler when he read the F major Symphony of Brahms. Then, indeed, it was not difficult to understand Hans Richter's thought when he dubbed this symphony "Heroic," yet in the two following sections there is the tranquillity, the impersonal, pitying philosophy of the later Brahms. And in the finale—how big—there is the invigorating sensation as of great heights, and clean, wide spaces, and Homeric laughter. Mr. Fiedler's performance revealed the spirit of the music as it has seldom been revealed.

The same cannot be said for the viciously modernized version of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

But it was in the Scherzo that Mlle. Arnaud was at her very best. No one could have made more of the piquancy and the delicacy of this movement. She was well seconded by the orchestra and the result was a Scherzo that ought to be long remembered.

The Finale has less to say for itself intrinsically, but is also hampered by coming after such a perfect movement. It comes in the nature of an anticlimax. Nevertheless, Mlle Arnaud carried it to success, and the young miss was recalled with much enthusiasm three times.

The concert ended with a very fiery performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. It may have seemed a trifle overdrawn in the very soft passages, but Weber demands just this treatment. He was of the theatre, and something of the odor of the footlights is permissible in his music where it would be out of place in the works of another composer. The abandon and dash of the work was recognized by the audience and was most heartily and deservedly applauded.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
SATURDAY MORNING
JANUARY 23, 1909

GIRL PIANIST AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS ARNAUD SHOWS HERSELF GREAT ARTIST

Success of Brahms' Third Symphony—A New Overture Produced; Also Weber's "Euryanthe."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Scheinpflug—Overture to a Shakespeare Comedy.
Brahms—Symphony in F.
St. Saens—G minor Concerto, for Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Miss Germaine Arnaud.
Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."

By an error of type, the Programme-book stated that Scheinpflug was born in 2872. This might account for his composing Music of the Future. But, as a matter of fact, although he used a thoroughly modern orchestra, he drew no essentially modern effects from it and he was more melodic than most members of the new school. To what play is this an overture? The composer gives no clue. One might sarcastically say,—"Much Ado About Nothing," but it would be fairer to find in its light and chattering style a reflection of the "Merry Wives of Windsor," which has already inspired much music. In fact one could find a few reminiscences of Nicolai's overture to that opera in the present work.

Scheinpflug is more accurate than Volkmann in his introduction of ancient English melody into overture. Volkmann uses a Scottish melody ("The Campbells are Comin'") as an English tune, at the battle of Bosworth, a full century before the music was in existence. But Scheinpflug uses an old Allemande, from the famous Virginal Book, which is preserved in the Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge, England. It is a composition of Giles Farnaby, characteristic and tuneful. It was in good taste also to give the tune on two English horns, for the English horn is really of English descent, and such dances were often played on the wooden Shepherd's pipes which originated the instrument.

The tune is well developed through the overture, especially towards the end. There are quaint bassoonings that recall Brahms's excellent treatment of the student's song, "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh," in his Academic Overture. The Glockenspiel solo at the very end is not in good taste, but the work as a whole is a good addition to the modern repertoire.

Brahms's Third symphony is well suited to the middle of a programme, since its end is not of the epic symphonic style. It is a glorious work from first to last. The Andante starts out with an exquisite theme, but its promise is not entirely fulfilled, and this is the only labored movement in the symphony. The second theme of the first movement is one of those calm and serene bits of melody that only Bach and Brahms seemed able to achieve. If ever the line "Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright," were set to music, it would be to something like this.

But every movement of this great work displays surety and power. Here are no experiments, no strivings after the unattainable, but a display of the noblest poetic thought combined with the clearest musical logic. And Mr. Fiedler's reading was masterly and the performance a delight to every musical auditor.

The precocity of artists in this present epoch is remarkable. We are not yet over our astonishment at young Elman giving a difficult concerto at these concerts when there comes a slender young French maiden and gives a piano performance that puts her among the great artists of her genre. By and bye, if this goes on, there will be concertos in the nursery, and babes will play themselves to sleep with Chopin's "Berceuse."

Miss Germaine Arnaud needs no concessions on account of her youth. She is 17 and she plays St. Saens second concerto much better than that master played it at 71, a couple of years ago. She gave a massive force to the first movement that was virile enough, and her cadenza work in this was full of brilliancy. Her octave and chord playing was sturdy enough to indicate wrists of steel, and in every part of this movement she showed a full comprehension of the composer's thought and an ability to interpret it. This first movement has the fault that it is too full of display of the soloist, it becomes a piano solo with an obliging orchestra in the background.

[142]

THE SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, JANUARY 24, 1909.

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER LEADS 13TH CONCERT

Shakespearean Overture by Scheinpflug Played by Boston Symphony.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 13th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Germaine Arnaud, pianist, played for the first time in Boston. The program was as follows:

Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare ..... Scheinpflug
Symphony No. 3 ..... Brahms
Concerto in G minor, No. 2 ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber

Scheinpflug, a Saxon by birth, now about 34 years old and living at Bremen, is unknown to the great majority in this country, yet he has written a few works that have given him an honorable name in the list of younger German composers. The overture, performed last night for the first time here and probably for the first time in America, is entitled as a prelude to a comedy of Shakespeare. There is no closer identification of its intention. Some may think that a certain deliberately ponderous episode is a reference to Falstaff, but this would be only a rash surmise. Any composer who names his overture a prelude to "As You Like It," "Love's Labor Lost" or "Much Ado About Nothing" runs the risk of a flippant and disparaging jest.

Scheinpflug is a modern of the moderns and he demands a full modern orchestra—one with even two English horns—for the expression of his musical ideas. He furthermore went back to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book to find an English tune of the 16th century that he might introduce it as one of his themes. This fact should not lead any one to infer that his own thematic invention is weak or halting. His motives have character, and they are not painfully thought out merely for subsequent combination in development.

This overture has buoyancy and sparkle, though a few of the pages are heavily scored. The development of the themes is not forced, and the polyphonic treatment seems natural and not an example of severe scholastic labor. The style has individuality, though there are a few traces of the influence of Richard Strauss. All in all, the overture interested and gave the hearer a desire for further acquaintance with the composer.

The third symphony of Brahms is one of the finest of his compositions. It is characterized by the sturdiness, the granitic force, the elemental rhythmic sweep, the peculiar and not displeasing melancholy that are associated with his nobler works, and there is also true melodic simplicity that gives delight by its frank appeal. The first movement and the third are perhaps the most genial sections of the work, genial in both the German and the English meanings of the word, but there is much that is beautiful in the second movement, and the close of the symphony, with the appearance for a moment of "the ghost of the first motive," as Mr. Apthorp happily called it, is a stroke of genius.

The symphony was read with imagination and warm sympathy for the most part. Perhaps in the second movement the melodic speech was too articulate, perhaps the sentiment was too much insisted on, so that Brahms for once was almost sentimental. But the performance as a whole was warm and glowing, and that of the first movement was appropriately dramatic.

Miss Germaine Arnaud, a pianist who is now in her 18th year, gave an extraordinarily brilliant performance of Saint-Saens' familiar concerto. Going from Bordeaux to Paris, she studied at the conservatory of the latter city, and in 1905 was awarded a first prize. She is remarkable first of all in this; that, although she is comparatively fresh from the school, she does not play with the exasperating precision of a prize pupil. She has freedom and elasticity. She also has an emotional nature, which, in a concerto that is seldom inherently emotional and then only in an elegant manner—for Saint-Saens is always a man "comme il faut"—nevertheless made itself felt.

Her mechanism is highly developed. Her scale passages for fleetness, fulness and richness of color or crystalline purity are a delight. There is no suggestion in her bravura of cloudiness or unsteadiness. She has great strength, which is employed musically, for last night tone was never forced, and in her heaviest chord-playing there was the virility that gives the suggestion of reserve force. She has nuances, not only a fortissimo and a piano, at her command. These nuances are finely graded and she has the ability to shape gradations when she is going at full speed.

In melodic passages she sings the phrase, and she has the art of giving meaning and vitality to measures that often, as played by others, seem more or less agreeable padding. She rises in aesthetic dignity when the music itself has nobility, as in the superb opening and exposition of the first theme. Ornamentation, as played by her, is not something extraneous and showy, but that which is natural and significant. She displayed last night an admirable sense of proportion and genuine musical comprehension.

Let it be added that she has a sympathetic, winning personality; that she plays with delightful self-unconsciousness, and that she is modest and charming in her acknowledgment of applause. Her success last night was instantaneous and unusual.

om .....
dress .....
te .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Baltimore concert to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, February 17. This will be his only appearance in Baltimore this year. Prices will be advanced.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
JANUARY 24, 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Young French Pianist Symphony Soloist.

Recitals of the Week Include Two by Dr Wullner.

Czerwonky Quartet—Other Events of Interest.

For the second time this season, Symphony patrons have been pleasantly surprised by the playing of artists yet in their teens whose performances abroad have been heralded in fulsome praises. Many of the so-called wonders have not justified their reputations when heard here; but Mischa Elman's fame was deserved, and at last week's Symphony concerts the young pianist, Miss Germaine Arnaud, a French girl, created great enthusiasm by her splendid performances of Saint-Saens' second piano concerto. Miss Arnaud made her American debut last Thursday evening with the Symphony orchestra at Cambridge.

Another agreeable feature was an overture by Paul Cheinpflug, played for the first time in this country. The other selections were the third Brahms symphony and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Elgar's new symphony had been announced, but owing to the impossibility of securing the orchestral parts in time, Mr Fiedler rearranged the program, and will give the new work later.

The concerto gives great prominence to the piano part, as if Saint-Saens, being a pianist, had considered that instrument first and made the orchestral support secondary. The girlish figure at the piano did not seem able to cope with the physical difficulties of the long score; but she did succeed admirably in this respect and in the technical part her performance was of a nature to warrant encomiums and justify the tumultuous applause.

She opened the first movement with a confidence that presaged an interesting performance, at least, for the introductory cadenza was given with commendable vigor and led up to brilliant and crisp finger work. In the accelerated passages the increase in speed did not impair the clarity of tone and the furious arpeggios and octave runs but slightly lacked the force of a male hand.

And this 17-year-old artist showed dainty and nimble fingering in the scherzo-like second movement, in which delicacy of touch and execution is mainly required. The trills and other figurations of the finale were equally charming, the coda winding up in a dashing bit of pianistic pyrotechnics.

Scheinpflug's overture is deliciously quaint in many instances, his arrangements of wood winds being musically humorous and the whole work one of joyous moods and suggestions. It may be written in a Shaksperian vein, or may not, but it is thoroughly pleasing and is not so lofty and modern in orchestration as to be above the comprehension of the average music lover. The wood-wind choir did its work perfectly and the orchestra as a whole was up to its usual standard.

Mr Fielder conducted the Brahms symphony along traditional lines, with the necessary vigor in the first and parts of the last movement, and held his men to unity of purpose through the intricacies and numerous transitions in the second part. In the third movement the playing by the lighter string contingents was specially enjoyable after so much of a somber nature had been heard in the earlier part of the symphony.

The orchestral association with the solo pianist was inspiring, so sure and perfect was the support, and in the Weber overture the sentiments were lucidly set forth, as usual and none of the fortissimo passages lost in force under the impetus suggested by Mr Fiedler's baton.

The orchestra will be away this week on its western trip. The first part of next week's program will be commemmorative of Mendelssohn's birthday, Feb 3, 1809, and the selections will be the overture, "'Fingal's Cave"; Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Scotch symphony. The Strauss tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will close the program.

Paderewski's Recital.

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday, having sailed from England last Wednesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. It was his original intention to play but 20 times in this country, eight times with the Boston Symphony, twice with the Chicago orchestra and once each with the Minneapolis and St Paul orchestras, and limit himself to eight recitals in the larger cities of the east.

This plan, however, has been changed considerably owing to the demand for concerts by him and he will now be in America until the first of April and play about 40 times. His only recital in Boston will be given in Symphony hall

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1909.

MUSICAL EVENTS

Symphony Hall was filled Saturday afternoon with enthusiastic listeners and the singing of Miss Geraldine Farrar, who, in two selections—from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Tannhauser"—had the accompaniment of a large body of Symphony Orchestra players. She gave also two groups of songs with piano accompaniment and to the greatest delight of her auditors she added to the liberal encore favors she showed them the singing of "Annie Laurie" and another song to her own piano playing. The orchestra was heard in familiar classic numbers. Miss Farrar's personal triumph was notable and her singing evidently pleased. Arthur Rosenstein was at the piano.

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York tomorrow, having sailed from England last Wednesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. It was his original intention to play but 20 times in this country, eight times with the Boston Symphony, twice with the Chicago orchestra and once each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras, and limit himself to eight recitals in the larger cities of the east. This plan, however, has been changed considerably owing to the demand for concerts by him and he will now be in America until the first of April and play about 40 times.

It is his purpose to give not more than one recital in each city and his only recital in Boston will be given in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 6. Later in the season he will play with the Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which is to be given in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 9, by the Metropolitan Opera House quartet promises to be one of the most attractive affairs of the winter. It will be in the nature of an old-fashioned operatic concert, for all the selections to be sung will be from standard operas. Such concerts as these have seemed somewhat to go out of fashion in recent years, yet there is no doubt that when the singers are of first quality the public likes nothing better than such a programme as will be presented at this concert.

The Symphony Orchestra left last evening for its annual tour in the Middle West. Monday night it plays in Buffalo with Mischa Elman as soloist; Tuesday night in Detroit without soloist, Wednesday night in Cleveland without soloist, Thursday night in Indianapolis with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist, Friday night in Columbus without soloist, and Saturday night in Rochester with Mischa Elman again as soloist. From Rochester it returns directly to Boston arriving a week from tomorrow.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Absent Orchestra—Dr. Wuellner's Recitals—Mr. Czerwonky Again—Mr. and Mrs. Mannes and Sonatas

For a third year the Symphony Orchestra is to devote a week to concerts in cities of the Middle West and in cities along the way thither. The band leaves Boston on Sunday night, and plays in Buffalo on Monday, in Detroit on Tuesday, in Cleveland on Wednesday, in Indianapolis on Thursday, and then, turning eastward again, in Columbus on Friday and in Rochester on Saturday, travelling thence direct to Boston. Mr. Fiedler will conduct at all six of the concerts; Mischa Elman, the violinist, will play with the orchestra in Buffalo and in Rochester, and Mr. Hess, from its own ranks, in Indianapolis. Needless almost to say, there will thus be no concerts by the orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday of next week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....
ddress .....
ate .....

Mischa Elman, the young Russian ist, is to be the soloist with the L Symphony Orchestra when that famous organization pays its annual visit to Buffalo on Monday evening, January 25th, so its manager, C. A. Ellis, announced by telegraph yesterday to Mrs. Mal Davis Smith, the local manager, and the announcement has created a sensation.

Elman's career has been meteoric in a century rich in sensations. He is only eighteen, but at fourteen he had conquered Europe. He came to America a few weeks ago and after his first recital New York bowed down before him. The first day of a seat sale ends with a sold out house when Elman plays in New York. In Boston the story is the same and now he will give Buffalo a glimpse of his art, which is matchless. The son of Russian peasantry, Elman at four years old was playing the violin. He wrests from it today every bit of melody, of passion and of beauty that the instrument can produce.

Under Max Fieldler's baton, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Convention Hall will be a great musical event in the season's history. The program will be announced within a few days.

[143]

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ROCHESTER, N.Y.

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra to Play at Convention Hall Three Weeks From To Night—Secret of Its Success.

One of the chief factors which make for the supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not only in this country but abroad, is the length of service of its members, showing that there has been a minimum of changes in its personnel. An orchestra is a most highly strung organism. To gain its best ideals, its members must be not merely accomplished musicians, but they must have that musical sympathy with each other which comes only through long association. An orchestra that is constantly changing its membership cannot hope to attain the highest standards that an orchestra does which preserves the same members, retiring only those whom age has made unable to keep the pace.

This year the Boston Symphony Orchestra began to pay pensions to thirteen of its former members who had been retired from the orchestra for one reason or another. Before a member of the orchestra becomes eligible to a pension he must have been in its ranks for ten years. Retiring after ten years' service he receives a minimum pension, the pension increasing up to twenty-five years of service, which is the maximum pension. The moneys for the pension fund are raised in three ways: by annual assessment on the members of the orchestra; by the receipts from two special concerts given each winter by the orchestra in Symphony Hall, and by gifts made to the fund by friends of the orchestra.

Some rather interesting statistics were brought out recently regarding the membership of the orchestra. The number of musicians employed is ninety-seven. Of these eighty have been in the orchestra to-day who were in it when it was organized twenty-eight years ago. They are Paul H. Fox, flute; J. Akeroyd, second violin, and Daniel Kuntz, first violin. The average length of service for these eighty men who have been in the orchestra four years or more is just less than sixteen and one-half years. The three named men have been in the orchestra since its organization. Two have been in the orchestra twenty-seven years; three twenty-six years; seven twenty-four years; three twenty-three years; four twenty-two years; one twenty-one years; one twenty years; five nineteen years; five eighteen years; one seventeen years; six fifteen years; two fourteen years; three thirteen years; one twelve years; six eleven years; four nine years; four eight years; one seven years; two six years; two five years. The greatest changes in the orchestra were made in the fall of 1907 when Dr. Muck brought quite a number of new men from abroad to take the place of some who were retired on account of age. It is certain that no orchestra in this country, and it is doubtful whether any orchestra in any country can show a table to compare with this.

The only appearance of the orchestra in Rochester will be in Convention Hall Saturday evening, January 30th.

NEWS

JAN 10 1909

It would seem as if it were privilege enough to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra alone for its long-anticipated Buffalo concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 25, but when this is coupled with the announcement that the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist who has been the musical sensation in America this winter, the completeness of perfection is attained.

Mischa Elman is only 18. At 5 he was playing with an orchestra. At 14 he was touring Europe and had a continent at his feet. The American newspapers were full of his triumphs, but even then Elman refused to be criticised as a prodigy. "I am Mischa Elman, a violinist," he said sturdily, and he was judged for his art without counting his youth. This all happened four years ago. It is only a few weeks since he crossed the Atlantic and made his debut in the New World, which he conquered in a night with his opening recital in New York.

The Boston Transcript, in a lengthy review of Elman's first appearance in that city, says of him: "Caesar Thomson gains the beauty of his tone seemingly by a kind of devilish ingenuity. Yeaye achieves it by the amplitude of his power. Kreisler accomplishes it by an exquisite sensitiveness. With Mr. Elman the means are pure passion for the beauty, the range, the poignancy, the richness, the endless coloring of the voice of the violin. As some will have it, as Balzac himself had it, there are spirits imprisoned in these strained and fretted and varnished shells. If it be so, not one of them might resist such passion as that with which Mr. Elman plies or persuades, goads or woos them to voice."

Within a few days, Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will announce the program for the Buffalo concert, which will probably include, in response to many requests, the pathetic symphony of Tschaikowsky, which has attracted so much attention from Mr. Fiedler's wonderful interpretation.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is receiving mail orders for seats, when accompanied by check addressed to her at 26 Irving Place. Prices are [illegible]. First 16 rows, $2; next 15 rows, [illegible] rest of house, including balcony, 75 cents.

COURIER

JAN 14 1909

The news of Mischa Elman's coming to Buffalo as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 25th created a sensation when announced yesterday in The Courier. The young Russian violinist is the musical idol of the year in America. He arrived in New York a few weeks ago, widely heralded as Europe's greatest sensation. He gave his opening recital before a house thronged with the curious and expectant, and before his first number was half over he had every man and woman in the vast assemblage at his feet. Now, when an Elman seat sale is announced in New York the line does not break until the house is entirely sold.

From New York Elman went to Boston, where, a fortnight ago, he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and not in long memories have such notices been accorded any artist. "Mischa Elman's playing is the product of pure passion," writes the critic of the Transcript, "passion for his violin, passion for its range and resource, passion for its beauty and power of voice, passion for its music, for the exact recreation of it and for the completest and most communicative expression of all that it contains. Twenty passions, perhaps, shape and vitalize his playing, but the deepest, the fullest, the most commanding of them all is the passion for the uttermost and the irresistible expression. Into him, young as he is, has entered the consuming passion for expression—of himself, his medium, his material."

Elman is only eighteen. Four years ago he conquered Europe, refusing even in those boyish days to be counted a prodigy. "I am Elman, a violinist," he said proudly, and he was judged by his work, not by his youth. At eighteen he has come over to conquer America and he has done it every step of the way, making his audience bow down before his matchless art and pay homage to his message.

Within a few days Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will announce the programme to be played at Convention Hall on the night of January 25th. It is probable however, that the symphony will be the famous Tschaikowsky Pathetic, for which there have been an overwhelming number of requests, probably because of the remarkable playing of this by the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's baton, which has been the subject for extended notice in the leading magazines and periodicals of the day.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, is receiving mail orders for seats, which are filled in the order of their receipt. Accompanied by check, they may be sent to her at No. 26 Irving Place. The price for the first sixteen rows is $2, for the next fifteen $1.50, for the next fifteen $1, while the balance of the house, including the balcony, is listed at 75 cents.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

Paderewski and the Boston Orchestra.

Paderewski sails from England on Wednesday, January 20, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, January 26. His first concert will be in Waterbury, Conn., on January 28, and his second in Newark, N. J., on January 30. His recital in New York is set for Tuesday afternoon, February 2, in Carnegie Hall.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will constitute his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season.

CABLE ADDRESS, "EIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ADVERTISER UNION

ROCHESTER, N.Y.

JAN 14 1909

—On the appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall on January 30th, Mischa Elman, the remarkable young Russian violinist, about whom so much has been written, will appear as soloist. Elman has been a sensation in the music centers of Europe the past two seasons and his successes in New York and Boston since his arrival six weeks ago have been little short of the phenomenal. The young virtuoso has been engaged for six appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, with the exception of Paderewski's case, is the largest number of engagements ever granted a soloist by the organization in a single season.

REPUBLICAN.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 10 1909

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE CONCERT FOR TUESDAY.

A Fine Program to be Conducted by Mr Fiedler at Court Square Theater, With the Pianist Gabrilowitsch as Soloist.

The musical event of the coming week will, of course, be the second Boston symphony orchestra concert in the Court Square theater Tuesday evening at 8.15. This time the orchestra brings with it as soloist one of the most eminent pianists now before the public—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, whose work is not unknown in Springfield, as he has been heard here in the past in recital. Again Mr. Fiedler shows that he knows how to make a most attractive program. For Tuesday evening four numbers have been selected, Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor No. 1, "Waldweben" from Wagner, and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

This season is the centennial of what is perhaps the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies. It was played for the first time in the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, on December 22, 1808. The motives of the allegro, andante and scherzo of the symphony were sketched as early as 1800 or 1801. It is also known that he was working on it between 1804 and 1806 but before finishing it, put it aside to write the fourth symphony in B flat. It was finished in 1807 and dedicated to Prince von Lobkowitz and the Count Rasumoffsky. It was published in April, 1809. The first performance of this symphony in America, so far as can be found out, was at an academy concert in Boston on November 27, 1841. It held the place of honor at the first concert of the Philharmonic society of New York on December 2, 1842.

There are some who prefer the seventh symphony; there are a few who prefer the "Eroica" and many believe that the ninth in its full choral form is the greatest of Beethoven's works, but the public seems to have set on the fifth as the greatest of them all and by that symphony all symphonic works that have been written since that time have been judged. For 100 years it has remained the absolute standard of symphonic construction. Whatever the increase of instruments, the variety of colors that the modern symphonies have, they are all of them measured by this one work—the masterpiece of the master.

Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor which Mr Gabrilowitsch will play, had its first performance in public in Boston in the old Music hall on October 25, 1875, when Hans von Buelow was the pianist. In 1874 Tschaikowsy was the teacher of theory in the Moscow conservatory at a salary of $30 a month. At the end of that year he wrote his brother that he was absorbed in the composition of a pianoforte concerto and was hopeful of having Nicholas Rubinstein play it in his concert. The concerto was finished in February, 1875, but before that date he had played it to Nicholas Rubinstein, who thrust it aside as utterly commonplace and trivial. The result of this was that Tschaikowsky erased the name of Nicholas Rubinstein from the score and inserted in the dedication the name of Hans von Buelow, whom he had not yet seen. Von Buelow acknowledged the compliment and that same year played the work in Boston. One of the most interesting facts about this concerto is that it brought about a friendship between Tschaikowsky and the widow, Frau von Meck, who became so interested in his work that she gave him a sum of 6000 rubles annually, almost up to the time of his death. This friendship was of a most extraordinary character. The two, although they maintained a most constant correspondence, never in their lives met.

The "Waldweben" was arranged by Wagner for concert use from parts of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of "Siegfried." He gave it the title of "Waldweben" (Life and Stir of the Forest). It is one of Wagner's most exquisite pieces of tone painting and one of the most popular of his concert pieces. The final number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which needs no introduction to the Springfield public.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, was born in St Petersburg January 26, 1878, the son of a lawyer. His first teacher on the piano was his brother, and then Rubinstein advised his parents that they allow their son to become a professional pianist. He studied under Tolstoff in the St Petersburg conservatory and when he was 16 he took many prizes, among them the Rubinstein prize. In St Petersburg he was constantly under the supervision of Rubinstein, and in 1894 he went to Vienna, where he took a course of work with Leschetitzky. His first appearance in America was in November, 1900, and he has made several tours of this country since then.

Press Cutting Bureau in the World

Rochester is to

Address

Date Jan 14-1909

In Musical Circles

It is pleasant to chronicle that Rochester is to have Mischa Elman and that too as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

There seems no doubt that the heralding this young violinist received from European sources has been amply sustained by his playing in New York and Boston and that he is one of the most interesting musical personages who has visited America in many years. The story of Elman's first appearance in St. Petersburg is one of genius offered fortunate opportunity. Auer, the celebrated violinist and teacher, who had been giving the boy his lessons without compensation because of his wonderful talent, was to have played a Tschaikowsky Concerto at one of the Symphony concerts. At the last moment he was compelled to abandon the task and sent his young pupil as his substitute. From Elman's sensational debut at St. Petersburg came his appearance at Berlin shortly after and so was made the reputation which has led him westward through musical Europe, to our shores. Now that we are to hear for ourselves, we need not speculate as to the elements in his playing that make for his remarkable power over his hearers. If one may believe the critics of New York it is not mechanical perfection, immense as is his technical equipment. Back of his work we shall probably find a great musical personality which is, after all, the one great essential of permanent musical success.

m

dress

e

ENQUIRER.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 9 1909

RUSSIAN BOY VIOLINIST.

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, whose playing has been the musical sensation of the year in America, is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that famous organization visits Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday telegraphed the news to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, who is the local manager. This will be Elman's first appearance in Buffalo. He has carried New York by storm; he has made the critics of Boston bow down before him. At eighteen he has the world at his feet.

m

dress

e

TOWN & COUNTRY.

NEW YORK CITY

JAN 16 1909

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was heard at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January seventh, when a long program was presented which included the following compositions: "Kaleidoscope"; original theme and variations for orchestra, Op. 30 (first time) by Noren; Beethoven, Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 61, with Mischa Elman as soloist, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The variations, eleven in number, have been played by the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, but not in New York, and hence were a novelty and one of unusual interest. The fact that recently a lawsuit was begun in Germany to prevent their being played there, on the grounds that Noren had treated certain themes found in Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben," but which was satisfactorily settled, and to Noren's artistic honor prevented for a time being played there or in America. This also but served to create in them, both there and here an added interest. Noren is a Moravian, born in 1863, and living at present near Dresden. He was for a time a teacher of music in Berlin, but now devotes himself only to composition. These much-talked-of variations are called "Preamble," "Mournful Dance," "Canon," "Scherzo," "In the Cathedral,' "Pastoral," "Funeral March," "Frisch," "Mazurka"—a fiery folk dance—and "To a Celebrated Contemporary." Borowski and Reichert, in writing of them, have said that some of them are explained by their names, others not so well, but that "each has its own life and existence and brings before the listener a picture of some moment of existence or some mood." Mischa Elman, a young Russian violinist, nineteen years of age, has long been considered a marvel in Europe. He made his debut in this country last December when he played a Tschaikowsky concerto at a Russian Symphony Society Concert. On the above occasion he performed the Beethoven concerto with great brilliancy, poetical depth and finish of technique. He was recalled nine times. The great hall was filled to overflowing with an audience that also paid deserved homage to the orchestra under the fine leadership of Max Fiedler. The program at the Saturday afternoon concert included three dance pieces from "Cephulus and Procris, Heroic Ballet" (first time in New York) by Grétry; Beethoven's fifth symphony; Brahms's violin concerto in D major, and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Elman was again the soloist and the orchestra thus broke its record for never having the same solo performer at two concerts of the same week.

[144]

NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Orchestra to Play at Convention Hall Three Weeks From To Night—Secret of Its Success.

One of the chief factors which makes for the supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra not only in this country but abroad, is the length of service of its members, showing that there has been a minimum of changes in its personnel. An orchestra is a most highly strung organism. To gain its best ideals, its members must be not merely accomplished musicians, but they must have that musical sympathy with each other which comes only through long association. An orchestra that is constantly changing its membership cannot hope to attain the highest standards that an orchestra does which preserves the same members, retiring only those whom age has made unable to keep the pace.

This year the Boston Symphony Orchestra began to pay pensions to thirteen of its former members who had been retired from the orchestra for one reason or another. Before a member of the orchestra becomes eligible to a pension he must have been in its ranks for ten years. Retiring after ten years' service he receives a minimum pension, the pension increasing up to twenty-five years of service, which is the maximum pension. The moneys for the pension fund are raised in three ways: by annual assessment on the members of the orchestra; by the receipts from two special concerts given each winter by the orchestra in Symphony Hall, and by gifts made to the fund by friends of the orchestra.

Some rather interesting statistics were brought out recently regarding the membership of the orchestra. The number of musicians employed is ninety-seven. Of these eighty have been in the orchestra to-day who were in it when it was organized twenty-eight years ago. They are Paul H. Fox, flute; J. Akeroyd, second violin, and Daniel Kuntz, first violin. The average length of service for these eighty men who have been in the orchestra four years or more is just less than sixteen and one-half years. The three named men have been in the orchestra since its organization. Two have been in the orchestra twenty-seven years; three twenty-six years; seven twenty-four years; three twenty-three years; four twenty-two years; one twenty-one years; one twenty years; five nineteen years; five eighteen years; one seventeen years; six fifteen years; two fourteen years; three thirteen years; one twelve years; six eleven years; four nine years; four eight years; one seven years; two six years; two five years. The greatest changes in the orchestra were made in the fall of 1907 when Dr. Muck brought quite a number of new men from abroad to take the place of some who were retired on account of age. It is certain that no orchestra in this country, and it is doubtful whether any orchestra in any country can show a table to compare with this.

The only appearance of the orchestra in Rochester will be in Convention Hall Saturday evening, January 30th.

It would seem as if it were privilege enough to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra alone for its long-anticipated Buffalo concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 25, but when this is coupled with the announcement that the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist who has been the musical sensation in America this winter, the completeness of perfection is attained.

Mischa Elman is only 18. At 5 he was playing with an orchestra. At 14 he was touring Europe and had a continent at his feet. The American newspapers were full of his triumphs, but even then Elman refused to be criticised as a prodigy. "I am Mischa Elman, a violinist," he said, sturdily, and he was judged for his art without counting his youth. This all happened four years ago. It is only a few weeks since he crossed the Atlantic and made his debut in the New World, which he conquered in a night with his opening recital in New York.

The Boston Transcript, in a lengthy review of Elman's first appearance in that city, says of him: "Caesar Thomson gains the beauty of his tone seemingly by a kind of devilish ingenuity. Yeaye achieves it by the amplitude of his power. Kreisler accomplishes it by an exquisite sensitiveness. With Mr. Elman the means are pure passion for the beauty, the range, the poignancy, the richness, the endless coloring of the voice of the violin. As some will have it, as Balzac himself had it, there are spirits imprisoned in these strained and fretted and varnished shells. If it be so, not one of them might resist such passion as that with which Mr. Elman plies or persuades, goads or woos them to voice."

Within a few days, Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will announce the program for the Buffalo concert, which will probably include, in response to many requests, the pathetic symphony of Tschaikowsky, which has attracted so much attention from Mr. Fiedler's wonderful interpretation.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is receiving mail orders for seats, when accompanied by check and sent to her at 26 Irving Place. Prices are as follows: First 16 rows, $2; next 15 rows, $1.50; next 15 rows, $1; rest of house, including the balcony, 75 cents.

COURIER

The news of Mischa Elman's coming to Buffalo as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 25th created a sensation when announced yesterday in The Courier. The young Russian violinist is the musical idol of the year in America. He arrived in New York a few weeks ago, widely heralded as Europe's greatest sensation. He gave his opening recital before a house thronged with the curious and expectant, and before his first number was half over he had every man and woman in the vast assemblage at his feet. Now, when an Elman seat sale is announced in New York the line does not break until the house is entirely sold.

From New York Elman went to Boston, where, a fortnight ago, he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and not in long memories have such notices been accorded any artist. "Mischa Elman's playing is the product of pure passion," writes the critic of the Transcript, "passion for his violin, passion for its range and resource, passion for its beauty and power of voice, passion for its music, for the exact recreation of it and for the completest and most communicative expression of all that it contains. Twenty passions, perhaps, shape and vitalize his playing, but the deepest, the fullest, the most commanding of them all is the passion for the uttermost and the irresistible expression. Into him, young as he is, has entered the consuming passion for expression—of himself, his medium, his material."

Elman is only eighteen. Four years ago he conquered Europe, refusing even in those boyish days to be counted a prodigy. "I am Elman, a violinist," he said proudly, and he was judged by his work, not by his youth. At eighteen he has come over to conquer America and he has done it every step of the way, making his audience bow down before his matchless art and pay homage to his message.

Within a few days Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will announce the programme to be played at Convention Hall on the night of January 25th. It is probable, however, that the symphony will be the famous Tschaikowsky Pathetic, for which there have been an overwhelming number of requests, probably because of the remarkable playing of this by the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's baton, which has been the subject for extended notice in the leading magazines and periodicals of the day.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, is receiving mail orders for seats, which are filled in the order of their receipt. Accompanied by check, they may be sent to her at No. 26 Irving Place. The price for the first sixteen rows is $2, for the next fifteen $1.50, for the next fifteen $1, while the balance of the house, including the balcony, is listed at 75 cents.

EVENING POST,
New York City.

Paderewski and the Boston Orchestra.

Paderewski sails from England on Wednesday, January 20, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, January 26. His first concert will be in Waterbury, Conn., on January 28, and his second in Newark, N. J., on January 30. His recital in New York is set for Tuesday afternoon, February 2, in Carnegie Hall.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will constitute his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season.

CABLE ADDRESS, "EIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess
JAN 14 1909

—On the appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall on January 30th, Mischa Elman, the remarkable young Russian violinist, about whom so much has been written, will appear as soloist. Elman has been a sensation in the music centers of Europe the past two seasons and his successes in New York and Boston since his arrival six weeks ago have been little short of the phenomenal. The young virtuoso has been engaged for six appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, with the exception of Paderewski's case, is the largest number of engagements ever granted a soloist by the organization in a single season.

REPUBLICAN,
SPRINGFIELD

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE CONCERT FOR TUESDAY.

A Fine Program to be Conducted by Mr Fiedler at Court Square Theater, With the Pianist Gabrilowitsch as Soloist.

The musical event of the coming week will, of course, be the second Boston symphony orchestra concert in the Court Square theater Tuesday evening at 8.15. This time the orchestra brings with it as soloist one of the most eminent pianists now before the public—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, whose work is not unknown in Springfield, as he has been heard here in the past in recital. Again Mr Fiedler shows that he knows how to make a most attractive program. For Tuesday evening four numbers have been selected, Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor No 1, "Waldweben" from Wagner, and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

This season is the centennial of what is perhaps the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies. It was played for the first time in the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, on December 22, 1808. The motives of the allegro, andante and scherzo of the symphony were sketched as early as 1800 or 1801. It is also known that he was working on it between 1804 and 1806 but before finishing it, put it aside to write the fourth symphony in B flat. It was finished in 1807 and dedicated to Prince von Lobkowitz and the Count Rasumoffsky. It was published in April, 1809. The first performance of this symphony in America, so far as can be found out, was at an academy concert in Boston on November 27, 1841. It held the place of honor at the first concert of the Philharmonic society of New York on December 2, 1842.

There are some who prefer the seventh symphony; there are a few who prefer the "Eroica" and many believe that the ninth in its full choral form is the greatest of Beethoven's works, but the public seems to have set on the fifth as the greatest of them all and by that symphony all symphonic works that have been written since that time have been judged. For 100 years it has remained the absolute standard of symphonic construction. Whatever the increase of instruments, the variety of colors that the modern symphonies have, they are all of them measured by this one work—the masterpiece of the master.

Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor which Mr Gabrilowitsch will play, had its first performance in public in Boston in the old Music hall on October 25, 1875, when Hans von Buelow was the pianist. In 1874 Tschaikowsy was the teacher of theory in the Moscow conservatory at a salary of $30 a month. At the end of that year he wrote his brother that he was absorbed in the composition of a pianoforte concerto and was hopeful of having Nicholas Rubinstein play it in his concert. The concerto was finished in February, 1875, but before that date he had played it to Nicholas Rubinstein, who thrust it aside as utterly commonplace and trivial. The result of this was that Tschaikowsky erased the name of Nicholas Rubinstein from the score and inserted in the dedication the name of Hans von Buelow, whom he had not yet seen. Von Buelow acknowledged the compliment and that same year played the work in Boston. One of the most interesting facts about this concerto is that it brought about a friendship between Tschaikowsky and the widow, Frau von Meck, who became so interested in his work that she gave him a sum of 6000 rubles annually, almost up to the time of his death. This friendship was of a most extraordinary character. The two, although they maintained a most constant correspondence, never in their lives met.

The "Waldweben" was arranged by Wagner for concert use from parts of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of "Siegfried." He gave it the title of "Waldweben" (Life and Stir of the Forest). It is one of Wagner's most exquisite pieces of tone painting and one of the most popular of his concert pieces. The final number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which needs no introduction to the Springfield public.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, was born in St Petersburg January 26, 1878, the son of a lawyer. His first teacher on the piano was his brother, and then Rubinstein advised his parents that they allow their son to become a professional pianist. He studied under Tolstoff in the St Petersburg conservatory and when he was 16 he took many prizes, among them the Rubinstein prize. In St Petersburg he was constantly under the supervision of Rubinstein, and in 1894 he went to Vienna, where he took a course of work with Leschetitzky. His first appearance in America was in November, 1900, and he has made several tours of this country since then.

Rochester Herald
Jan 14-1909

In Musical Circles

It is pleasant to chronicle that Rochester is to have Mischa Elman and that too as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

There seems no doubt that the heralding this young violinist received from European sources has been amply sustained by his playing in New York and Boston and that he is one of the most interesting musical personages who has visited America in many years. The story of Elman's first appearance in St. Petersburg is one of genius offered fortunate opportunity. Auer, the celebrated violinist and teacher, who had been giving the boy his lessons without compensation because of his wonderful talent, was to have played a Tschaikowsky Concerto at one of the Symphony concerts. At the last moment he was compelled to abandon the task and sent his young pupil as his substitute. From Elman's sensational debut at St. Petersburg came his appearance at Berlin shortly after and so was made the reputation which has led him westward through musical Europe, to our shores. Now that we are to hear for ourselves, we need not speculate as to the elements in his playing that make for his remarkable power over his hearers. If one may believe the critics of New York it is not mechanical perfection, immense as is his technical equipment. Back of his work we shall probably find a great musical personality which is, after all, the one great essential of permanent musical success.

---

om
dress
e

RUSSIAN BOY VIOLINIST.

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, whose playing has been the musical sensation of the year in America, is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that famous organization visits Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday telegraphed the news to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, who is the local manager. This will be Elman's first appearance in Buffalo. He has carried New York by storm; he has made the critics of Boston bow down before him. At eighteen he has the world at his feet.

---

m lress
e

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was heard at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January seventh, when a long program was presented which included the following compositions: "Kaleidoscope"; original theme and variations for orchestra, Op. 30 (first time) by Noren; Beethoven, Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 61, with Mischa Elman as soloist, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The variations, eleven in number, have been played by the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, but not in New York, and hence were a novelty and one of unusual interest. The fact that recently a lawsuit was begun in Germany to prevent their being played there, on the grounds that Noren had treated certain themes found in Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben," but which was satisfactorily settled, and to Noren's artistic honor prevented for a time being played there or in America. This also but served to create in them, both there and here an added interest. Noren is a Moravian, born in 1863, and living at present near Dresden. He was for a time a teacher of music in Berlin, but now devotes himself only to composition. These much-talked-of variations are called "Preamble," "Mournful Dance," "Canon," "Scherzo," "In the Cathedral," "Pastoral," "Funeral March," "Frisch," "Mazurka"—a fiery folk dance—and "To a Celebrated Contemporary." Borowski and Reichert, in writing of them, have said that some of them are explained by their names, others not so well, but that "each has its own life and existence and brings before the listener a picture of some moment of existence or some mood." Mischa Elman, a young Russian violinist, nineteen years of age, has long been considered a marvel in Europe. He made his debut in this country last December when he played a Tschaikowsky concerto at a Russian Symphony Society Concert. On the above occasion he performed the Beethoven concerto with great brilliancy, poetical depth and finish of technique. He was recalled nine times. The great hall was filled to overflowing with an audience that also paid deserved homage to the orchestra under the fine leadership of Max Fiedler. The program at the Saturday afternoon concert included three dance pieces from "Cephulus and Procris, Heroic Ballet" (first time in New York) by Grétry; Beethoven's fifth symphony; Brahms's violin concerto in D major, and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Elman was again the soloist and the orchestra thus broke its record for never having the same solo performer at two concerts of the same week.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From UNION & ADVERTISER, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Address

Date JAN 16 1909

MISCHA ELMAN, YOUNG RUSSIAN VIOLINIST.
He will be the soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

From Daily Courier, Buffalo, N. Y.

Address

Date JAN 16 1909

Mischa Elman at his next recital in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon, January 28, will have the Bruch concerto in G minor as the important number on his programme. Elman has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for additional concerts in Buffalo and Rochester, where he will play with them late this month.

From Daily Courier, Buffalo, N. Y.

Address

Date JAN 16 1909

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 19. Paderewski will be the soloist, and this will constitute his only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn this year.

From EVENING POST, New York City.

Address

Date

At next Friday's Carnegie Hall concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arens will conduct Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Beethoven's fourth symphony, a Bach suite, and the "Finlandia" overture of Sibelius. Soloist, Miss Laura Combs.

BULLETIN, PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

JAN 16 1909

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Philadelphia concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 15. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this season. Paderewski's only recital here during his forthcoming tour will be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

Mischa Elman.

Seventeen years ago, in the little village of Stalnoje, in the government of Kiev, Russia, was born in the family of a poor Jewish school teacher, a boy who long before he reached manhood, was destined to cause the most profound sensation in the musical work that history has recorded since Mozart. This boy is Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here on Saturday, January 30, at Convention Hall. His father was something of a musician, and when the child was 4 years old he gave him a toy violin which the boy learned to play before he could read a note of music. A year later the boy was taken to play before a lady of nobility, who was so impressed with his remarkable talent that she wanted to adopt him as her son and give him an education necessary to make him a virtuoso. As this meant the abandonment of the Jewish faith in the lad his father refused, but he managed to scrape up enough money to take the boy to Odessa, where he succeeded in putting him in the Imperial Music School under the tuition of Professor Fiedelman.

Those who came in contact with him quickly recognized that the boy's talent was enormous not only for his chosen instrument, but for music in general. So greatly was Fiedelman impressed with him that in 1903 he obtained a hearing for him before Leopold Auer, the professor of violin at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and one of the great violinists of Europe. To use Auer's own words, he was "simply carried off his feet" by the wonderful precocity of the youngster, and made up his mind then to take him as his own pupil. From that time on his study and progress was continuous.

Despite the natural prejudices that must exist in the minds of American connoisseurs toward a musician whose coming to this country has been preceded by the loud blowing of trumpets, it is to be said of Elman that not a single unfavorable notice did he get in New York after that concert; in fact, on the contrary, all the critics were most enthusiastic over him, seeing in him a most extraordinary combination of technique and musicianship.

Elman must be regarded as the most extraordinary artist the present generation has seen. It seems impossible to find a flaw in his artistic armor. He is strong at all points and the public is not more enthusiastic over him than are musicians. The violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, most of whom are soloists of no mean distinction, freely say that he is the greatest violinist that has ever appeared with that organization. It is great good fortune that it has been possible to arrange his first appearance in Rochester with that celebrated organization.

Cable Address, "HOMELIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From UNION & ADVERTISER, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Address

Date JAN 16 1909

MISCHA ELMAN

Something About Wonderful Violinist To be Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years and perhaps the most remarkable violinistic talent that the world has known since the great Italian Paganini is what is asserted of Mischa Elman, the young Russian lad who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here in Convention Hall two weeks from to-night. Mischa Elman came out of Russia four years ago, a boy of fourteen and conquered Germany. Three years ago he went to London and conquered that great city. Last month he came to New York and it was the same story and within the last few weeks he has made a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Washington and Boston and received receptions the like of which have not been seen since Paderewski first began to play before the American public.

What is the secret of his hold upon the ordinary cool and collected American audience? He is a little chap, hardly five feet tall with a typical Jewish face of the Russian type, crowned with curly blonde hair. There is little about his appearance that is fascinating, yet he seems to possess that mysterious quality called personality, that makes him a dominating figure wherever he appears.

When he begins to make music with his violin no further explanations of his success are necessary. Such a tone has not been heard since Wilhelmj was in his prime. Such complete mastery of the technique of his instrument has not been known certainly since Paganini flourished and it is more than likely that Elman can do things with his instrument that Paganini never dreamed of.

A natural born fiddler the boy is. In addition to this he is a musician of finest quality. Although he is but eighteen years old, there is in his playing no sign of immaturity. His phrasing calls forth the praise of the most captious musicians. There is none of the uncertainty that one would expect to find in so young a virtuoso. His playing and his conception of the music he plays is as mature as those of a man of fifty. In other words, Mischa Elman seems to be unique. He is a prodigy so far as he has reached at the age of eighteen a perfection of musicianship that almost always demands years of training. He is a prodigy in that the muscles of his arms and his fingers and the nerves that control them are so perfectly adapted to violin playing that he is at the age of eighteen the possessor of a technique more complete than that of any living violinist. But prodigy though he must be considered, he has never sought success on such grounds but has always demanded that he be judged as a mature artist and that his failure as well as his success should be based on this foundation.

His appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will add undoubted brilliancy to the concert and will enable him to be heard for the first time in Rochester under the most favorable conditions.

From LIFE

Address

Date JAN 17 1909

ANOTHER rare musical treat was afforded at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week Friday evening and the reputation of the marvelous young musical prodigy, Mischa Elman, was doubtless responsible for an exceptionally large audience. The program of three numbers: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major for violin; and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz" was ideally selected with a view to contrasts and of a length exactly proportioned to produce the most favorable effect. Particularly noteworthy in the performance of the Beethoven symphony was the exquisite discrimination with which Mr. Fiedler brought the flute and other wind instruments into play to enhance the beauty of the interpretation. Whatever the critics may have to say regarding the musical understanding of the young Russian violinist who certainly would be a marvel of precocity, were he at the age of eighteen able to grasp the significance of ideas comprehensible only to those who have been taught by experience, his incomparable technic and tone production are sufficient to entrance any musical appreciation not too far gone in critical discernment to enjoy anything short of those celestial harmonies which will presumably leave the critics without a vocation in their future sphere, assuming they have been good enough critics to gain admission to the place where their presence as such will be superfluous.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

COURIER, Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 16 1909

The sale of seats for the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th, at 8.15 o'clock, will open next Wednesday morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. There has been a very large demand for seats by mail and it looks as if the great Orchestra from Boston will play before the largest audience it has ever had in this city. The coming of Boston's Orchestra always marks the climax of Buffalo's musical season. As it is the first orchestra in this country, if not in the world, its performances of music, both modern and classic, carry with them an authority which is found nowhere else in this country.

Mr. Fiedler is in every respect a worthy successor to the great musicians who have preceded him in this, the most important musical post in America. As an interpreter he has a thorough knowledge of tradition and routine and added to this is an imagination necessary to bring out the poetic value of the works performed. No conductor of the orchestra has had a more popular success than he and not a small part of this has been brought about by his extraordinary ability as a maker of programs.

The soloist at the concert will be Mischa Elman, the astonishing young Russian violinist, who has created such a sensation in this country since he first appeared in New York last month. Buffalo is to be congratulated that it will hear him play the greatest of all concertos for violin, that by Beethoven, in D-Major. It has usually been his custom to make his debut in a city with the Tschaikowsky concerto, but for two reasons, he will not do this in Buffalo. The first is that Tschaikowsky's Pathetique is on the program and the second is that a number of the patrons of the orchestra in Buffalo have asked particularly that he play the Beethoven.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive program for the concert. It begins with Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," the second of the series of six works of like character which the Bohemian composer grouped under the general name of "My Country." Then will come the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" with which Mr. Fiedler has had one of the greatest successes of his career in America. Mr. Fiedler has conducted much in St. Petersburg and his intimate relations with the Russian musical world have put him particularly in sympathy with Russian music. As said before, Elman will play the Beethoven concerto in D Major, and the final number will be the overture of "Tannhaeuser."

INQUIRER

JAN 17 1909

...y 25, at Grooket's Hall, Fox Chase.

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city on February 15, and will give his only local recital at the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3. Seats are now on sale at Miss Harris' office, 1115 Chestnut street.

...Clipping Bureau in the World

JAN 17 1909

Boston Symphony Coming.

Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Baltimore concert to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, February 17. This will be his only appearance in Baltimore this year. The prices will be advanced for that performance.

SUN, New York City. JAN 17 1909

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will constitute his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season. His only recital will be given on February 2.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date JAN 16 1909

MISCHA ELMAN, YOUNG RUSSIAN VIOLINIST.
He will be the soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Mischa Elman at his next recital in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon, January 28, will have the Bruch concerto in G minor as the important number on his programme. Elman has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for additional concerts in Buffalo and Rochester, where he will play with them late this month.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 19. Paderewski will be the soloist, and this will constitute his only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn this year.

From EVENING POST.
Address New York City.
Date .....

At next Friday's Carnegie Hall concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arens will conduct Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Beethoven's fourth symphony, a Bach suite, and the "Finlandia" overture of Sibelius. Soloist, Miss Laura Combs.

BULLETIN.
JAN 1

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Philadelphia concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 15. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this season. Paderewski's only recital here during his forthcoming tour will be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3.

Mischa Elman.

Seventeen years ago, in the little village of Stalnoje, in the government of Kiev, Russia, was born in the family of a poor Jewish school teacher, a boy who long before he reached manhood was destined to cause the most profound sensation in the musical work that history has recorded since Mozart. This boy is Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here on Saturday, January 30, at Convention Hall. His father was something of a musician, and when the child was 4 years old he gave him a toy violin which the boy learned to play before he could read a note of music. A year later the boy was taken to play before a lady of nobility, who was so impressed with his remarkable talent that she wanted to adopt him as her son and give him an education necessary to make him a virtuoso. As this meant the abandonment of the Jewish faith in the lad his father refused, but he managed to scrape up enough money to take the boy to Odessa, where he succeeded in putting him in the Imperial Music School under the tuition of Professor Fiedelman.

Those who came in contact with him quickly recognized that the boy's talent was enormous not only for his chosen instrument, but for music in general. So greatly was Fiedelman impressed with him that in 1903 he obtained a hearing for him before Leopold Auer, the professor of violin at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and one of the great violinists of Europe. To use Auer's own words, he was "simply carried off his feet" by the wonderful precocity of the youngster, and made up his mind then to take him as his own pupil. From that time on his study and progress was continuous.

Despite the natural prejudices that must exist in the minds of American connoisseurs toward a musician whose coming to this country has been preceded by the loud blowing of trumpets, it is to be said of Elman that not a single unfavorable notice did he get in New York after that concert; in fact, on the contrary, all the critics were most enthusiastic over him, seeing in him a most extraordinary combination of technique and musicianship.

Elman must be regarded as the most extraordinary artist the present generation has seen. It seems impossible to find a flaw in his artistic armor. He is strong at all points and the public is not more enthusiastic over him than are musicians. The violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, most of whom are soloists of no mean distinction, freely say that he is the greatest violinist that has ever appeared with that organization. It is great good fortune that it has been possible to arrange his first appearance in Rochester with that celebrated organization.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Cable Address, "HOMELIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

From .....
Address ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date JAN 16 1909

MISCHA ELMAN

Something About Wonderful Violinist To be Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

The most astonishing musical talent that the world has known for many years and perhaps the most remarkable violinistic talent that the world has known since the great Italian Paganini is what is asserted of Mischa Elman, the young Russian lad who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here in Convention Hall two weeks from to-night. Mischa Elman came out of Russia four years ago, a boy of fourteen and conquered Germany. Three years ago he went to London and conquered that great city. Last month he came to New York and it was the same story and within the last few weeks he has made a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Washington and Boston and received receptions the like of which have not been seen since Paderewski first began to play before the American public.

What is the secret of his hold upon the ordinary cool and collected American audience? He is a little chap, hardly five feet tall with a typical Jewish face of the Russian type, crowned with curly blonde hair. There is little about his appearance that is fascinating, yet he seems to possess that mysterious quality called personality, that makes him a dominating figure wherever he appears.

When he begins to make music with his violin no further explanations of his success are necessary. Such a tone has not been heard since Wilhelmj was in his prime. Such complete mastery of the technique of his instrument has not been known certainly since Paganini flourished and it is more than likely that Elman can do things with his instrument that Paganini never dreamed of.

A natural born fiddler the boy is. In addition to this he is a musician of finest quality. Although he is but eighteen years old, there is in his playing no sign of immaturity. His phrasing calls forth the praise of the most captious musicians. There is none of the uncertainty that one would expect to find in so young a virtuoso. His playing and his conception of the music he plays is as mature as those of a man of fifty. In other words, Mischa Elman seems to be unique. He is a prodigy so far as he has reached at the age of eighteen a perfection of musicianship that almost always demands years of training. He is a prodigy in that the muscles of his arms and his fingers and the nerves that control them are so perfectly adapted to violin playing that he is at the age of eighteen the possessor of a technique more complete than that of any living violinist. But prodigy though he must be considered, he has never sought success on such grounds but has always demanded that he be judged as a mature artist and that his failure as well as his success should be based on this foundation.

His appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will add undoubted brilliancy to the concert and will enable him to be heard for the first time in Rochester under the most favorable conditions.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

ANOTHER rare musical treat was afforded at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week Friday evening and the reputation of the marvelous young musical prodigy, Mischa Elman, was doubtless responsible for an exceptionally large audience. The program of three numbers: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major for violin; and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz" was ideally selected with a view to contrasts and of a length exactly proportioned to produce the most favorable effect. Particularly noteworthy in the performance of the Beethoven symphony was the exquisite discrimination with which Mr. Fiedler brought the flute and other wind instruments into play to enhance the beauty of the interpretation. Whatever the critics may have to say regarding the musical understanding of the young Russian violinist who certainly would be a marvel of precocity, were he at the age of eighteen able to grasp the significance of ideas comprehensible only to those who have been taught by experience, his incomparable technic and tone production are sufficient to entrance any musical appreciation not too far gone in critical discernment to enjoy anything short of those celestial harmonies which will presumably leave the critics without a vocation in their future sphere, assuming they have been good enough critics to gain admission to the place where their presence as such will be superfluous.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
.....
.....

The sale of seats for the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25th, at 8.15 o'clock, will open next Wednesday morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. There has been a very large demand for seats by mail and it looks as if the great Orchestra from Boston will play before the largest audience it has ever had in this city. The coming of Boston's Orchestra always marks the climax of Buffalo's musical season. As it is the first orchestra in this country, if not in the world, its performances of music, both modern and classic, carry with them an authority which is found nowhere else in this country.

Mr. Fiedler is in every respect a worthy successor to the great musicians who have preceded him in this, the most important musical post in America. As an interpreter he has a thorough knowledge of tradition and routine and added to this is an imagination necessary to bring out the poetic value of the works performed. No conductor of the orchestra has had a more popular success than he and not a small part of this has been brought about by his extraordinary ability as a maker of programs.

The soloist at the concert will be Mischa Elman, the astonishing young Russian violinist, who has created such a sensation in this country since he first appeared in New York last month. Buffalo is to be congratulated that it will hear him play the greatest of all concertos for violin, that by Beethoven, in D-Major. It has usually been his custom to make his debut in a city with the Tschaikowsky concerto, but for two reasons, he will not do this in Buffalo. The first is that Tschaikowsky's Pathetique is on the program and the second is that a number of the patrons of the orchestra in Buffalo have asked particularly that he play the Beethoven.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive program for the concert. It begins with Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," the second of the series of six works of like character which the Bohemian composer grouped under the general name of "My Country." Then will come the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" with which Mr. Fiedler has had one of the greatest successes of his career in America. Mr. Fiedler has conducted much in St. Petersburg and his intimate relations with the Russian musical world have put him particularly in sympathy with Russian music. As said before, Elman will play the Beethoven concerto in D Major, and the final number will be the overture of "Tannhaeuser."

.....
.....
.....

ry 28, at Grooket's Hall, Fox Chase.
Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city on February 15, and will give his only local recital at the Academy of Music on Wednesday afternoon, February 3. Seats are now on sale at Miss Harris' office, 1115 Chestnut street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
.....
.....
JAN 17 1909

Boston Symphony Coming.

Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Baltimore concert to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, February 17. This will be his only appearance in Baltimore this year. The prices will be advanced for that performance.

SUN, New York City. JAN 17 1909

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will constitute his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season. His only recital will be given on February 2.

...per Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address ROCH...

Date .....

Mischa Elman Will Be Heard with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who recently made his debut in New York City, came heralded fro... abroad as one of the most powerfu...

geniuses of the age. His first appearances have fully borne out all that the European press have said of his wonderful playing, and New York has placed him at the head of all violinists heard there since his distinguished countryman, Wieniawski, played there more than twenty years ago.

Elman was born in Russia some nineteen years ago. He first studied violin with his father at the age of four. At the age of five he played in public. At seven he entered the Imperial Conservatoire in Odessa, and there won his first prize, a free scholarship, at his entrance examination.

In 1902, Leopold Auer, the professor of violin in the Royal Conservatoire of St. Petersburg, was making a concert tour in Southwest Russia, when young Elman was brought to his notice, and he had him play. That he was astonished, must be adduced from the manner in which their lives have been linked since then. Auer immediately telegraphed the Czar of all the Russias, that he must give permission for young Elman and his family to come into St. Petersburg, or to accept his resignation as head of the Royal Conservatoire. The Czar wired his consent and when Auer returned he brought young Elman and his entire family along with him. Elman was then accepted as a free pupil at the Royal Conservatoire, and here he spent several years at work. In 1904 Auer prevailed upon an orchestra in St. Petersburg to allow Elman to appear as soloist, predicting a sensational success for him at that time. His prediction came true with the first concert, and since then it has been of steady growth, until now he is placed at the head of all the world's greatest violinists known to fame.

Auer took young Elman to Berlin, introduced him there, and from Berlin Elman went to London, where his successes the past four years have dimmed the lights of all other violinists of note. He played over 130 concerts in London alone since his advent there, which is a record unsurpassed. His debut in New York on December 10 was a duplication of what he had undergone in other important centers. It was eagerly awaited, and though he had only sixty hours in New York in which to prepare himself for this, he captured the critics and the public before he had played a dozen bars of his opening selection. Elman's magnetic personality aids him considerably in his great success with his audiences. His technique surpasses that of Kubelik, and he never exploits it, as does the Bohemian, while his tone is of such ingratiating sweetness that he carries his hearers along with him.

Mischa Elman will be heard in Rochester at Convention Hall on Saturday evening, January 30, when he comes as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MISCHA ELMAN, RUSSIAN VIOLINIST, SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

...per Cutting Bureau in the World

...

...ess .....

JAN 17 1909

MISCHA ELMAN.

Wonderful young violinist whose American tour is bringing him one continued succession of brilliant triumphs. He will be the soloist at the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

Paderewski's Return.

Paderewski is to give one recital in Washington, the date being Thursday afternoon, February 4, at 4:30 o'clock, and the place being the New National Theater. Paderewski sails for America the middle of this month for a stay of only a few weeks. His primary reason for coming is to have his new symphony performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will play eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, twice with the Chicago Orchestra, and once each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will also give a limited number of recitals, not more than one in any city, and will return to Europe some time in March. Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene has the management of the Paderewski recital here, and full details regarding the sale of tickets and the like will be announced in due time.

...n .....

...ress .....

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music on Monday, February 15. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this season. Paderewski, who is coming to America for a brief tour this season, sails from England on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on Wednesday, January 20, and is due to arrive in New York on January 26. His only recital in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday, February 3.

From TRIBUNE

...ress New York City.

Date JAN 17 1909

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will be his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season.

[146]

...1

...ress .....

JAN 16 ...

FIEDLER, AN UPHOLDER OF THE NEW IN MUSIC

AT THE SAME TIME HE DOES NOT NEGLECT CLASSICS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY JAN. 28

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to give a concert at English's January 28, is a musician of widely catholic tastes. Few men have had such a profound influence on the musical tastes of Germany as he. From the beginning of his career he has been an upholder of the new in music, while never neglecting the great classics of the past.

Germany has been and is exceedingly conservative regarding all except German music, but Mr. Fiedler has done much to break down the prejudice against foreign composers. He has done much for Slavic music. He stands to-day as one of the most notable interpreters of Tschaikowsky, with whose works he is thoroughly in sympathy. He has conducted them often in St. Petersburg. And as with Tschaikowsky, so with the other Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Balakireff, Rachmaninoff and the others. Bohemian music as represented by the two great Czech composers, Dvorak and Smetana, has found in him a sturdy champion.

The "younger" Frenchmen as represented by Cesar Franck and his followers, D'Indy, Bruneau, Dukas, Debussy, he has followed with sympathetic interest and was the first to play many of their works in Germany. Elgar, the leading English composer, has found in him an influential friend.

Friend of Richard Strauss.

As for the modern Germans he is an intimate friend of Richard Strauss, an ardent admirer of and believer in his genius, and perhaps his greatest interpreter. He has found much to admire in Max Reger and so much does Reger believe in him that last summer he particularly asked Mr. Fiedler to present his new concert overture to America, which will be done later in the season.

He is a profound believer in the genius of Edward MacDowell and he was the first to play the "Lamia" of that lamented composer. Altogether, Mr. Fiedler is one of the broadest and best equipped conductors that ever came to America, and his programs have been models of what is needed to retain the interest of an audience.

Ninety-Seven in the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of ninety-seven musicians and the conductor and librarian, a total of ninety-nine, but this entire strength is very seldom used, as few works call for so many men.

There are sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, ten celli and eight double basses, these making the string choir. The wood wind-choir comprises four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons and one contra-bassoon. In the brass choir are eight horns (two quartets), four trumpets, three trombones and bass tuba. There is one harp, and the remainder of the musicians are in the percussion department.

Naturally the greater number of musicians in the orchestra are Germans, meaning by that Germans and Austrians. There are sixty-three of these. Twenty members are of American or English birth; seven are Frenchmen, two are Italians, two Belgians, and Poland, Hungary and Holland each has a single representative.

...Standard Union

...ss Brooklyn, N. Y

JAN 17 1909

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 19. Paderewski will be the soloist and this will constitute his only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn this year.

...per Cutting Bureau in the World

...

...ess .....

...

MUSIC NOTES

Paderewski is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music on Monday, February 15. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this season. He sails from England next Wednesday, and is due in New York on January 26. Preceding his appearance here with the orchestra he will be heard at the Academy on February 3 in recital. Seats may now be reserved by mail order on application to Miss Harris, No. 1115 Chestnut street.

NEW YORK PRESS,
New York City.

The next two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on the evening of February 18 and afternoon of February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, these being his only appearances with orchestra this season in New York.

Clifford Wiley, whose song recital will take place in Mendelssohn Hall on February 4, is one of those who make a specialty of singing in English. His programme will consist entirely of modern English songs and ballads never heard before in this country. It will include a new song by Harry R. Shelley, "Love's Flight," for which the composer will play the accompaniment. Other composers represented will include Cowen, Maude V. White, Tosti, Stephen Adams, Korbay and Amy W. Finden.

For the coming week the Board of Education has arranged an interesting list of free public lectures on music in public schools and rented halls. The lecturers will include Daniel G. Mason, Clarence de Vaux Royer and Dr. Henry G. Hanchett. Here is the schedule: Monday—"Voice Production," Walter H. Robinson, St. Peter's Hall, Twentieth street and Eighth avenue; "Songs of Burns," Mrs. Henrietta S. Seely, Institute Hall, No. 218 East 106th street; "Folk Songs of Russia," Lewis W. Armstrong, Layfayette Hall, Alexander avenue and 137th street. Tuesday—"Composers and Music of Germany," Clarence de V. Royer, library branch, No. 103 West 135th street; "Songs That Never Die," Frank T. Molony, Riverdale Hall, Riverdale avenue and 260th street. Wednesday—"Folk Songs of Russia," Lewis W. Armstrong, public library, No. 331 East Tenth street; "Established Outlines of Tone Poems," Dr. Henry G. Hanchett, Y. M. C. A. Hall, No. 5 West 125th street; "J. S. Bach and Polyphonic Style," Daniel G. Mason, Y. M. C. A. Hall, Ninety-second street and Lexington avenue. Thursday—"Established Outlines of Tone Poems," Dr. Hanchett, Morris High School, Boston road and 166th street; "Songs of Tennyson," Mrs. Seeley, Public School, No. 12, Overing street and Denson avenue, Westchester. Friday—"Scottish Music," Mrs. Katherine Hand, West Side Neighborhood House, No. 501 West Fiftieth street; "Edvard Grier and the Scandinavian Songs," Miss Lennhorn and Miss Charlotte Horman, Public School No. 17, Fordham avenue, near Main street, City Island.

...ess ... BUFFALO, N. Y.

Not since Paderewski first came to this country has any artist so quickly and completely captured America as has Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that famous organization pays its annual visit to Buffalo on Monday evening, Jan. 25. Convention Hall should be filled to the doors for this concert, which will also introduce to Buffalo the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, Max Fiedler of Hamburg.

Elman's success has been phenomenal. Recently has has been the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in Boston, twice in New York, once each in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and on each occasion hundreds were turned away.

Dividing interest with Elman will be the new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, who was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg and the director of the Hamburg Conservatory, and who came over to this country last fall as the successor to Dr. Muck at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He met with instant favor in Boston and has proved a worthy successor to the great musicians who have preceded him, having all the exacting qualifications necessary to make a great orchestral conductor, and at the same time that rare gift of preparing attractive programs.

A wonderful program and one that will appeal to all classes of music lovers has been arranged by Mr. Fiedler, beginning with Smetana's charming symphonic poem, "The Moldau," followed by Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Pathetique," the greatest of modern symphonies and a work which for the last 15 years since it was written has held a firm place in the affections of music lovers.

Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto in D Major for violin and orchestra, one of the greatest of all works of its kind. Both the symphony and the concerto have been chosen in response to repeated requests from Buffalo patrons.

The program in its entirety reads:

The Moldau, Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle, My Country) .....Smetana
The source, the hunt, the rustic wedding, moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids, the broad river, Vysehrad motive.
Symphony No. 6, Pathetic, in B minor, op. No. 74 .....Tschaikowsky
Adagio, allegro non troppo; allegro con grazia; allegro molto vivace. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in D major for violin, op. 61.. ..... Beethoven
Allegro ma non troppo; Larghetto; Rondo. Mischa Elman.
Overture to Tannhauser .....Wagner

The seat sale opens on Wednesday morning at 9 o'clock at Denton, Cottier & Daniels', but in the meantime mail orders are being filled by the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place, who will continue to receive them until Tuesday noon. Prices are as follows: First 16 rows of Convention Hall, $2; next 15 rows, $1.50; next 15 rows, $1; rest of the hall, including the balcony, 75 cents.

MISCHA ELMAN.

The brilliant young Russian violinist will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 25.

WORLD,
New York City.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will constitute his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season.

...m NEW YORK AMERICAN,
...ress New York City.
...te JAN 17 1909

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts and these will constitute his only appearance with orchestra in New York this season.

TIMES,
...ess New York City.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20. Paderewski will be the soloist at both concerts, and these will constitute his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season.

...ress NEW YORK
JAN 17 1909

„La Savoie's" Passagiere.

Der französische Dampfer brachte politische und künstlerische Notabilitäten herüber.

An Bord des gestern hier aus Havre eingetroffenen französischen Dampfers „La Savoie" kamen eine Reihe von politischen und künstlerischen Notabilitäten vom Kontinent herüber. Als demnächstiger Kandidat für das Amt eines Mayors der Stadt New York wurde der frühere Polizeirichter Charles S. Whitman begrüßt, der mit seiner Gattin Frau Olive, geborene Hitchcock, von einer in London und Paris verbrachten Hochzeitsreise zurückkehrte. Herr Whitman lehnte vorläufig jede Diskussion seiner möglichen Kandidatur ab. Unter den Passagieren befanden sich ferner General Jorge Holguin, der frühere Vice-Präsident von Colombia, und Raöuel Dandurand, Sprecher des canadischen Senats. Die Pianistin Fräulein Germaine Armand, welche hier zuerst mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester auftreten und später eine Reihe von selbständigen Concerten in der Carnegie Hall geben wird, das für die Metropolitan Opera engagirte Ehepaar Crassi und Fräulein Julia St. Lillie, eine amerikanische Liedersängerin, repräsentirten das Künstlerthum an Bord der „La Savoie."

...ess ... JAN 17 1909

One of the greatest charms of Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist who is to appear here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall next week Monday night, is his complete and absolute simplicity. His art is as mature as that of a man of fifty. His mastery of the technique of his instrument is more complete probably than that of any other living violinist, and perhaps its like has not been known since Paganini. His musicianship is such as to win the admiration of such exacting critics as the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has played many times. Yet despite this, in every other respect but art, he is a simple, charming lad, who would rather do anything than talk about his art. As a matter of fact, when well-meaning but mistaken people surround him and try to get him to discuss his art and kindred subjects, he is bored to extinction and always manages to find some excuse to leave the room.

...ress Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
...e JAN 17 1909

Mischa Elman, at his next recital in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 28, will have the Bruch concerto in G minor as the important number on his programme. There will be a number of smaller pieces, including the gavotte by Gessed, which made an immediate hit with the public when he played it on the occasion of his debut and again at his first concert in the Manhattan Opera House. Elman has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for additional concerts in Buffalo and Rochester, where he will play with them late this month.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Künstler und junges Ehepaar an Bord.

Mit dem Dampfer „La Savoie" von der französischen Linie ist gestern der frühere Richter Charles S. Whitman mit seiner ihm am 22. v. M. angetrauten Gattin von der Hochzeitsreise, die das Paar nach London und Paris führte, heimgekehrt. Befragt, ob er in der nächsten Herbstwahl der Mayors-Kandidat der Republikaner sein werde, erwiderte er, darüber nicht mehr zu wissen, als was in den Zeitungen über die Sache veröffentlicht wurde.

Die musikalische Kunst war unter den Passagieren durch Frl. Germaine Arnaud, eine Pianistin, die in den Konzerten mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester auftreten und mehrere „Recitals" veranstalten wird, Herrn und Frau Grassi, die als Sänger für das Metropolitan Opernhaus engagirt sind, und Frl. Julie W. Lillie, eine amerikanische Konzertsängerin, vertreten. Bradford Barnett, Ensign auf dem Schlachtschiffe „Kansas" der pacifischen Flotte, befand sich auf dem Wege nach Washington, um an das Krankenbett seines Vaters zu eilen.

Unter den Zwischendecks-Passagieren waren nur fünf Italiener, die von dem Erdbeben weder etwas gehört, nach Angehörige verloren hatten.

[147]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ess BUFFALO JAN 17 19

A week from tomorrow night the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor and Mischa Elman as soloist, will give its annual Buffalo concert in Convention Hall and the seat sale will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels on Wednesday morning at 9 o'clock; but in the meantime the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, is filling mail orders and will continue to receive them up to Tuesday noon. Prices are as follows: First sixteen rows of Convention Hall, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1, and the rest of the house, including the balcony, 75 cents. Orders may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

It is by great good fortune that the orchestra is able to bring to Buffalo as its soloist, Mischa Elman. In a certain sense the orchestra has introduced him to this country, for he has already played eight concerts with it in the principal cities of the East and in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington he made his debut with the orchestra. It was largely because of this that his managers were willing to change some of his other engagements in order that he might appear for the first time in Buffalo under such favorable auspices. Elman has had the most remarkable success of any artist in this country since Paderewski first came here and he promises to take a place in the affections of the American public similar to that held by the great Polish pianist. He is to play with the orchestra the Beethoven concerto in D-major, the greatest of all works for his instrument and the one which demands not merely a high degree of technical skill but the highest possible degree of musicianship.

Interest will be divided between him and Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo for the first time. Mr. Fiedler came from Hamburg last fall as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, and it can safely be said that no conductor has had a more popular and genuine success than he.

Music lovers of this city will be glad to see again Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, who has always been a prime favorite in this city. Professor Hess was away from the orchestra last year on a leave of absence, which he spent in Europe, and his return has been welcomed by all patrons of the organization, for, in addition to being one of the really great violinists now before the public, he is unquestionably the greatest concertmaster in the world.

Following is the programme in its entirety:

The Moldau, Symphonic Poem No. 2 of the cycle, My Country.Smetana
The source of the hunt, the rustic wedding, moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids, the broad river, Vysehrad motive.
Symphony No. 6, Pathetic, in B minor, op. No. 74.....Tschaikowsky
Adagio, allegro non troppo; allegro con grazia; allegro molto vivace. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in D major for violin op. 61 ..... Beethoven
Allegro ma non troppo; Larghetto Rondo. Mischa Elman.
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ess

GENERAL SEAT SALE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

At noon today the mail order sale of seats closed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Convention Hall next Monday night and tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock the general seat sale opens at Denton, Cottier & Daniels' for the greatest musical event of the season in Buffalo. As everyone should know by this time, the soloist with the Boston Symphony will be Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, whose meteoric career is one of the marvels of the musical world. This will be Elman's first apearance in Buffalo and also the first appearance here of the new conductor of the orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, whose skill as a conductor is no more marked than his wonderful taste as a program maker. The scale of prices is as follows: First 16 rows, $2; next 15, $1.50; next 15, $1; the rest of the hall, including the balcony, 75 cents. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager.

...ess

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At noon today the mail-order sale of seats closed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Convention Hall next Monday night and tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock the general seat sale opens at Denton, Cottier & Daniels' The soloist with the Boston Symphony will be Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, whose meteoric career is one of the marvels of the music world. This will be Elman's first appearance in Buffalo. The scale of prices is as follows: First 16 rows, $2; next 15, $1.50; next 15, $1; the rest of the hall, including the balcony, 75 cents. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager.

THE BUFFALO EXPRESS,
TUESDAY MORNING, JANUARY 26, 190[illegible]

WAS INDEED A GREAT CONCERT

Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its annual Trip to Buffalo.

WITH A NEW CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler a remarkable Programme-maker and Mischa Elman is a wonderful Boy.

A splendid and uplifting musical performance was heard last evening in Convention Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its annual concert in this city. A visit from this organization is one of the yearly treats eagerly anticipated by musical Buffalonians, and last night's concert was of special interest in the fact that it introduced the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and a new solosist in Mischa Elman, the famous Russian boy violinist. A magnificent audience greeted the players, who came here under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

Mr. Fiedler is said to be a great programme-maker. 'Certainly, it was a splendid musical offering that he laid down before the listeners last evening. The list comprised Smetana's symphonic poem, The Moldau, from the cycle My Fatherland; Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, and the Tannhauser overture, as orchestral numbers. Mischa Elman played the D major violin concerto by Beethoven.

The players seemed to be in particularly fine form. Never, perhaps, has the purity and nobility of the tone in the various sections of the orchestra been more apparent or more delightful. When the conductor, after his inspiring reading of the third movement of the Tschaikowsky work, was applauded to the echo, he very courteously, and very justly, waved his hand toward his forces, and motioned his men to rise twice with him, in response to the overwhelming demonstration of pleasure.

The symphony and the overture Mr. Fiedler conducted without score. His readings were beautiful. He revels in sharper contrasts and more incisive outbursts than his predecessors, and there is less finesse, at times, than one is accustomed to hear from the Boston players. But there is a virility and life that is splendid and thrilling, that fairly makes the nerves tingle. Mr. Fiedler's climaxes are stupendous. He has also an unerring sense of proportion, and the melodic themes are always raised into due prominence.

Is a wonderful Boy.

Mischa Elman is a wonderful boy. With him, music is not an acquirement, it is an instinct. He has those "graces which no method teach, and which a master's hand alone can reach." His technical command of his instrument is almost incredible. There is absolute ease in the mastery of all difficulties. His tone is exceptionally large and full, often suggesting in its lower range the tones of a 'cello. It is also of peculiar sweetness, and has the charm that takes the listener captive, soul and sense. After his extraordinary performance of the concerto, for which the orchestra provided an accompaniment of the utmost beauty and perfection of balance, Elman was recalled a dozen times. Indeed, a minority of the audience, evidently ignorant of the fact that encores are never allowed at Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, kept on persistently applauding, and were taught a much needed lesson by Mr. Fiedler, who, with dignity withdrew, and remained out of sight till the obstreperous ones subsided, when he returned to the stage and went on with the Tannhauser overture. Last night's concert was in its entirety one of the gala musical events of the year, and its appreciation by the public, shown both by the large attendance and the cordial applause, was gratifying to all music lovers and patrons in the city.

THE BUFFALO COURIER.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1909.

YOUNG VIRTUOSO, GREAT ORCHESTRA, ARE DELIGHTFUL

Superb Offering of Finest Works of the Masters Makes Concert Red Letter Event of Musical Season.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS AS ONE MAN UNDER FIEDLER

Mischa Elman, the Young Russian Violinist, Plays With Genius, Tenderness and Passion and the Divine Joyousness of Youth.

The great audience that filled Convention Hall last evening eager to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, Max Fiedler, and the phenomenal young violinist, Mischa Elman, the Russian virtuoso, who has created such a sensation in the musical world, enjoyed a superb offering of the some of the finest works of the masters, and this concert will stand out as one of the red letter events of the season.

It is difficult to speak in adequate terms of the work of this splendid body of musicians who, under the masterly direction of such an eminent conductor as Mr. Fiedler, play as one man, and leave nothing to be desired in the way of technical proficiency, and the artistic skill which emanating from a true instinct for interpreting beautiful music with all its variety of expression, compels an irresistible response to every mood and sentiment.

Inspires His Musicians.

Considerable interest was felt in Mr. Fiedler's first appearance in Buffalo and he proved himself worthy of all that has preceded him. His reading was at all times the essence of dignity and musicianly intelligence, while he has the added gift of inspiring his musicians so that they seem animated with the spirit of the composer. The first number, a symphonic poem, "The Moldau," which is No. 2 of the cycle "My Country," by Smetana, was delightfully played, all the various movements being given with the adequate poetic beauty of phrasing.

Following this was the magnificent Tschaikowsky symphony, "Pathetic" in B minor, op. 74, and which is one of the most exquisite symphonies that has ever been written. All its sensuous, scintillating beauty, its tragic intensity and emotional ardor were brought out with wonderful fervor and fire and the alluring melody of the second movement was irresistible in its appeal. The storm of applause which followed it was ample proof of the delight of the audience.

Radiates Music.

Next came the sensation of the evening, the marvelous Elman, a youth of 18, who is already looked upon as the wonder of the century. Words have long since been exhausted concerning the genius of this marvelous young Russian, to whom the mastery of the most difficult compositions seems an easy matter. He combines tremendous technic with a temperamental fire that is astounding, and he simply radiates music in its most poetic form. He played the Beethoven concerto in D major for violin, op. 61, with a poise and musicianship little short of miraculous for one of his years, and left his hearers breathless with admiration. In the second movement his wonderful legato and flawless intonation were markedly displayed, while the entire nobility of the work received fitting treatment at his hands. He infuses the divine joyousness of youth into his playing and a warmth, a tenderness and passion that is well nigh overpowering. At the close the audience, which had sat spellbound, broke out into tumultuous applause and the young artist was compelled to return at least a dozen times to bow his acknowledgments.

The programme closed with the Tannhauser Overture played superbly by the orchestra.

THE DETROIT FREE PRESS:
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27

BIG CROWD HEARS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Not a Dull Note in Great Orchestra's Splendid Program.

Detroit's increasing interest in and appreciation for fine music was evidenced at the Light Guard armory last night, when Max Fiedler and the unapproachable Boston Symphony orchestra drew the largest house that has turned out for a Detroit Orchestral association concert since the organization's first season, when the Boston orchestra's concert was the chief attraction.

Mr. Fiedler is a master-conductor. He is free from the necessity of looking at the score and can therefore give his whole attention to the matter of interpretation. When one considers the limitless resources of the Boston Symphony in responding to a conductor's every shade of feeling for a composer's mood, and that Mr. Fiedler knows how to draw upon the innermost of these resources, it is not strange that last night's audience was delighted by what was offered.

Beethoven Quite Himself.

Weber's "Oberon" overture is no stranger, even to the most casual and occasional concert-goer; but Mr. Fiedler and his men make it a new thing in its freshness, its delicate play and its subtle picturing of fairy frolics.

And the Beethoven! That was Beethoven, quite himself, played with the most loving attention to the details that are inseparable from the best presentation of the master's works. No one can properly choose which of the symphonies is the greatest; with the concert of last evening fresh in mind, the opinion is that the seventh is the most beautiful, for it was that that they played.

No Dull Note.

Poor MacDowell's "Lamia" was played also. The public is indebted to Mr. Fiedler for the first public hearing of this work, never heard by the composer except in mental picture. It is a thousand pities that he could not have lived to hear it played as it was given last night. The "Tod und Verklaerung" of Richard Strauss, certainly not the most ultra of that ingenious composer's works, was heard with evident enjoyment by the audience. Two old and valued friends like the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser" closed a program that did not have a dull note in it.

It is perhaps too much to expect that there shall be more than one Boston Symphony orchestra in this country. But if there were more concerts given that approached more nearly the individual perfection of the performances that Nikisch and Muck and Fiedler have given here, there would unquestionably be larger audiences.

THE INDIANAPOLIS STAR,
THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 190[illegible]

COMES IN SPECIAL TRAIN

ORCHESTRA GIVEN COMFORTS

ORGANIZATION MUST HAVE BEST OF EVERYTHING IN ORDER TO PLAY UP TO BOSTON STANDARD—CONCERT HERE TONIGHT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of eighty men, will arrive from Detroit at 8 o'clock this morning for its concert at English's Opera House tonight.

The Boston orchestra travels in a special train consisting of three Pullman sleepers and a baggage car. The orchestra always travels most luxuriously, because it is a theory in Boston, the result of many years' experience, that unless the men have all the comforts that money can secure for them in a week of arduous traveling they will be unable to play as well as their reputation demands. Whether the orchestra spends a night in a city or not, rooms are always engaged at one of the best hotels for the men to rest in in the afternoon and to dress in before the concerts—and never more than two men are allotted to a room. If it is possible, traveling is done in the daytime, to avoid sleeping on the cars, but the same train of Pullmans is held throughout the trip. The orchestra will spend the day at the Claypool Hotel.

Never Twice a Day.

Under no conditions does the orchestra ever give two concerts in one day. If there is a concert in the afternoon there is none in the evening, and vice versa. Further than that it is only under the most exceptional conditions that there is ever a rehearsal and concert on the same day, traveling or at home. In the East, among the musicians of New York particularly, a great deal of fun is made of the way the management of the Boston Symphony looks after its men, but the management has found that it pays in the end. It costs more money to treat the members like artists and to provide them with every comfort, but the concerts given by the orchestra tell the story.

TRANSCRIPT
JANUARY 28, 1909

Here in Boston

Mr. Paderewski's symphony will be played for the first times anywhere at Symphony Concerts of Feb. 12 and 13. Mr. Fiedler will conduct, but Mr. Paderewski will supervise the rehearsals. In form, the symphony seeks the freedom of the symphonic poem, and the music runs in three long movements for an hour and twenty minutes. On the other hand, it has no avowed programme, though the finale is frankly built on the Polish national anthem. For the second number of the programme Mr. Paderewski himself will play Saint-Saëns's concerto in B flat. Thus, the whole concert will be his own.

Extremes meet in Mr. Fiedler's programme for the intervening pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week. First, the overture, "Fingal's Cave"; the scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the "Scotch" symphony will recall the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Mendelssohn, two days before. Then follows an intermission that, like those of the theatre, may represent the lapse of two or three musical generations, and thereafter, for the sharpest of contrasts, Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the most puzzling, striving and contentious of all his pieces. It is so long since it has been played here that it will be almost new, and after "A Hero's Life" and "Death and Transfiguration," there is no doubting Mr. Fiedler's exceptional power and skill with Strauss's music.

THE INDIANAPOLIS STAR,
FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1909.

ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON

GIVES CONCERT AT ENGLISH'S

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE, AND WILLY HESS, AS SOLOIST, IS RECALLED TIME AND AGAIN BY APPLAUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a new conductor, Max Fiedler, appeared last night at English's Opera House, sharing the honors of the evening with Will Hess, the concertmeister, who appeared as soloist.

A slight change was made in the program, the tone poem, "Death and the Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, being substituted for the final number, the overture to "Tannhauser."

The orchestra quite lived up to its reputation, adding to the esteem it is held in here through its previous engagements. In Mr. Fiedler the organization has gained a conductor of firm and convincing manner, and vigorous and intelligent interpretation. He is vigorous, yet dignified and imparted this spirit to the works offered by the orchestra.

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" opened the program, but the best of all was the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, Pathetic, which came next. This last work of the Russian composer was more than warmly received. After each of its four movements the applause was long and insistent. At the conclusion of the symphony, Mr. Fiedler was compelled to return many times to his stand and finally asked the members of the orchestra to stand and acknowledge with him the appreciation of the audience.

Hess Also a Star.

The Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, introduced Will Hess, the concertmeister, as soloist. The orchestra accompanied him, and so profound was the impression made by the soloist that he was compelled to return and acknowledge the applause so many times that the count was lost. It seemed that the audience would never permit him to retire. His work was brilliant and masterful. At all times he was at his ease and equal to the demands made upon his skill.

The final number, "Death and the Transfiguration," almost brought the audience to its feet as it reached the climax. It is a dramatic and inspiring work and was interpreted with such skill as to be convincing.

Under Mr. Fiedler the orchestra performed admirably. In its precision, sureness and technical skill the organization is as nearly perfect as men can make it. The seventy or eighty men played as one. The concert was a fitting climax to the season. It ended the subscription series of Mrs. Talbot.

[148]

THE COLUMBUS EVENING DISPATCH,

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1909.

FIEDLER AND HIS ORCHESTRA ARRIVE

Noted Musician Says That Distances in America Are "Appallingly Large."

A TRIP TO EUROPE

He Says He Would Like to Take the Bostonians to London, Paris and Berlin.

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra which is to give its annual concert in Memorial hall tonight, arrived from Indianapolis Friday at noon on a special train. With the orchestra came Max Fiedler, its conductor, Mrs. Fiedler, Professor Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and the whole party in charge of F. R. Comee, the assistant manager.

WENT TO THE SOUTHERN.

Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler went directly to the Southern, where as they were finishing luncheon, they were found by a reporter of The Dispatch, who had a little talk with the distinguished musician, who is now making his first visit to this city.

NOT A TYPICAL MUSICIAN.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra does not look like a typical musician. His hair is not long nor are his clothes strange. He is a well-built man of middle height with a stoop to his shoulders. His mustache is gray, likewise his hair, which is brushed back from his forehead, his onl yconcession to his art. He speaks fluent English with more of a British accent than German.

MUCH TIME IN ENGLAND.

That is probably because Mrs. Fiedler is an Englishwoman and he has spent much time in England. His face is kindly, his laugh ready and he wears spectacles through which beam brown eyes. Altogether he strikes one as a modest, unassuming gentleman, but one has not to talk with him long to discover that he is a man of ideas who knows what he wants and the impression is that he knows how to get it.

NOT USED TO NIGHT TRAVEL.

"Yes," he said, "I am a little tired after two nights on the cars for I am not very used to such hard traveling. You know in Europe, until one gets into Russia, where I have been several times, there is not much reason to travel by night, the distances are so short. Yet I must confess that the comforts of traveling in this country have not been exaggerated.

"AN INTERESTING PEOPLE."

"It has been a most interesting trip to me in every way. It has brought me into contact with many interesting and attractive people. It has shown me that here in the middle west the audiences for goood music are as keen and as receptive as those of th east. I understand, of course, that the Boston Symphony orchestra attracts the very best audiences that go to any concerts, and those audiences that I have seen so far in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit and Indianapolis have shown as much discrimination as those of New Yoork and Boston, and they have more enthusiasm.

"APPALLINGLY LARGE."

"The country, too, has ben most interesting. And it is so appallingly large! Here I am over 24 hours from Boston by a fast train and yet I am still in the east with the greater part of the country still before me. I think that what impresses the European on his first visit to this country, is the gigantic scale on which everything is built. Your great rivers, great lakes, your great plains, certainly make Germany seem very small to compare that country with this.

THERE ARE NO PROVINCES.

"And another interesting point is that I have learned why in America one never speaks of the 'provinces' as we do in England, speaking of the cities outside of London; in Germany of the cities outside of Berlin, and in France of the cities outside of Paris. There are no 'provinces' in the sense of the people being 'provincial' in this country as far as my small experience goes."

IN A HEALTHY CONDITION.

"What do you think of the future of music in America?"

"Well, you have now practically everything but creative genius and America has already produced some fine talent—MacDowell, Chadwick, Loeffler, Foote, Converse and Victor Herbert. You hear the best singers in the world, the best pianists, the best violinists. You have splendid orchestras. I am told that outside of the great orcchestras in Boston, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and Pittsburg, there are twenty or more smaller orchestras that are giving concerts regularly in the country. That fact speaks for itself. It shows a very healthy condition for music in America."

A DELICATE QUESTION.

"How do American orchestras compare with German?"

"That," said Mr. Fiedler, laughing, "is a delicate question. But I will say this. I wish I could take the Boston Symphony orchestra to Europe—London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, anywhere. No one need be anxious about the outcome."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1909

STRAUSS'S ZARATHUSTRA"

MR. FIEDLER TO REVIVE THE TONE-POEM

Its First Performance, Next Week, in Nine Years at the Symphony Concerts—Its Fortunes Among Strauss's Pieces — Nietzsche's "Zarathustra" That Gave the Composer His Programme — The Eight "Chapters" of the Music and the Corresponding Speeches in Nietzsche's Book —The Curious Close and Its Possible Discovery

For the first time in nine years, on Friday and Saturday of next week Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will be played at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Paur, with a discoverer's joy, put it once on his programmes here when it was a new piece, twelve years ago. Mr. Gericke once repeated it, and would have performed it a second time toward the end of his conductorship. As it happened, the first trumpeter, of whom the music exacts much, fell ill. The cautiou Gericke dared not trust a substitute and revised his programme. Dr. Muck, when he made choice of Strauss's music leapt from "Til Eulenspiegel" to the "Sinfonia Domestica." Thus Mr. Fiedler will bring "Zarathustra" back to the Symphony Concerts almost as so much new music. Admittedly, its place in the orchestral repertory, alike in Europe and in America has been precarious. It may be the boldest, and it certainly is, the most baffling of all Strauss's tone-poems. None has stirred more controversy; none has so often given pause and doubt to those who are eager to understand, feel and admire Strauss's music. Here in Boston we are fortunate in that Mr. Fiedler is to undertake the piece. His reading of "Ein Heidenleben" was remarkably lucid and persuasive. His performance was no less eloquent. The music —and again in "Death and Transfiguration"—seemed to speak with its full and its true voice. Above all the other tone-poems of Strauss, "Zarathustra" needs such vivid and vital utterance. It should put Mr. Fiedler to his mettle. It should confirm his distinction as the most persuasive conductor of Strauss's music that has yet come to our orchestra.

It is the custom to call "Thus Spake Zarathustra" philosophy set to music, with the "prose-poem" of like title, by Friedrich Nietzsche for its source, inspiration and "programme." Not at all, retorted Strauss in one of his rare remarks about his own work. "I did not intend to write philosophic music or to portray Nietzsche's book musically. I meant to convey musically an idea of the development of the human race from its origin, through the phases of its upward course, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of the 'Superman.'" There is no adjective for such an undertaking, whether it end in achievement or in failure. "Only a musical epitome of the creative processes of the cosmos!" writes Mr. Huneker succinctly and then sets himself to rhapsodic analysis. "The sneer against metaphysics set to music" —the favorite sneer against "Zarathustra" of those who dislike Strauss and all his works—"will not meet the case," remarks Mr. Baughan, the English reviewer, "for it is quite evident that Nietzsche's philosophy contains plenty of emotional 'stuff' as Wagner would have called it. It makes as good a programme as any other." Nietzsche had no mind to the logical upbuilding of a "system of thought." In "Zarathustra" his "Overman" quickly possessed his imagination and he spent a world of feeling upon him. For once, however, Strauss himself seems to suspect the need of explanation, and he makes Nietzsche give him a preface printed on the fly-leaf of the score and quotable in English in the translation of Alexander Tille. It is a part of the "introductory speech" that Nietzsche himself prefixed to his own "prose-poem."

"Having attained the age of thirty," it runs, "Zarathustra left his home and the lake of his home and went into the mountains. There he rejoiced in his spirit and his loneliness, and for ten years did not grow weary of it. But at last his heart turned. One morning he got up with the dawn, stepped into the presence of the sun and thus spake unto him: 'Thou great star! What would be thy happiness were it not for those for whom thou shinest? For ten years thou hast come up here to my cave. Thou wouldst have got sick of thy light and thy journey but for me, mine eagle and my serpent. But we waited for thee every morning, and receiving from thee thine abundance, blessed thee for it. Lo! I am weary of my wisdom, like the bee that hath collected too much honey; I need hands reaching out for it. I would fain grant and distribute until the wise among men could once more enjoy their folly, and the poor once more their riches. For that end I must descend to the depth, as thou dost at even, when sinking behind the sea, thou givest light to the lower regions, thou resplendent star! I must, like thee, go down, as men say—men to whom I would descend. Then bless me, thou impassive eye, that canst look without envy even upon over-much happiness. Bless the cup which is about to overflow, so that the water golden-flowing out of it may carry everywhere the reflection of thy rapture. Lo! this cup is about to empty itself again, and Zarathustra will once more become a man.' Thus Zarathustra's going down began."

Who Zarathustra was, and what manner of "philosophy" Nietzsche contrived for him, Mr. Tille indicates in his own preface: "The book," he says, "takes its title from the mythological founder or reformer of the Avestic religion. Zarathustra, whose name in its Greek mutilated form, Zoroaster, is familiar to British readers. . . . Nietszche has made some studies in Oriental religious literature, . . yet he either neglected Persian religious tradition or purposely in his 'prose poem' made no use of any knowledge he possessed in that field. The modern Zarathustra is neither killed in battle nor has he any sons who might carry on his work after his death. He stands quite alone, his only permanent companions being two animals, an eagle and a serpent. He is neither a historical nor a mythical person, but a 'ghost,' as Nietzsche would have called him, a type existing nowhere, and yet the incorporation of wishes and aspirations; an ideal reflected in a human image; a man as man should be in Nietzsche's opinion, and as he would have liked to be himself. . . . The scene of 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' is laid, as it were, outside of time and space, and certainly outside of countries and nations, outside of this age, and outside of the main condition of all that lives—the struggle for existence. Zarathustra has not to work for his bread, but has it without effort. His eagle and his serpent provide him with all he needs; and whenever they are not with him, he finds men who supply him. True, in his story there appear cities and mob, hinds and scholars, poets and cripples, but outside of their realm there is a province which is Zarathustra's own, where he lives in his cave amid the rocks and whence he thrice goes to men to teach them his wisdom, pointing away from all that unites and separates men at present. This 'Nowhere' and 'No time,' over which Nietzsche's imagination is supreme, is a province of boundless individualism, in which a man of mark has free play, unfettered by the tastes and inclinations of the multitude."

Strauss's tone-poem begins with an introduction that is one of the noblest passages in the whole range of ultra-modern music. The trumpets give out a theme—Zarathustra's—of sonorous majesty and strength, and Strauss marshals it in long-drawn and surging measures to a climax of tonal splendor. It is the rising of the great sun upon Zarathustra's mountains, and he also is rising in the might of the Over-man to solve the riddle of the universe and to proclaim the solution to all men. Then, presumably, Zarathustra "goes down" to be the teacher and the exemplar of mankind. Here Strauss begins to scatter short captions through the score, which are no other than the titles of sundry chapters (or "speeches") in Nietzsche's book. In the substance of those chapters, again presumably, lie the programme and the intended suggestion of the music. Thus, immediately after the introduction, Strauss inserts the caption "Of Back-Worlds-Men"—those who seek consolation in religion, and to whom Zarathustra has gone down to teach the "Beyond-man." Now Zarathustra had himself once been a dweller of the "back-world." . . . "Then the world seemed to me the work of a suffering and tortured god. A dream, then, the world appeared to me, and a god's fiction; colored smoke before the eyes of a godlike discontented one. . . . Alas! brethren, that god whom I created was man's work and man's madness, like all gods! Man he was, and but a poor piece of man. It did not come unto me from beyond!"

Thus was "The Great Longing"—the second caption—strong upon Zarathustra, and it became yet stronger. ". . . O my soul, I understand the smile of thy melancholy. Thine over-great riches themselves now stretch out longing hands! Thy fulness gazeth over roaring seas and seeketh and waiteth. The longing of overabundance gazeth from the smiling heaven of thine eyes! And, verily, O my soul! who could see they smile and not melt into tears? O my soul, thou liketh better to smile than to pour out thy sorrow. . . . But if thou wilt not cry, nor give forth in tears thy purple melancholy, thou wilt have to sing, O my soul!"

Then would Zarathustra sate his longings with "Joys and Passions"—the third caption—and in this wise he speaks of them to men. "Once having passions thou calledst them evil. . . . Thou laidest thy highest goal upon these passions; then they became thy virtues and delights. . . . At last all thy passions grew virtues and all thy devils angels."

Zarathustra recoiling in wild disgust and brooding solitude sings his "Grave-Song" —the fourth sub-title to Strauss's oboe: "'Yonder is the island of graves, the silent. Yonder also are the graves of my youth. Thither will I carry an evergreen wreath of life.' Resolving this in my heart, I went over the sea. Oh ye, ye visions and apparitions of my youth! Oh, all 'ye glances of love, ye divine moments! How could ye die so quickly for me?' This day I think of you as my dead ones. From your direction, my dearest, dead ones, a sweet odour cometh unto me, an odour setting free heart and tears. . . . Still I am the richest and he who is to be envied most—I, the loneliest! For I have had you, and ye have me still. . . ."

Zarathustra turns for wisdom and solace to learning. "Of Science"—is Strauss's caption for a fugal episode—and these are Nietzsche's words in the preaching: "Thou seducest, thou false one, thou refined one, unto unknown desires and wilderness. . . . Alas for all free spirits, who are not on their guard against such wizards! Gone is their freedom. Thou teachest and thereby allures back into prisons! We seem to be very different. And, verily, we spake and thought enough together . . . to enable be to know we are different. We seek different things, . . . ye and I. For I seek more security. . . . But, when I see the eyes ye make me thinketh almost ye seek more insecurity. . . ."

Still tonal tortures rack Zarathustra; but the orchestral violence begins to subside. His eyes are opening. Not through learning in the old sense, but through the new Nietzschean gospel of joy will he set himself free. Behold him "The Convalescent": "One morning . . . Zarathustra fell down like one dead, and remained long like one dead. But, when he again became conscious he was pale and trembled and remained lying, and for a long while would neither eat nor drink. . . . At last, after seven days, Zarathustra rose on his couch, took a rose apple in his hand, smelt it, and found its odor sweet. Then his animals thought the time had come for speaking unto him. . . . 'Speak not further, thou convalescent one! . . . but go out where the world waiteth for thee like a garden. Go out unto the roses and bees and flocks of doves! But especially unto the singing birds, that thou mayest learn singing from them! . . . Speak no further, . . . rather, thou convalescent one, make first a lyre, a new lyre! Sing and foam over, O Zarathustra; heal thy soul with new songs.'

"A god danceth through Zarathustra," and forthwith he breaks into his song of joy—"The Dance Song"—of Strauss's subtitle—"when Eros and the wood nymphs danced together in the meadow: One night Zarathustra went through the forest with his disciples, and when seeking for a well, behold! he came unto a green meadow which was surrounded by trees and bushes. There girls danced together. As soon as the girls knew Zarathustra they ceased to dance; but Zarathustra approached them with a friendly gesture and spake these words:. "Cease not to dance, ye sweet girls! . . . And I think ye will also find the tiny god whom girls like best." Beside the well he lieth, still with his eyes shut. Verily in broad daylight he fell asleep, the sluggard! Did he, perhaps, try to catch too many butterflies? Be not angry with me, ye beautiful dancers, if I chastise a little the tiny god! True, he will probably cry and weep; but even when weeping he causeth laughter! And with tears in his eyes shall he ask you for a dance; and I myself shall sing a song unto his dance.' . . . And this is the song sung by Zarathustra when Eros and the girls danced together. And there is 'holy laughter.'

And last, Zarathustra sings his own song of solemn triumph—"The Night-Wanderer's Song." Twelve times the bell sounds heavily:

ONE!

O man! Lose not sight.

TWO!

What saith the deep midnight?

THREE!

"I lay in sleep, in sleep;

From deep dream I woke to light.

FIVE!

The world is deep.

SIX!

And deeper than ever day thought is might.

SEVEN!

Deep is its woe—

EIGHT!

And deeper still than woe—delight."

NINE!

Saith woe: "Pass, go!

TEN!

Eternity is sought by all delight—

ELEVEN!

Eternity deep—by all delight!"

TWELVE!

The hour of midnight is the hour of death, and in the final measures of the tone-poem it is Strauss for himself rather than Nietzsche or Zarathustra who is speaking The theme of death struggles with that of earthly strife, and both succumb in a broken chord of C major. Then without any modulation the theme of the Ideal sounds in B major and the transfiguration is achieved. The theme of the ideal sways aloft in the higher regions in B major; th trombones insist on the cryptic unresolved chord of C-E-F sharp; and in the double basses and celli is repeated C-G-C—the World Riddle, and in this mysterious discord the music ends. Nietzsche is quite sure that he—and Zarathustra—have solver the world Riddle. Strauss is not nearly so certain. Plainly he doubts whether anyone ever solve it. Perhaps after much reading of Nietzsche and meditation upon him, he also has discovered that obscurity is not necessarily profundity. Some have said as much of the second half of Strauss's one tone poem.

Mr. Fiedler is solicitous of anniversaries; and he will commemorate the centenary of the birth of Mendelssohn, which falls on Wednesday next, at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. The chosen pieces from the composer are the overture, "Fingal's Cave"—Mendelssohn the artist in musical landscape—the Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"—Mendelssohn the fanciful tone-poet—and the "Scotch" Symphony—Mendelssohn the academic composer. Then Mr. Fiedler clears at least two musical generations, and ends the concerts with a performance of Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," an article about which is printed in another column. Admittedly it is less often played than much of Strauss's other music, and here in Boston it has gone unheard for nearly nine years.

The Virtuosi

Mr. Paderewski, who is certainly the most distinguished of living pianists has departed from custom and returned to America, though he made a long tour of the whole country only last year. He has come primarily for the rehearsals and the performance by the Boston Orchestra of the symphony he has lately finished. Incidentally he will give recitals in a few cities, and one to each. In Boston he will reappear next Saturday afternoon, at 2.30, in Symphony Hall, and he will not return here for further recitals during his present visit. His programme comprises Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue," the last Sonata that Beethoven wrote for the piano and Schumann's "Symphonic Studies" for solid substance and for the maturity of the pianist's power. Then follow four pieces—a Nocturne, a Mazurka, a Barcarolle and a Polonaise—out of Chopin; an "image" by Debussy, "Reflections in the Water" and a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt. Not before has Mr. Paderewski played any of Debussy's music here.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

...ber 23 ..... New York City.

NOTES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventy-six strong, carries its evangel of good music into the middle west next week. Fred R. Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, is in charge of the expedition, and the soloists are Mischa Elman, violinist; Mrs. Seabury C. Ford, soprano, and Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester will be visited in the order indicated. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, and the overture to "Tannhäuser" are Conductor Fiedler's battle horses.

Three of the programmes are peculiarly notable because of their length. Only Mr. Paur of Pittsburg is in the habit of giving such full measure in an evening. Here they are: Detroit, Jan. 26, Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Beethoven, symphony No. 5; MacDowell, "Lamia"; R. Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," and overture to "Tannhäuser." Cleveland, Jan. 27 (with Mrs. Ford as soloist), Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Schumann, symphony No. 4; MacDowell, "Lamia"; Sibelius, "Finland"; Verdi, aria from "Aida"; Wagner, prelude and "love death" from "Tristan und Isolde," and overture to "Tannhäuser." Columbia, Jan. 22, Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Tschaikowsky, "Pathetic" symphony; Smetana, "Moldau"; Sibelius, "Finland"; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," and overture to "Tannhäuser."

THE SUNDAY HERALD,
BOSTON, JANUARY 31, 1909

PADEREWSKI'S NEW WORK DESCRIBED

Symphony Will Be Played for First Time in Boston on Friday, Feb. 12.

THREE MOVEMENTS IN THE COMPOSITION

Fourth in Contemplation—Instruments to Be Used in Production.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Herald publishes today the first full description of Mr. Paderewski's new symphony, which will be performed for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Feb. 12 and Saturday evening, Feb. 13. Mr. Fiedler will conduct the symphony; the composer will superintend the rehearsals.

The symphony op. 24 is in three movements: I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro fuoco; II. Andante con moto; III. Allegro vivace.

The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed, and the parts were copied in December, 1908.

The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute of the composer to his native country, and it was directly inspired by the 40th anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute program for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form. It seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer endeavors to express the lyric nature of his race.

In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined program. It is in effect a symphonic poem, and is peculiarly in memory of the revolution of 1863-64.

In the opening of the movement is felt the spirit of social and political unrest, which filled the country prior to the outbreak of the war; the unrest of the young hot-heads, the youth of the nation, who longed for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counselled patience and caution, urged the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national anthem, from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken. The anthem is treated not unlike a dirge; it appears in a subdued, sad mood.

The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders, and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint distant trumpet calls—the summons to war.

Light-hearted, gay and confident, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which with their dark, heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet as the conflict progresses, it is gradually lost in the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are as shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher—lamentations for the fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written.

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement which will be a scherzo.

The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, a set of three kettledrums, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone, and the usual strings.

The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski himself invented. It gives the feeling of far distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the bass great drum.

The double bass sarrusophone was first used in the orchestra by Saint-Saens for his "Noces de Promethee" performed at the Paris Exhibition of 1867. The first appearance of the instrument in an operatic score was due to Massenet, who introduced the double bass sarrusophone in his "Esclarmonde," produced at the Opera Comique, Paris, in 1889. It was then said that the composer had added two instruments—one the sarrusophone; the other, the high pitched voice of Miss Sibyl Sanderson.

NEWS-DEMOCRAT

PROVIDENCE, R. I., WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A SPLENDID ENTERTAINMENT

The only too brief season of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts for the season of 1908-1909 came to a close at Infantry hall last evening, when the young French pianiste, Germaine Arnaud, came to Providence heralded as a virtuoso of marked ability.

Many thanks and much credit is due to Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, not only for the excellence of the work done by his players and rich treats afforded by the several soloists, but also for the happy selection of programs, which have unquestionably been sincerely appreciated by lovers of a class of music, which, unfortunately, is heard none too frequently in this city.

Last night's program, which was listened to by a large and representative audience, was of a somewhat popular class of music, if such a term as popular can be applied to music that is of a strictly classical school, or series of schools. The Weber overture to "Oberon" has certainly been popularized, not only by orchestras of all sizes, but by the better class of concert brass bands, and much as it has been played never seems to pall.

The overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," albeit of a much heavier and complex nature, is much in the same class, having been made familiar by the frequency with which it has been played, sometimes in a manner that has been a cause of suffering rather than delight.

Such, however, was not the case last evening, and the really beautiful music of both compositions was played as Max Fiedler players are able to play it when they really desire to do so, and they so desired last night.

Schumann's D-minor symphony, a work which, while not of great weight, possesses a charm which always appeals to the concertgoer who has a fair understanding of music, was given careful attention by Conductor Fiedler and received the most careful treatment at the hands of the members of the orchestra.

The performance of Saint-Saens' concerto in G-minor, No. 2, for piano by Mlle. Germaine Arnaud came as a surprise to those who were disposed to look upon the young French girl only as a player of some brilliancy, whereas she proved that if she cannot get claim to be in the front rank of virtuosi, she has an artistic future which should more than place her in the coveted position.

Barely over 17 years of age, she is really a remarkable player, and, perhaps, the most remarkable feature of this playing is her definite technic, so clear that her rapid passage work showed not even the idea of a slur. Rhythm and phrasing were as near perfection as possible, and in her whole work there was a suggestion of life and movement that was truly delightful, while there was no lack of delicacy where such delicacy was called for.

It was truly a magnificent performance of a splendid composition, and one that, with its brilliant changes of movements, afforded the young pianiste every opportunity to illustrate her more than marked ability. The burst of applause when Mlle. Arnaud closed her performance was far more spontaneous and warm than is generally heard at the symphony concerts, but it was most fully deserved.

The concert was certainly the best of the season, and there was general regret expressed that the season has been such a short one.

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1909.

STAGELAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third and last Boston Symphony concert of the season wil be given at Court Square theatre Tuesday evening, the 23d. For this concert the orchestra will make a special journey to Springfield from Boston returning the same night. The success of the two other concerts this year has been most gratifying to all interested in the welfare of the orchestra and there seems to be every reason to believe that another splendid audience will greet Mr. Fiedler on his last appearance. In fact, the success has been such that C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is making quite elaborate plans for the concerts next year and it may be taken for granted that the orchestra in the future will give three concerts in Springfield every season.

...ess .....

Two Musical Sensations.

Buffalo will have two musical sensations when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its annual concert in Convention Hall next Monday night, for the occasion will introduce for the first time in this city Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the new conductor of the orchestra, and Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, whose recitals are the rage of the hour. A boy of 18, Elman has conquered America as he did Europe, and not since the days when Paderewski first came to this country has any artist created such a furore.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Playing by the Orchestra and Mme. Germaine Arnaud, Soloist.

The end of the symphony season came with last night's concert in Infantry Hall by the Boston Orchestra. A fine audience was present, nearly filling the hall, and there was unwonted display of enthusiasm, quite justified, however, by the extraordinarily brilliant playing of the orchestra, the superbly virile readings of Conductor Fiedler and the remarkable performance of Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl, who appeared as solo pianist. Brilliancy was, in fact, the keynote of the concert from beginning to end. The interesting and thoroughly satisfactory programme ran as follows:

Overture to the opera "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120..Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

In the overtures to "Oberon" and "Tannhauser" last night's programme presented at one hearing two of the most beautiful and effective compositions of that class. Popular though they both are as concert pieces, there is this difference between them, that one is attached to an opera familiar from frequent representation, while the other belongs to a work which few people have ever seen upon the boards. The reason is not far to seek. Both "Tannhauser" and "Oberon" are packed full of beautiful music, but whereas the former is a strong and coherent play, the latter is nothing more than a dramatic scrap heap. Designedly so, too. J. R. Planche, the author, wrote many fine librettos and was capable of first-class work. We have it on his own authority that in compiling the text of "Oberon," which he prepared for Weber because the latter had a commission to write an opera for Covent Garden (this was in 1826), he felt that in order to make it a success he must pander to the taste of the day. This was of the lowest, according to his account. "Ballads, duets, choruses and glees," he tells us, "provided they occupied no more than the fewest number of minutes possible, were all that the playgoing public of that day would endure." The patience to await the working out of a dramatic plot was lacking, as indeed were the singing actors to carry it on. "I therefore wrote a melodrama with songs," declares Planche, "instead of an opera." Tastes have changed since that day, and Weber's fine music alone cannot keep "Oberon" on the stage. Fortunately, the remarkably beautiful overture is available for concert use, and when played as Mr. Fiedler and his men gave it last night, it is a thing to linger in memory.

An unlooked-for feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mlle. Arnaud in Saint-Saen's second piano concerto. The young woman is new to American audiences, though for a year or two past she has been winning laurels in Europe. Certainly she is a remarkable player, and when it is considered that she has but just passed her 17th birthday a most brilliant artistic future may be predicted confidently for her. The concerto itself is a fine, interesting work, with a solid first and closing movements between which is sandwiched a rippling scherzo of unique beauty. In the playing of the young artist there were many things to admire, astonishing power, a technic so sure and clean-cut that every note in rapid passage work stood out from its neighbor, plenty of dash and animation, all-sufficient delicacy where that was called for, and an unusually developed sense of rhythm responsible for delightfully perfect phrasing. Seldom has so spontaneous an ovation been drawn out in our concert rooms as followed Mlle. Arnaud's performance. She was recalled again and again, the men of the orchestra joining the applause of the audience, which to the initiated means a great deal.

Schumann's pleasant D-minor symphony and the brilliant "Tannhauser" overture, which completed the programme, received most effective treatment at the hands of the orchestra. It seemed at times, especially in the Wagner overture, as if the splendid band was fairly outdoing itself. It was the apotheosis of brilliancy, the perfection of virtuosity, the very Ultima Thule of style. The concert was an inspiring finish to one of the most enjoyable and successful seasons ever afforded us, and regret must have been universal that it has come to so early a close.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Fiedler and the Orchestra Keep the Mendelssohn Anniversary with Three Pieces, Two Living and One Moribund—The Contrasts of the "Scotch Symphony" and the Overture, "Fingal's Cave"—Strauss's "Zarathustra" for Ending

Mr. Fiedler is dutiful to anniversaries, and he began the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon with due commemoration of Mendelssohn. The pieces he chose were the overture, "Fingal's Cave," the Scherzo written to fill the interval between the first and the second acts of "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; and the "Scotch" symphony—the symphony to which the woful tale of Rizzio, murdered at Mary Stuart's feet, and the shrill and merry piping of competing Highlanders are said equally to have stirred the composer—the latter certainly to the more musical profit. The Overture and the Scherzo are of the enduring and the living Mendelssohn; and if one of his symphonies must be played—shall we say for dignity's sake?—the "Scotch" is oftener interesting nowadays than the "Italian," while the "Reformation" is altogether moribund. The pipers were surely Mendelssohn's friends if they prompted him to a Scherzo that still keeps its snap as of native Scottish music and of the good Scottish air. The tale of Rezzio, the atmosphere of the chambers of Holyrood served him less well. Mendelssohn, pressed by many concerns, deferred long the writing of the symphony, and he found the impulses and the memories of Scotland hard to quicken again. When they came at his call he wrote in the brightness of the Scherzo or the melancholy of the opening Andante. When they would not come, he could only take refuge in such music-making as the linked sweetness long-drawn-out, and without a drop of acid to it, of the Adagio or as the empty Finale. The glory of the overture, "Fingal's Cave," is the enduring freshness of suggestion in it. The Mendelssohn who wrote it had seen the land and the waters of the Hebrides, the dripping rocks, the vivid fields, heard the swish of the currents of the cave and felt the beat of sea and wind. The impression did not dwindle; the impulse did not flag; and the overture remains a tone-picture that the vividest and most suggestive of the moderns might envy.

Mr. Fiedler was abundanly dutiful, and in the symphony in particular he seemed resolved that Mendelssohn should "sound," and "sound" where he was weakest. The conductor had no need of anxieties or obligations with the other two pieces. The scherzo once more exemplified the beautiful irridescence, the gossamer lightness of tone that the orchestra can compass. The strings wrought in cobwebs; the wood winds sent fancy lights tumbling through the web; the conductor had barely to keep a guiding hand. Mr. Fiedler is, they say, enamored of Debussy's music; he has had opportunity to discover it in Boston as he never had in Hamburg; de descants lovingly of it. And meditation up the Nocturnes and "The Afternoon of a Faun" is apt preparation for the playing of "Fingal's Cave." There were kings before Agamemnon; there were impressionists in music before the other day in Paris. Mendelssohn had a certain chameleon-like quality in his nature, which was very sensitive and not very deep. In "Fingal's Cave," in all his wanderings in the Western Isles, he was as truly the impressionist as Debussy over his sea, and much more spontaneously and in much less mannered fashion than is the Frenchman in his "Symphonic Sketches of the Sea." The suggestion, the atmospheric quality—formalist though Mendelssohn was—that the impressionists cultivate is in the overture, and Mr. Fiedler, newly schooled in his Debussy, was the more adroit to express it.

To make the "Scotch" symphony "sound" is another matter. When dry bones must on occasion be rattled, why rattle them vehemently? And it is well to step lightly on the covers of hollows in musical, as well as other ground. To make Mendelssohn sound big and vital in what are really the small and moribund parts of the symphony, Mr. Fiedler made him sometimes sound rude. He deserved at least the euphony and the polish that are always in, even when he is the dryest. Mr. Fiedler might have glossed the cracks in the polish. Instead, he sometimes, especially in the finale, split them wide open. But Mr. Fiedler is one conductor in the music that he loves, that he apprehends to the utmost of his mind and feels to the utmost of his emotions, that stirs him deeply and honestly, and that he can make so stir his hearers. He came to such music in Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," that made the second part of the concert, and that was revived for the first time in nine years. The composer—and the conductor—began in something very like sublimity. They ended in beautiful and haunting mystery. Many ideas, many emotions, much music that was extraordinarily eloquent and much that was extraordinarily puzzling stood between. A second hearing—for "Zarathustra" was almost new—will clarify impressions that may be left for another article on Monday.

H. T. P.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, -

The next Symphony programme may well be characterized as a Paderewski programme, for it will constitute but two numbers, the first of which will present Paderewski, the composer, and the second Paderewski, the pianist. To Boston and to Boston's Orchestra has been given the honor of presenting this long-awaited Symphony for the first time. Paderewski expected to have it ready two years ago and to come especially to this country in order to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it, but what with his concert engagements when that time came he had advanced not far beyond his original sketches. Then last year came his long tour of this country, and it was not until the beginning of last summer that he was able to get really at work on it, and the end of last Decembef when he was able to write "Finis" at the bottom of the score. It is this Symphony which brings him to America this year. It will be played eight times by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, twice in Boston, twice in New York, and once each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By Olin Downes

Mr. Fiedler presented a programme of uncommon significance on the occasion of the 14th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The Mendelssohn centennial was observed by the performance of the "Hebrides" overture, the Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Scotch" symphony. But what a dastardly blow to the gentle composer's memory was the last work on the programme, Richard Strauss' overwhelming, all-embracing tone-poem. "Thus Spake Zarathustra," after Friedrich Nietszche. It is a wonder that the memorable performance did not wake Mendelssohn in his grave.

There are few finer overtures in existence than that inspired by Fingal's Cave. In it Mendelssohn is far more than the formalist in tones, the weaver of perfect patterns. It seems as if, contrary to habit, that adroit and polished workman forgot himself, sat down and said what was in him before there was time to cool.

So we love music that is vivid with color and sensation, salt and spray, and the pulse of the sea, yet is cast in the most symmetrical of moulds—a work that partakes equally and delightfully of the classic and romantic influences that were warring in the consciousness of the artists of Mendelssohn's time.

This and the sparkling fanciful Scherzo, a supreme masterpiece as conceived and scored, are more vital to the ear of today than the historic A minor symphony. The first movement of the latter work has a certain amount of "atmosphere" and pleasant melody, but one is waiting for that snappy Scotch tune of the second movement, and that tune gone, it requires mental effort to keep the attention fixed until the end.

Perhaps Mr. Fiedler desired to enliven the racial but rather superficial finale by a rough and drastic performance. Whatever his intentions, this movement was brutally treated. The beauty of tone upon which Mendelssohn would have insisted, and toward which end he designed his score, was too often replaced by coarse, harsh tone, and a general strepitancy that was uncalled for.

Strauss' colossal and fantastic tone-poem which seems to reach from boundary to boundary of human knowledge, made an immense impression, of which more tomorrow.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1909.

The Bonci Concert.

The musical event of today will be the Bonci concert in Symphony hall at 2:30 this afternoon. There is great interest in the coming of the greatest of Italian lyric tenors and the concert ought to be one of the most attractive of the season, for Mr Bonci's associates are of the highest class and the program is most interesting, being composed of excerpts from Italian operas.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 6, 1909

MENDELSSOHN MEMORIAL AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

BUT STRAUSS WAS ALSO ON THE PROGRAMME

His "Also Sprach Zarathustra," a Great Work, Nobly Interpreted by Dr. Fiedler.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—"Hebrides" Overture.
Mendelssohn—Scherzo from "Midsummer-night's Dream."
Mendelssohn—Scotch Symphony.
Strauss—"Also Sprach Zarathustra."

There are proverbs about yoking the ox and the ass together, also about attempting to mix oil and water, but there is none regarding the mistake of putting Mendelssohn and Richard Strauss side by side. It is said that Politics makes strange bedfellows; so, evidently, does symphonic programme-making. The juxta-position seemed unfair to both.

Of course, at this centennial season, we are having a shower of Mendelssohn, and there is danger of a slight reaction from the overdose. But there is enough of Mendelssohn left, even 60 years after his death, to assure his high rank. Pioneer, with Berlioz and Beethoven, in programme music, beginner of modern conducting (again with Berlioz), founder of the concert-overture, with Weber the chief introducer of the clarinette, there are claims enough on posthumous fame. Only the superficial critic will find his "Songs Without Words" of a saccharine monotony; they are built on one form, as is the human face, but they differ in their features, as does the human face. There are subtle points of workmanship in them that must forever interest the studious composer.

But we are not to write an essay on what Mendelssohn has done, save as it concerns the present concert. The "Hebrides" overture was considered by Wagner a masterpiece, and it is as spontaneous a work as any in the repertoire. The development of the graphic wave-figure gives suggestions not only of pensive loneliness, but sometimes speaks of a Highland storm, and sometimes of a warlike gathering of the clans. Mr. Fiedler read it with some caprice of contrast, especially between the chief and subordinate themes, but this rather helped than detracted from the effect.

Why the ultra-modern should go wild over the delicate suggestions of Debussy's Faun and then shrug his shoulders at Mendelssohn's fairies passeth all human understanding. The Scherzo, a very difficult work to play perfectly, was superbly interpreted. Here we may state that when it comes to musical humor Mendelssohn may fairly head the list. His dainty fun-making puts Beethoven's grotesque Scherzos, and Schumann's earnest ones, and Strauss's Rabelaisian ones, in the back-ground.

The playful overture to "Midsummer-night's Dream," which was composed at 18 years of age, is the only real masterpiece that was ever achieved by so young a composer; and this power of dainty humor never left him. At least in his scherzos he ranks with the greatest masters.

The audience seemed to think so too, for the applause seemed as if it would never end. It was pushed almost to the encore point!

It would be folly to contend that some parts of Mendelssohn's music have not faded out. But if our gentle reader will look out of the lower windows of heaven, a century hence, he will find that some of Debussy and D'Indy, and Richard Strauss and Mahler, and Bruckner and Elgar, will also have faded out.

But how royally well the clarinette is used all through this symphony! More than Mozart's E-flat it deserves the title of the "Clarinette Symphony." Perhaps part of this masterly use of the instrument came from Mendelssohn's friendship with the clarinettist Baermann (the grandfather of our own Prof. Carl Baermann), which led him to study the instrument carefully. The clarinettes were beautifully played in the sombre introduction (chalumeau here), in the brisk Scherzo, and in the lovely and lonely duet with bassoon in the finale.

Of course Mr. Fiedler cut out the repeat of the opening exposition—we do not need such reiteration in the 20th century—but he rather forced the contrast between the two first themes, making the second too rapid.

The Scherzo was the best part of the work. Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch, Volkmann, Robert Franz, and other German masters, have attempted to reproduce the Scotch song, and all of them have failed. Only Mendelssohn has succeeded. Spite of the apocryphal story of Schumann mistaking its meaning, no Scot but would find in this Scherzo the music of his native land. It is as Scotch as a Haggis. Then also the Finale gives a good impression of the Gaelic spirit of War, and a little of the sombre vein of Twilight in the Trossachs as well.

But the faded portions must also be mentioned. The "Storm" of the Coda does not in the least require an umbrella; the whole Adagio is a stream of alternating Eau de Cologne and Molasses; and the Thanksgiving of the final coda is not much better than the thanksgiving music sung at the revivals which are at present going on in Boston. Parts of the "Scotch" symphony have become cold Scotch—and without Soda!

After this, Zarathustra made a few remarks. They came about as pat as Poe or Coleridge would have come after Tennyson. As this tone-poem has been interpreted by commentators in many different ways, let us give our own impression of the real plot.

Zarathustra has been out very late; he is sleeping and snoring (deep tones of woodwind and tubas); the servant knocks firmly at the door (kettle-drums); he finally gets up, but with a severe headache (dissonances on all the instruments); now follows with a stern figure on the trumpets—"Also sprach Frau Zarathustra"—"Thus spoke Mrs. Zarathustra." He attempts an intricate explanation—the "over-man" now becomes the "under-man"—a fugal passage; Mrs. Z. still speaks (the figure of three notes is disagreeably persistent); he finally takes his hat and goes out until evening. He goes to a dance hall then for relaxation (dance themes mixed with bitters); the clock strikes twelve (gong); he now winds his homeward way. Arriving at his door (simultaneous chords in B major, woodwind, and C major, deep strings pizzicato) he finds that he has lost his key. He is left standing by Strauss on the doorstep, and the work ends thus unsatisfactorily.

But, all sarcasm aside, it was a great work and nobly performed. Mr. Fiedler is revealing himself as one of the leading Strauss conductors of the world. The complicated work was made clear in all its details; the insistent figure of three notes, which is so ingeniously developed, was never blurred or indecisive, or smothered out. The fugato was excellently balanced and not over-accented. The brilliant orchestration was made the most of:—

It cracked and growled, and roared and howled,
Like noises in a swound!

For all that, the remarkable applause that had greeted Mendelssohn's Scherzo was not duplicated, although the great performance and the remarkable display of development and orchestration certainly deserved it.

MUSICAL EVENTS TO COME

The next Symphony programme may well be characterized as a Paderewski programme, for it will constitute but two numbers, the first of which will present Paderewski, the composer, and the second Paderewski, the pianist. To Boston and to Boston's orchestra has been given the honor of presenting this long-awaited symphony for the first time. Mr. Paderewski himself will play Saint-Saens concerto for piano in C minor No. 4. These will be the only numbers on the programme.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8,

Mendelssohn and Strauss Share Symphony Program

Mendelssohn and Strauss shared the Symphony program Saturday night. In commemoration of the Mendelssohn centennial, Mr. Fiedler conducted the performance of the former's "Fingal's Cave" overture—one of the most notable examples of musical landscape painting—the scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the "Scotch" symphony. Strauss was represented by his tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the work in which the composer pays tribute to the genius of Nietzsche.

The Mendelssohn overture and scherzo were especially enjoyed by the audience. Parts of the symphony also had their delightful effects. Nothing was wanting in the interpretations. Nothing could exceed, it seemed, the graceful beauty of the performance of the scherzo; and this impression must have been in the general mind, for there was applause until the orchestra rose and acknowledged the compliment.

The Strauss tone-poem had not been played by the orchestra since 1900. In fact, this was only the third performance of it at the Symphony concerts since the work was brought to this country in 1897. Mr. Fiedler conducted enthusiastically, and the orchestra played as if inspired; and yet there were dull moments. There was no such overpowering impressiveness, on the whole, as was produced last month when the orchestra played Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9,

THE BONCI CONCERT

There is much anticipation of the Bonci concert to take place this afternoon at 2:30 in Symphony Hall. The coming of one of the greatest of Italian lyric tenors of the day and his celebrated associates in an operatic repertoire will prove of exceptional profit to music lovers.

Bonci is to sing some of his best songs, but there will be a strong effort made to persuade him to sing "A te o Cara," from Bellini's "Puritani." Bonci can sing this as no one else can. If the audience lets him get away without singing this they will miss a chance of a lifetime.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
FEBRUARY 7, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mendelssohn Program at the Symphony.

"Elijah" Will be Sung Tonight by Handel and Haydn Society.

Bonci in Operatic Concert—Recitals of the Week.

The 14th Symphony program, commemorative of Mendelssohn's 100th birthday, Feb 3, 1809, was made up of three parts Mendelssohn and one part Strauss. The overture, "Fingal's Cave," the scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the "Scotch" symphony represented the work of the great Jewish composer. "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the tone poem by the more modern musical genius, closed the program. Mr Fiedler certainly managed to associate composers whose style of work furnished plenty of chances for contrast, and though the German giant was shown to be fairly deafening in his wonderful poem, the gentler and charmingly melodic Felix of Hamburg awakened the heartiest applause by his beautiful wrought harmonic schemes.

All the Mendelssohn music is familiar to patrons of the Symphony concerts. The Strauss work has not been heard here since Mr Gericke's time in March, 1900. The dainty undulating measures of the "Fingal's Cave" overture impose a severe task upon the string contingents, the weaving figurations being reiterated at such length that precision of finger work is indispensable for making the "sound waves" clear and harmonious. The clarity of the strings throughout the overture was seemingly perfect, and in perfect accord were the shrieks and calls by the wood-winds, representing wild bird life among the caves.

In the scherzo, that elf-like tone picture of the romp of fairies and gnomes in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," merrily the flutes, horns, clarinets and bassoons chirped and chortled the opening measures. Did Bottom speak in the language of the ass? The bassoons seem to anwer comically in the affirmative and the patter of the bows upon the stringed instruments called up delightful suggestions of the trixey gambols of the sprites around Titania or her lord Oberon. Had encores been allowed Mr Fiedler would have been obliged to repeat the piece.

The "Scotch" symphony was played without a pause between the movement, which, although according to the intention of the composer, was almost resented by an audience inclined to express freely an appreciation of the performance of each section.

An impressive introduction led up to some splendid measures given out by the cellos, after which the ensemble was up to the usual standard. Of course the clarinet made a jolly diversion of the wee Scotch air, and the strings put in a few bars of Al staccato work in the scherzo. In the other two movements, the stateliness of the third and the rollicking, and sometimes pompous, measures of the last were all worked out in characteristic fashion. Mr Fiedler is to be heartily congratulated for his splendid readings of all the Mendelssohn works.

And in a different and almost awe-inspiring vein did he make Strauss speak his musical mind according to "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Massive in structure, incoherent, yet impressive, in its instrumental riot this poem compels admiration for its phenomenal construction and originality in its combinations of instruments and choirs. Pandemonium runs rampant through the score and the orchestra did full justice to all demands.

The new symphony by Paderewski will be played at this week's concerts. He will also appear as soloist in Saint-Saens' fourth piano concerto.

Paderewski's New Symphony.

It will be a Paderewski program this week at the Symphony concerts. There will be but two numbers, the first of which will present Paderewski the composer, and the second Paderewski the pianist. To Boston and to Boston's orchestra has been given the honor of presenting this long-awaited symphony for the first time.

It will be played eight times by the Boston orchestra, twice in Boston, twice in New York, and once each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. It will be played twice by the Theodore Thomas orchestra in Chicago, and once each by the St Paul and Minneapolis symphony orchestras.

The work is of monumental dimensions, lasting about one hour and a quarter. The first movement lasts about 25 minutes, so it will be more than usually desirable for all patrons of the Symphony concerts to be in their seats promptly.

The symphony is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with english horn), three clarinets two bassoons, contrabassoons, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1909.

BONCI CONCERT.

Operatic Arias Sung by Metropolitan Artists.

Large Audience Enthusiastically Insists on Extra Selections.

It is seldom nowadays that concerts of operatic selections are arranged without something from Wagner or Strauss being included so as to make a contrast between vocal declamation and pure melody. This enables the artist, one or several, to demonstrate abilities in different schools of vocal culture and at the same time defer to supposed public taste in these matters.

In the lyric field, according to the true Italian method, beauty of tone, flexibility and expression are required in the voice. In recent years, as newer ideas and abilities have been applied to musical compositions, it seems to be largely the dramatic expression first and foremost that is required, especially in German and the Russian works, the other attributes of the singer's art being of less importance.

But yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall there was a welcome variation from the usual style of concert program, one that recalled old-time affairs when belcanto and the Italian melodies, hand-organ tunes, if you like, were abroad in the field of song and the public heard music which could be hummed, sung, whistled or thrummed on piano and guitar. One-finger airs that appealed to the ear and could be distinguished from the present "babel of sound" frequently heard with resignation, but not too highly appreciated by the general public.

The concert yesterday was given by four artists from the Metropolitan opera house in New York. Bonci, who is generally recognized as the leading lyric tenor of the day, and who has won triumphs here in grand opera roles, was the principal in a group composed of Mme Marie Rappold, the American soprano, who is no stranger to Boston; Mme Marianne Flahaut, contralto, and Mr Herbert Witherspoon, the popular American basso, well and favorably known here in concert and oratorio. Sig Pietro Floridia, composer and pianist, contributed solos and provided excellent accompaniments to the voices. The concert was given under the direction of Mr Ernest Goerlitz, who has long been associated with the Metropolitan.

The program was as follows:

Duet, La ci darem la mano, Don Giovanni ..... Mozart
Mme Rappold and Mr Witherspoon.
Aria, J'ai perdu mon Euridice, Orpheus ..... Gluck
Mme Flahaut.
Aria, Una furtiva lagrima, L'Elisir d'Amore ..... Donizetti
Signor Bonci.
Aria, O tu Palermo, I Vespri Siciliani... Verdi
Mr Witherspoon.
Valse, Je veux vivre, Romeo et Juliette ..... Gounod
Mme Rappold.
Trio, Finale of Prison Scene, Faust.... Gounod
Mme Rappold, Mr Witherspoon and Signor Bonci.
Piano solo: (a) serenade, opus 1; (b) coquette, Valse lente, from opus 15; (c) march sauvage..... Floridia
Signor Pietro Floridia.
Aria, Che gelida manina, La Boheme.. Puccini
Signor Bonci.
Air de Salome, Herodiade..... Massenet
Mme Rappold.
Aria, Non piu andrai, Le Nozze di Figaro ..... Mozart
Mr Witherspoon.
Aria, O ma Lyre Immortelle, Sapho.... Gounod
Mme Flahaut.
Quartet from act IV, Rigoletto..... Verdi
Mmes Rappold and Flaubaut; Mr Witherspoon and Signor Bonci.

The audience was large and very generous in applause, and was rewarded for its enthusiasm with seven or eight encore numbers, each artist figuring in the additions to the program. The dozen selections were standard concert pieces, familiar to nearly all the auditors, whose enjoyment was expressed in unmistakable terms.

Sig Bonci's voice is one of great sweetness, strong in volume limpid and nearly impeccable in tone. In phrasing and tonal coloring his work is delightfully expressive and his skill in shading a long sustained note shows a remarkable command of lung power. Yesterday he sometimes displayed a little evidence of overwork, his voice taking on briefly a bit of cloudiness, but the "top" and other notes were generally beautiful in their melodic quality and opulent throughout the afternoon. And his right good-natured manner on the stage made his fine singing additionally enjoyable.

The pure, elastic and exquisite quality of Mme Rappold's voice made her contributions to the program splendid examples of lyric art. Mme Flahaut, a juncesque contralto, has a rich and powerful voice, with considerable skill in bravura passages, and Mr Witherspoon's deep basso is an organ resonant and melodious. Here were three artistic associates, fitting companions for the great tenor, and the result was an afternoon of great pleasure to many music lovers.

Special mention is due to Mme Rappold and Messrs Witherspoon and Bonci for their impressive rendering of the trio from the prison scene of "Faust," and, with Mme Flahaut, the famous "Rigoletto" quartet. Both magnificently voiced in harmony and sentiments. The solos need only be summed up generally, and that in terms of high praise.

Sig Floridia gave three charming little original pieces for his piano solos, and Mr Witherspoon sang one of his song compositions for an encore.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 10, 1909.

SYMPHONY HALL'S FINEST CONCERT

Singing of Bonci, Rappold, Flahaut and Witherspoon Pleases Large Audience.

Symphony Hall's finest vocal concert on record took place yesterday afternoon, the singers being Alessandro Bonci, foremost of all the lyric tenors; Marie Rappold, who rivals Eames and Nordica and Farrar for American prima donna honors; Marianne Flahaut, contralto, and Herbert Witherspoon, bass, all members of the Metropolitan Opera House Company. The accompanist was Pietro Floridia, who also appeared as composer and piano soloist. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Bonci, of course, was the brightest star. It is one of the great musical pleasures of a lifetime to hear him sing "Che gelida manina" from "La Boheme," the opera in which he made his debut here last year. But Mme. Rappold, fresh from her triumph in "Aida" the night before, gave scarcely less pleasure with her songs from "Romeo and Juliette" and "Herodiade;" also with her thrilling notes in the trio from "Faust." Mme. Flahaut and Mr. Witherspoon won encores, too, and contributed to the more or less successful part singing.

Mme. Flahaut, who was heard here at this concert for the first time, is one of the giantesses of the operatic stage. Mme. Rappold is no midget. The ladies kindly removed their hats when they sang with the diminutive Bonci.

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY 10, 1909

Symphony Hall Concert

That the public has not lost interest in operatic concerts of the old-fashioned type was amply proven yesterday afternoon, when the Metropolitan Quartet—Mme. Rappold, soprano; Mme. Marianne Flahaut, contralto; Herbert Witherspoon, bass, and Alessandro Bonci, the tenor—sang together in Symphony Hall.

Every vocal student in the city should have been present to hear Mr. Bonci sing Donizetti's "Una Furtiva Lagrima," and take his high C as easily and as naturally as a bird, in Rodolpho's air from the first act of "La Boheme."

Mme. Flahaut, who followed Mme. Rappold and Mr. Witherspoon after their singing of Mozart's "La ci darem la mano," with Orpheus' celebrated aria from Gluck's opera of that name, is a contralto of unusual power and richness in her lower register.

Mr. Witherspoon was not less applauded than his famous colleague, and the approval he gained was amply deserved.

Mme. Rappold was the worthy soprano of this excellent, though not perfectly balanced, quartet. She created immense enthusiasm with the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet." This trio was repeated. The "Rigoletto" quartet brought the printed programme to an end. Mme. Flahaut caused merriment by her sympathetic treatment of certain syllables in that noted ensemble piece, which was repeated. Mr. Pietro Floridia, musical director at the piano, contributed some pretty trifles of her own.

THE SUNDAY HERALD,
BOSTON, FEBRUARY 7, 1909

SYMPHONY'S 14TH CONCERT OF SEASON

Mendelssohn's 100th Birthday Anniversary Remembered in Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 14th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 3, "Scottch"...Mendelssohn
"Thus Spake Zarathustra".....Strauss

The selections from Mendelssohn's orchestral works were happily chosen. They are characteristically Mendelssohnian, and they show his finer qualities. In the overture he is picturesquely descriptive; there is a freshness of fancy, an appropriateness of color, something more than a suggestion of the scene that made a deep impression on him. The scherzo is an excellent example of the composer's nimbleness and grace. There are pages in the symphony that almost persuade the hearer into the belief that the whole work is a masterpiece, but in this symphony Mendelssohn's inexorable formalism appears and there are measures of the cloying sentiment that disfigures so much of his music.

All composers of rank have their mannerisms, and ironical Time turns into annoying mannerisms things which, when they are first heard, are hailed as original and delightful or impressive. There are few composers who can stand the test of a long program made up wholly of their works. Mendelssohn had his adventures in many fields, so that there is plausible variety in his case; but he seldom escaped from his set ways and his set speech. More aggressive individualities may not fatigue the hearer so thoroughly. The very sweetness and the impeccability of Mendelssohn in matters of form are more tiresome than wild irregularities of the creative and universal genius who is at times rude and coarse.

Mr. Fiedler read the overture, scherzo and symphony poetically and at times, as in the adagio, saved Mendelssohn from himself. The composer in this symphony too often is seen tempting a conductor to be sentimental. The orchestral performance was of the highest order in mechanism, euphony and romantic spirit.

Mr. Fiedler, having thus paid to Mendelssohn the tribute that was meet and fitting in commemoration of his 100th birthday, turned joyfully toward Richard Strauss, and led a stupendous performance of "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This "tone-poem" had been played in Boston only twice, and the last performance was nearly nine years ago. Mr. Gericke wished to perform the work some little time before his second departure, but only four horns were then available and the score calls for six.

On the whole, this tone-poem in purely musical value falls below the others that have made Strauss famous, or, as the more conservative would have it, infamous. The work might be described as a marginal gloss on certain excerpts from Nietzsche's singular book. The music seems episodic, in spite of Strauss' attempt to give it continuity by the repeated use of the motive, which is first announced by the trumpet, and by other technical devices. The opening measures are magnificent in their simplicity, overpowering, as though the heavens were unrolled for some celestial and triumphant vision.

The section that follows is beautiful, but after this and for a long time the music is labored and too often barren. Take, for instance, the section in which a fugued passage may reasonably be supposed to expose the futility, the emptiness of science. The exposure is more jejune than the thing exposed. Nor is the dance song irresistible. The orchestration of it is interesting; it excites surprise; but the chief impression made by it is infinite labor over an inherently vulgar theme. In the close is found again the greater Strauss, the Strauss that wrote the love music of "Ein Heldenleben" and of the "Domestic" symphony, the death music in "Don Quixote," the apotheosis in "Death and Transfiguration," and other superb pages.

It would seem that Strauss in this instance set himself to accomplish an almost impossible task; to comment in music on theories of a philosopher; to translate into musical language that which is not easily grasped in earnest reading. A hearer, if he contents himself solely with the title, must hear the music as though it were practically absolute, with contents only musical. In this case he will often be perplexed and at times bored. If he be saturated with Nietzschean philosophy he will be unable to idenity the majority of the passages translated or commented upon. The noblest program music is effective without the program.

Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for giving us another opportunity of hearing this work and he and the orchestra are to be thanked for a remarkable performance. In a Utopian concert and with a Utopian audience, a work of this character would be played twice in the same evening. It is better to speak with a certain diffidence concerning the merits of an important work by Strauss when performances are given at an interval of nine years.

ADVERTISER,
FEBRUARY 10

OPERATIC CONCERT JOYOUS SUCCESS

SIG. BONCI BRIGHT STAR OF AFTERNOON

Miscellaneous Programme Delighted Great Audience as in Other Years—The Dolmetsch Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

A large audience was in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, an audience that came prepared to enjoy everything and to encore everything. It was a delight to listen to a "Miscellaneous Concert" of the old-fashioned kind, with no orchestra present, no choristers, no phenomenal player, only an operatic quartette, four singers with good voices and plenty of enthusiasm.

It was pleasant also to listen to melodious numbers which made no pretense to present problems or unresolvable dissonances. The encore enthusiast, the horny-handed used his opportunity. Every singer was recalled three or four times, every number had a postscript. Besides the singers there was the accompanist, euphemistically called the "Musical Director," who also appeared as solo pianist in some of his own compositions. In order to come to vocal matters only, let us first say that Signor Pietro Floridia made a good impression as a composer, especially in his "Madrigal" sung by Mr. Witherspoon, and was agreeably fluent in the Salon-music of his own creation, which he played, while his accompaniments were excellently elastic.

The bright particular star of the occasion was Signor Bonci. His voice was in excellent shape and his fervor apparent in every number that he sang. How direct and enjoyable even old Donizetti sounds given with a good vocal method! After all there is nothing so essential to vocal music as a voice! A man like Dr. Wullner may excite for a little while with the substitution of dramatic effect for vocalism, but after a few thrills, a few hours of excitement, the effect begins to wane, perhaps even to become tiresome, while the charm of the good singer is perennial.

Signor Bonci did not spare himself, took his high notes (B flat and C) with splendid force and purity, in both his solos and in the concerted numbers his fine voice was under perfect control and was used most artistically.

At the beginning the other singers were not quite thawed out. The performance of "La Ci Darem la Mano" from "Don Giovanni" was but icy love-making. Then Mme. Flahaut doled out "I have lost my Euridice" very slowly and reluctantly. She evidently was not a good loser. The later episodes in the Rondo-song were taken more deliberately than we have ever heard it done. Later in the concert she sang the Sappho Stanzas, by Gounod, much better, with broad voice and good delivery, recored.

Mme. Rappold also was not at her best in the first numbers. The Waltz of Juliet by Gounod, was given with a rather too graphophonic quality of voice. Encored. But in the beautiful air of Salome by Massenet, the singer was in good form. There were Salomes even before the day of Strauss, and, in some respects, we prefer this old ditty to the modern nudity.

Mr. Witherspoon was excellent. Next to Signor Bonci he was the most effective vocalist on the programme. He sang Verdi's "O Tu, Palermo" with noble voice, encored. Equally effective and very spirited was Mozart's "Non piu Andrai." Encored. His voice also told out well in the concerted numbers. There were two of these. Encored.

The Quartette from "Rigoletto" was a good culmination of this palatable bill of fare. We wonder how many of the musical impressionists of the present could achieve such a dramatic effect in tones, combine so much of beauty with so true a dramatic effect. The laughing and coquettish Gilda, the heartbroken Gilda, the shattered wooer and the revengeful father are all perfectly protrayed, yet vocal beauty is not in the least sacrificed, nor ugly dissonances employed to emphasize the intense picture. Long ago the conservative head of the Leipsic Conservatory, Reinecke, said to the present writer,—"You may sneer at Verdi as much as we please, but any one of us Germans would have been proud to write the quartette in 'Rigoletto.'"

As the quartette lined up for action one could not but be amused by the grotesque presentation of the long and the short of it, but this physical disparity of size was lost sight of when the glorious singing began. Both this quartette and the closing final trio from Gounod's "Faust," which was sung with an enthusiasm that was contagious to be caught by the audience. The latter had a few suspicious notes in the closing ending at its first performance, but in repetition of it (encored) went perfectly.

Therefore Manager Mudgett has achieved a difficult task; he has resuscitated the "miscellaneous concert," but with some points of difference. We can well remember what this was in the old Maplesonic and Strakosch days. Then it always began at least half-an-hour late. General admission house was nearly empty. If the audience was large there were many parties in the three dollar cloaks in the three dollar seats. Such a concert used to last about four hours. Manager Mudgett can properly say—"Nous avons change tout cela!"

[152]

OPERATIC CONCERT.

Arias Sung by Members of the Metropolitan Opera House Company.

BY PHILIP HALE.

A concert was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by Mmes. Marie Rappold and Marianne Flahaut and Messrs. Bonci and Witherspoon, all members of the Metropolitan opera company of New York. Pietro Floridia, the musical director, was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Donizetti, "Una furtiva lagrima"; Puccini, "Che gelida manina" (Mr. Bonci); Gounod, waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet"; Massenet, "Il est doux" (Mme. Rappold); Gluck, "J'ai perdu mon Euridice"; Gounod, stanzas from "Sapho" (Mme. Flahaut); Verdi, "O Tu Palermo"; Mozart, "Non piu andral" (Mr. Witherspoon), Concerted pieces; Mozart, "La ci darene la mano" (Mme. Rappold and Mr. Witherspoon); Gounod, Trio from the Prison Scene, "Faust" (Mme. Rappold, Messrs. Bonci and Witherspoon); Verdi, quartet from "Rigoletto." Mr. Floridia played his own piano pieces, Serenade, "Coquette," valse lente and "March Sauvage."

This quartet, now on an extended tour, gave its first concert here. The concert was one of a kind that some had supposed extinct in New York and Boston except on Sunday nights atthe opera houses of the former city. Each singer was of course aimably disposed and each was thoughtfully provided with an extra song or two in case of compelling applause.

These opera singers sensibly sang arias with which they have long been familiar; they did not attempt to give a recital of songs, although songs were heard as "encore pieces." Of course the arias were less effective than they are in the operas to which they belong, and the singers missed the orchestra, the action and the stimulating atmosphere of the opera house. Nevertheless the concert gave much pleasure to an audience of good size, though it was by no means a "prima donna audience."

There was an excellent opportunity of studying the rare vocal art of Mr. Bonci, who is by all odds the most accomplished singer of the great Italian school that has visited us for many years, probably the most distinguished since Adelina Patti was at the height of her glory. Other tenors have had, and have, golden or resonant voices; no tenor of recent years has so flawless a style; no one is so thoroughly a master of the art of "bel canto." In attack, in the management of breath, in the ability to swell and diminish a tone, in maintaining a perfect legato, in musical and expressive phrasing, and in the purity of his style, Mr. Bonci stands alone. He sang yesterday as conscientiously as though he were in a crowded opera house.

Mme. Rappold was heard here earlier in the season at a Symphony Concert. Yesterday her voice was freer and her expression more spontaneous in Schubert's "Haiden-Roeslein" than in the two arias. Her performance of Juliet's waltz-air was labored, heavy-footed. Mme. Flahaut, who sang here for the first time, is a heroic apparition. She is a Belgian by birth, but surely in descent she belongs to the Anakims, called by the Moabites the Emims. Mr. Witherspoon, who is not a shrimp, seems short beside her. She carries herself with dignity and grace. It would be a pleasure to see her as Amneris. Her voice is of a somewhat sombre quality, except in the upper register, where it is shrill; or it might be said that she has two voices. She sang the Stanzas of Sappho better than Gluck's air, and her voice and art were still more pleasing in the song that she added to the program.

Mr. Witherspoon gave a dignified and otherwise effective interpretation of Verdi's air, and a capital performance of "Non piu andral." His sonorous and agreeable voice was well controlled and his phrasing was intelligent. "Mother o' mine" was sung by him with quiet authority and sincere fervor. Mr. Floridia accompanied discreetly. His piano pieces are frankly salon music. A madrigal by him, sung by Mr. Witherspoon, has distinction. The Trio and the Quartet aroused the audience to enthusiasm, as did the singing of Mr. Bonci. The other singers were generously applauded.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor and Mischa Elman as soloist will give its annual Buffalo concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 25th. The sale of seats is now in progress at Denton-Cottier & Daniels. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager.

It is by great good fortune that the orchestra is able to bring to Buffalo as its soloist, Mischa Elman. In a certain sense the orchestra has introduced him to this country, for he has already played eight concerts with it in the principal cities of the east in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington he made his debut with the orchestra.

Interest will be divided between him and Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo for the first time. Mr. Fiedler came from Hamburg last fall as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, and it can safely be said that no conductor has had a more popular and genuine success than he.

Of the orchestra little need be said now to Buffalonians, for they are about to hear it for the fourth time in four years. Now, as since the day it was organized in 1881, it is the leading orchestra in America and it is really a question whether there is an orchestra in Europe which will stand comparison with it. Mr. Fiedler has said that he knows of no orchestra in Europe that has the tone quality and the technique of the Boston Symphony and he has conducted as "guest" practically all the great orchestras of the continent and in London.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1 .....

ess .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND BOY VIOLINIST MONDAY

It looks as if the record-breaking house of the season would greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that famous organiation gives its concert in Convention Hall next Monday evening. Many reservations have already been made by mail from the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, and this morning at 9 o'clock the general seat sale opens at Denton, Cottier & Daniels'.

Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, will be the solo[illegible]. As he conquered Europe, so now this little Jewish boy of 18 is conquering America. This will be his first appearance in Buffalo and also the first appearance here of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has made a tremendous impression upon the music-loving public since he came to America three months ago.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mischa Elman Seat Sale Today.

It looks as if the record-breaking house of the season would greet the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that famous organization gives its concert in Convention Hall next Monday evening. Many reservations have already been made by mail from the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, and this morning the general sale opens at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. The prices are: First sixteen rows, $2; next fifteen rows, $1.50; next fifteen, $1. The rest of the hall, including the balcony, 75 cents.

Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, will be the soloist. As he conquered Europe, so now this little Jewish boy of eighteen is conquering America. This will be his first appearance in Buffalo and also the first appearance here of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has made a tremendous impression upon the music-loving public since he came to America three months ago.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON MONDAY NIGHT

Buffalo will have two musical sensations when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert in Convention Hall next Monday night, for this occasion will introduce for the first time in this city Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the new conductor of the orchestra, and Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist whose recitals are the rage of the hour. A boy of 18, Elman has conquered America as he did Europe and not since the days when Paderewski first came to this country has any artist created such a furore.

The seat sale for this, the biggest musical event of the year, is in progress at Denton, Cottier & Daniels', prices ranging from $2 to 75 cents.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

lress .....

e .....

MUSICAL MARVEL.

The young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Monday evening next.

Those who heard Elman abroad have prophesied that he would prove a great musical sensation. This prophecy seems to have been justified. The little Jewish boy of 18 years has created a furore wherever he has appeared, and it is expected that Buffalo music-lovers also will go wild over his playing, especially when he gives the Beethoven concerto, the truest test of a violinist's art.

[153]

ROCHESTER, N.

JAN 22 1909

THE REALM OF MUSIC

Tuesday Musicale to Give School Concerts—Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming—Musical Notes.

The Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Convention Hall next Saturday evening at 8:15 o'clock, promises to be especially notable, as it brings to Rochester for the first time Mischa Elman, the astonishing young Russian violinist who has been making a greater storm in the musical world world than any artist that has come to America since Paderewski's debut 18 years ago.

The orchestra will be heard for the first time in Rochester under the direction of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who came to America last fall as the successor of Mr. Muck. It may safely be said that no conductor has had more popular success than this modest, unassuming man. He is one of the few really great conductors in the world and in addition to this is one of the very few conductors who has the talent for making always interesting programmes.

The programme he has arranged for Rochester may be accepted as an illustration of this. It begins with Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," which is followed by the greatest of modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique." Then Elman will play the greatest of all concertos for violin, that by Beethoven, and the final number will be "Tannehauser" overture.

Smetana's "The Moldau" is one of six symphonic poems written by this Czech genius to celebrate his beloved fatherland, Bohemia. It is inspired by the great river about which is entwined so much Bohemian legend. It is one of the mockeries of fate that the composed never heard this nor any other of his great works, for he became totally deaf when comparatively a young man.

Of the "Pathetic Symphony" of Tschaikowsky more has been written than of almost any other modern work. It is a poor critic who has not attempted his own interpretation of this tone tragedy and yet now we know that however much it might have been an expression of the composer's soul-state, he was never happier in all his life than when he wrote it, never in better health and never had less idea that death was near to him. It is a tragic coincidence that his brother sugegsted the title of the work and still more tragic coincidence that the composer was carried off by cholera just after its first performance. These coincidences have served to build up about it a tradition which will never be quite wholly destroyed.

The Beethoven concerto, unapproachable in beauty and dignity, is today the standard by which all other concertos must be judged and all violinists get their final standing as musicians by their manner of playing it. Elman, youth that he is, gives a performance of this which can be compared only with those of the greatest masters the world has known.

The "Tannhauser" overture needs no ntroduction, save to impress upon the public once more that it is the greatest of operatic overtures.

Mr. Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of the modern day musicians, who has won fame and distinction, not only by his conscientious work, but by his ability to lead and direct. Assuming his present position of honor as director of one of the most famous organizations of musicians early in the autumn, he won the confidence of his men at once by his keen knowledge of music in general and their individual work. He also has the artistic feeling which enables him to interpret the great masters with satisfaction before the most able critics.

NEW YORK HERALD,

m .....

lress ..... New York City.

e .....

Miss Arnaud's American Debut.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—Miss Germaine Arnaud, a talented French pianist, made her début in America this afternoon at a public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As Miss Arnaud is only seventeen years old, she is said to be the youngest soloist who ever appeared with the famous Boston musicians. She justified her reputation, and especially by her playing of Saint-Saëns' concerto in G minor, No. 2. She was recalled eight times at the conclusion of her performance. In addition to a mastery of technique, she plays with brilliancy.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 23 1909

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday morning on the German liner Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and his eighth concerto tour of America will begin almost immediately. Owing to the great demand for concerts by him, C. A. Ellis, of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to prolong his stay in America until April 1 and in that time he will make forty appearances, twelve of which will be th orchestras. The others will be recitals. His first appearance here will be as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, February 19. He will also appear in recital at the Academy of Music on Monday afternoon, March 1.

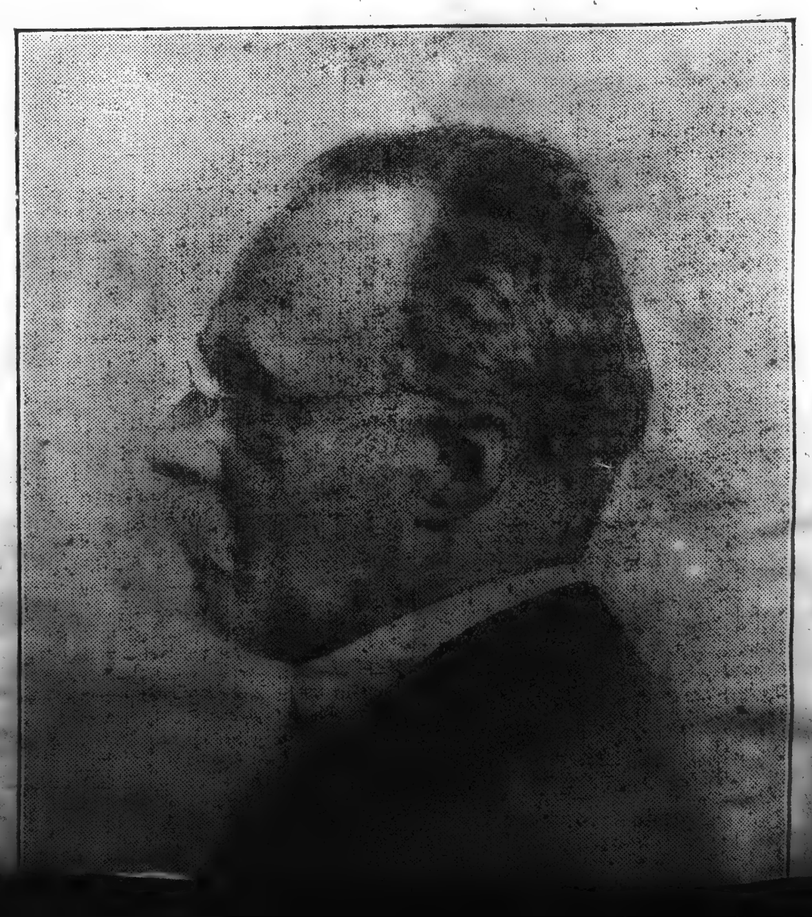
Max Fiedler



Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Name
Address INDIANAPOLIS, IND
Date JAN 23 1909

AMERICA'S GREATEST ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

COMING OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY THURSDAY NIGHT.

INTEREST IN NEW LEADER

The coming week is made notable by what now may be regarded as the annual concert in Indianapolis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This city is one of the favored few, for in its season of thirty odd weeks, this celebrated organization finds time to give only a week to the middle West, and that it has taken the habit of coming to Indianapolis each year, speaks much for the musical loving public of this city. The orchestra leaves Boston Sunday night and goes to Buffalo, where it will give its first concert Monday night. Then it will give concerts in Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester, returning to Boston after the Rochester concert. The sale of seats for the concert opens Monday morning at the box office of English's Opera-house.

Interest in New Conductor.

Interest in this year's concert will center chiefly in Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who came from Hamburg last fall to succeed Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler brought with him the reputation of being one of the few really great conductors of Europe, and this reputation he has more than vindicated by his success in America this season. It may safely be said that no conductor that ever came to this country has won popular favor to a greater degree than this modest, quiet gentleman who came without preliminary puffing and was satisfied to let his work speak for itself. Incidentally, Mr. Fiedler has shown that he has, to a rare degree, the faculty of making attractive programs. Curiously enough this faculty is seldom found in great conductors and when it is found it is all the more valuable.

Indianapolis will welcome as soloist, Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, and one of the great violin virtuosi of the world. Last year Professor Hess was not with the orchestra, being in Europe on a leave of absence, and during that time his services were constantly in demand as soloist in the larger cities of Great Britain and the continent.

Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

The program which Mr. Fiedler has made for Indianapolis is a vivid illustration of his success in this direction. It comprises five works. Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony; Max Bruch's concerto in G-minor for violin; a Richard Strauss number, the love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhæuser." Beethoven's "Egmont" overture is one of the imperishable masterpieces of musical literature. It was a part of the incidental music that Beethoven wrote to Goethe's play, which consisted of this overture, four entr'actes, two songs sung by Claerchen and the "Triumph Symphony"—nine numbers in all, which was played for the first time with the tragedy at the Hofburg Theater, May 24, 1810. The tragic story of the gallant Egmont as outlined by Goethe, appealed strongly to Beethoven's imagination, and this overture is regarded as one of the greatest examples of tragic expression in music that the world possesses.

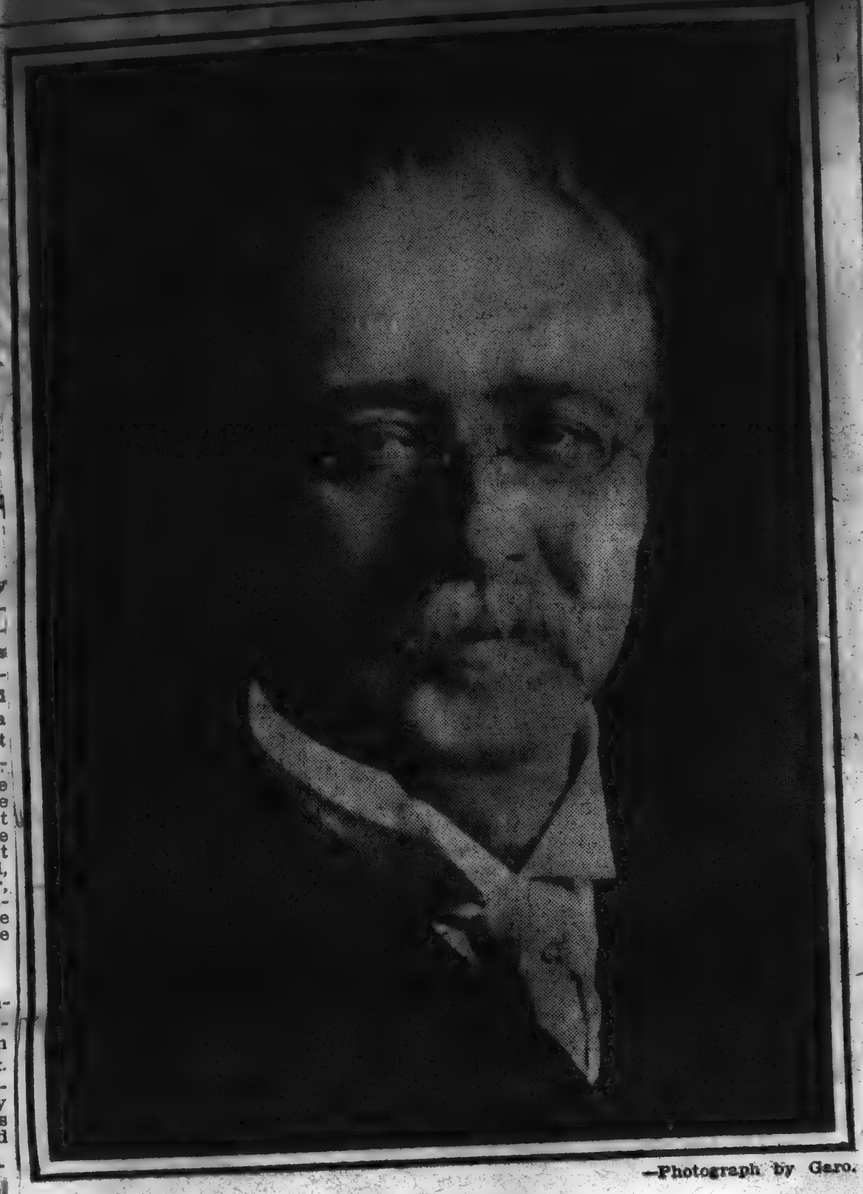
Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is always welcomed by lovers of the best in music. Although the composer's brother, Modeste, has given a death blow to the fancifully tragic story that Tschaikowsky wrote this symphony in premonition of approaching death, and that this may be regarded as his "conscious swan song," the tradition will endure for long in the popular mind. It will always be difficult to dissassociate the overwhelming despair found in the last movement, "adagio lamentoso," from the fate which so soon after the completion of the work, robbed the world of a great genius. We know now that Modeste Tschaikowsky suggested the name "Pathetic," his brother being at a loss for an appropriate title. We know now that death was never so far distant from the mind of the composer as it was when he wrote the symphony; that he was in better health and spirits than he had been in years, and that he was full of plans for the future. Yet, despite the destruction of the tradition, the fact that the composer lived long enough only to direct the first performance of this, his greatest work, and that he was swept away without warning by the cholera, will make it always in the mind of the public the great tragical work of symphonic literature.

Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra is a masterpiece of its kind. It is probably the best example of the "violin concerto" that we have. This does not mean that Bruch, himself, was a violinist, but it means that he succeeded in writing one of the most grateful pieces for that instrument that musical literature contains. It shows every good quality the instrument possesses. It demands of its performer plentiful technique and smooth, flowing cantilena and a round, mellow tone. It is full of rich melody and graceful ornamentation.

The final number, the "Tannhæuser" overture, stands to-day, as when it was written, as being one of the finest specimens of dramatic overtures the world possesses, and its popularity has never been seriously disputed by any other work of its kind.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR



—Photograph by Gero.

MAX FIEDLER.

Will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at English's Opera-house next Thursday night.

From
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date JAN 23 1909

Germany, barring the works of the unique Strauss, continues to produce compositions expert in workmanship and of surpassing unimportance: music which recalls a reference once made by President Eliot to "the intellectual economy of most Episcopal sermons"—save that contemporary Teutonic music exhibits rather an economy of inspiration than of cerebral expenditure. The newest emanation in this field to come under immediate observation is a theme with variations, for orchestra, by one Heinrich Gottlieb Noren (born at Gratz in 1863, now living at Loschwitz, in the neighborhood of Dresden), which the Boston Symphony Orchestra displayed in New York on January 7th, under the guidance of Mr. Fiedler.

Mr. Noren titles his composition Kaleidoscope. The music is said to date from the years 1904–07. It was first performed at Dresden in the summer of 1907, and it subsequently made its composer famous, largely because the introduction, in one of the variations, of two themes quoted (with acknowledgment) from Richard Strauss's Heldenleben, caused Strauss's publisher to institute a lawsuit for violation of copyright. The trial resulted in one of the most delectable verdicts ever recorded. The section of the copyright law which Noren was charged to have violated declares that "from a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody and incorporate it in a new work." The matter was submitted to a jury of alleged experts, who gravely decided—to the unseemly delight of those who do not love the music of Strauss—that, inasmuch as neither of the themes which Noren had borrowed from Heldenleben was a melody, he could not be said to have violated the law: whereupon he was permitted to publish his score. Yet, after hearing the work, it is easy to feel that Strauss's publisher was justified in his objection; for the variation in which Noren disports his borrowed plumes yields the only important passages in the score. Elsewhere the music is a triumph of ingenious banality, a dexterous web of commonplaces. The variations are mildly pictorial and suggestive. They contain a "Præambulum," a "Mournful Dance," a cannon, a scherzo, — "Humor," —a section called "In the Cathedral," a "Pastorale," a "Funeral March," a Slavic dance, a section called "From Far-off Days," a mazurka, and the disputed variation in which Strauss is paraphrased: "To a Famous Contemporary." The last is at once the most ingenious and the most engrossing. The "Funeral March" has striking moments; "From Far-off Days" is agreeably sentimental; the Cathedral scene has a certain easily wrought impressiveness; the rest is inconsequential. Mr. Noren has a deal of ingenuity, and he is fluent and facile; but of imaginative power or original thought he gives no sign. The work will in all likelihood be popular; for it adheres to familiar paths, and it makes no disconcerting demand for co-operative imagination on the part of the hearer.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist now visiting America

It was beautifully played by Colonel Higginson's remarkable orchestra.

EVENING MAIL
New York City.
JAN 23

Paderewski's Tour.

Paderewski, who will arrive Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, will give his New York recital in Carnegie hall February 2, in the afternoon. Owing to the demand for his appearances C. A. Ellis, of Boston, his manager, announces that he will remain in this country until the end of March, and will make forty appearances, instead of twenty, as originally planned. His only orchestral appearances, however, will be with the Boston Symphony orchestra February 18 and 20, when he will be the soloist for both of the concerts.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 23 1909

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday morning, and his eighth concert tour of America will begin almost immediately. Owing to the great demand for concerts by him, C. A. Ellis of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to prolong his stay in America until April 1, and in that time he will give forty concerts, twelve of which will be with orchestras. The others will be recitals. His first appearance will be as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening, February 19. He will also appear in a recital at the Academy of Music on Monday afternoon, March 1. Full details regarding the programme will be published in due time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW BALTIMORE
JAN 23 1909

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday, January 26, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and will begin his eighth concert tour in America almost immediately. Owing to the demands made for recitals by him C. A. Ellis of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to extend his stay in this country until the first of April, and in that time he will give 40 concerts, 12 of which will be with orchestras. His only appearance in Baltimore will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 17.

From Address EXPRESS
JAN 23 1909

Elman, greatest Violinist of the Age, and Boston Symphony.

Buffalo is promised the musical sensation of the year when Mischa Elman appears at Convention Hall next Monday night as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Elman, the mighty young Russian, is the idol of the hour and when Elman and his Stradivarius are to appear, capacity audiences are the rule.

Elman will play with the orchestra the Beethoven concerto in D, the final test of the violinist's art. One could ask for no greater boon than the privilege of hearing the young genius with America's greatest musical organization, especially when that orchestra makes its first Buffalo appearance under its new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the prices ranging from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Name
Address
City

Next Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock in Convention Hall, America's most famous musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its annual Buffalo concert, which is the crowning achievement of the musical year. The event is of unusual importance this season, for next Monday night marks the Buffalo debut of two great artists, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the new conductor of the orchestra, and Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has been the musical idol of America this season and whose recitals have been the sensation of New York and the few other cities where this young genius has appeared.

Elman's career has been meteor-like and not since the days of Mozart has any artist created such a sensation as this little Jewish boy of eighteen, whose mastery of the violin is complete and whose technique is the marvel of the musical world.

The first number at this concert will be Smetana's lovely symphonic poem, "The Moldau." Then will come that most tragic and the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's Concerto in D for violin and orchestra, the final and complete test for any violinist, and the closing number on this exquisite program will be the "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

From
Address
Date

Paderewski's Return.

Paderewski is to give one recital in Washington, the date being Thursday afternoon, February 4, at 4:30 o'clock, and the place being the New National Theater. Paderewski sails for America the middle of this month for a stay of only a few weeks. His primary reason for coming is to have his new symphony performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will play eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, twice with the Chicago Orchestra, and once each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will give also a limited number of recitals, not more than one in any city, and will return to Europe some time in March.

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 24 1909

On Friday last Miss Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, arrived in New York for her first American tour. Miss Arnaud is said to be one of the best pianists of the younger generation in Europe, and has appeared with scores of the most prominent musical societies and symphony orchestras abroad. Miss Arnaud will make her first appearance in this country on Jan. 21 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. Miss Arnaud's tour will cover most of the principal cities east of the Mississippi.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m ....

ress .... INDIANAPOLIS, IND

JAN 21 1909

AMERICA'S GREATEST ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

COMING OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY THURSDAY NIGHT.

INTEREST IN NEW LEADER

The coming week is made notable by what now may be regarded as the annual concert in Indianapolis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This city is one of the favored few, for in its season of thirty odd weeks, this celebrated organization finds time to give only a week to the middle West, and that it has taken the habit of coming to Indianapolis each year, speaks much for the musical loving public of this city. The orchestra leaves Boston Sunday night and goes to Buffalo, where it will give its first concert Monday night. Then it will give concerts in Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester, returning to Boston after the Rochester concert. The sale of seats for the concert opens Monday morning at the box office of English's Opera-house.

Interest in New Conductor.

Interest in this year's concert will center chiefly in Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who came from Hamburg last fall to succeed Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler brought with him the reputation of being one of the few really great conductors of Europe, and this reputation he has more than vindicated by his success in America this season. It may safely be said that no conductor that ever came to this country has won popular favor to a greater degree than this modest, quiet gentleman who came without preliminary puffing and was satisfied to let his work speak for itself. Incidentally, Mr. Fiedler has shown that he has, to a rare degree, the faculty of making attractive programs. Curiously enough this faculty is seldom found in great conductors and when it is found it is all the more valuable.

Indianapolis will welcome as soloist, Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, and one of the great violin virtuosi of the world. Last year Professor Hess was not with the orchestra, being in Europe on a leave of absence, and during that time his services were constantly in demand as soloist in the larger cities of Great Britain and the continent.

Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

The program which Mr. Fiedler has made for Indianapolis is a vivid illustration of his success in this direction. It comprises five works. Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony; Max Bruch's concerto in G-minor for violin; a Richard Strauss number, the love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhæuser." Beethoven's "Egmont" overture is one of the imperishable masterpieces of musical literature. It was a part of the incidental music that Beethoven wrote to Goethe's play, which consisted of this overture, four entr'actes, two songs sung by Claerchen and the "Triumph Symphony"—nine numbers in all, which was played for the first time with the tragedy at the Hofburg Theater, May 24, 1810. The tragic story of the gallant Egmont as outlined by Goethe, appealed strongly to Beethoven's imagination, and this overture is regarded as one of the greatest examples of tragic expression in music that the world possesses.

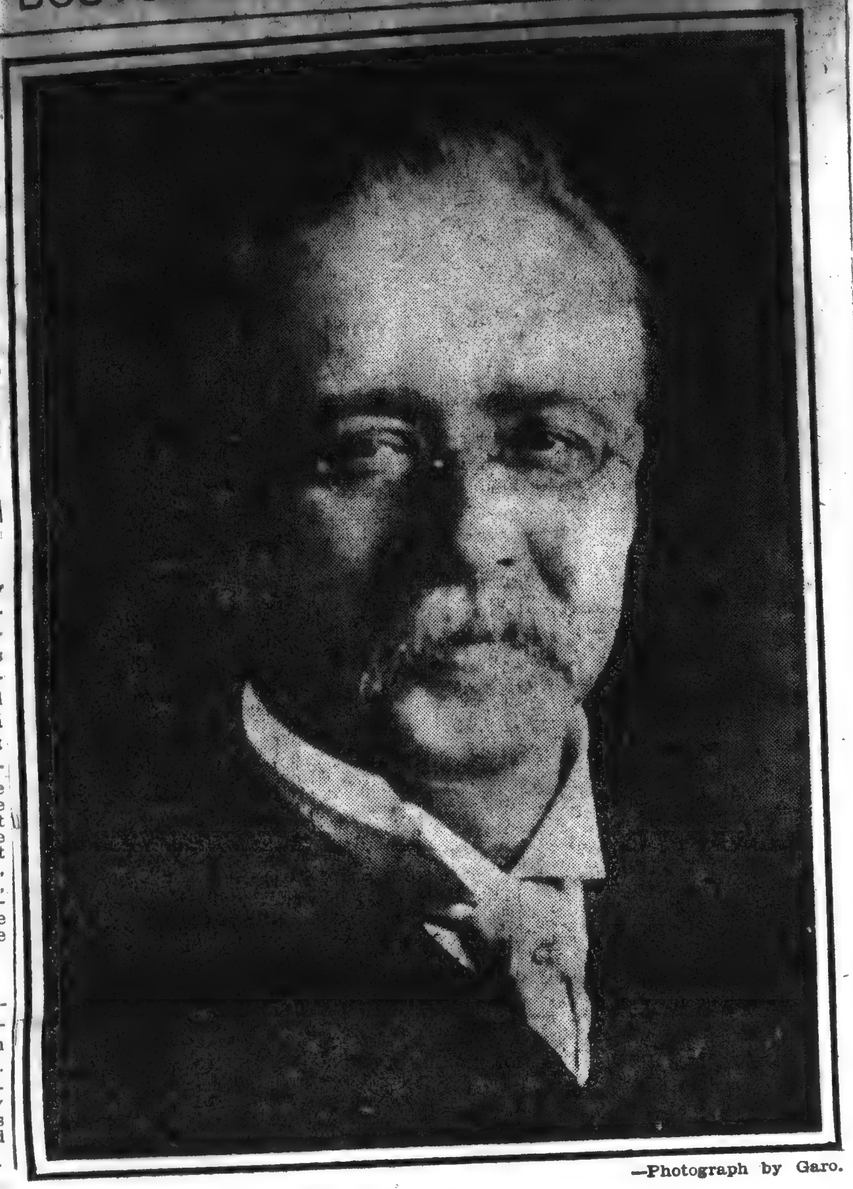
Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is always welcomed by lovers of the best in music. Although the composer's brother, Modeste, has given a death blow to the fancifully tragic story that Tschaikowsky wrote this symphony in premonition of approaching death, and that this may be regarded as his "conscious swan song," the tradition will endure for long in the popular mind. It will always be difficult to dissassociate the overwhelming despair found in the last movement, "adagio lamentoso," from the fate which so soon after the completion of the work, robbed the world of a great genius. We know now that Modeste Tschaikowsky suggested the name "Pathetic," his brother being at a loss for an appropriate title. We know now that death was never so far distant from the mind of the composer as it was when he wrote the symphony; that he was in better health and spirits than he had been in years, and that he was full of plans for the future. Yet, despite the destruction of the tradition, the fact that the composer lived long enough only to direct the first performance of this, his greatest work, and that he was swept away without warning by the cholera, will make it always in the mind of the public the great tragical work of symphonic literature.

Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra is a masterpiece of its kind. It is probably the best example of the "violin concerto" that we have. This does not mean that Bruch, himself, was a violinist, but it means that he succeeded in writing one of the most grateful pieces for that instrument that musical literature contains. It shows every good quality the instrument possesses. It demands of its performer plentiful technique and smooth, flowing cantilena and a round, mellow tone. It is full of rich melody and graceful ornamentation.

The final number, the "Tannhæuser" overture, stands to-day, as when it was written, as being one of the finest specimens of dramatic overtures the world possesses, and its popularity has never been seriously disputed by any other work of its kind.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR



—Photograph by Garo.

MAX FIEDLER.

Will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at English's Opera-house next Thursday night.

EVENING MAIL

om .... m ....

New York City.

idress .... Iress ....

JAN 23

te .... e ....

Paderewski's Tour.

Paderewski, who will arrive Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, will give his New York recital in Carnegie hall February 2, in the afternoon. Owing to the demand for his appearances C. A. Ellis, of Boston, his manager, announces that he will remain in this country until the end of March, and will make forty appearances, instead of twenty, as originally planned. His only orchestral appearances, however, will be with the Boston Symphony orchestra February 18 and 20, when he will be the soloist for both of the concerts.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 23 1909

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday morning, and his eighth concert tour of America will begin almost immediately. Owing to the great demand for concerts by him, C. A. Ellis of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to prolong his stay in America until April 1, and in that time he will give forty concerts, twelve of which will be with orchestras. His first appearance will be as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening, February 19. He will also appear in a recital at the Academy of Music on Monday afternoon, March 1. Full details regarding the programme will be published in due time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday, January 26, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and will begin his eighth concert tour in America almost immediately. Owing to the demands made for recitals by him C. A. Ellis of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to extend his stay in this country until the first of April and in that time he will give 40 concerts, 12 of which will be with orchestras. His only appearance in Baltimore will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 17.

Elman, greatest Violinist of the Age, and Boston Symphony.

Buffalo is promised the musical sensation of the year when Mischa Elman appears at Convention Hall next Monday night as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Elman, the mighty young Russian, is the idol of the hour and when Elman and his Stradivarius are to appear, capacity audiences are the rule.

Elman will play with the orchestra the Beethoven concerto in D, the final test of the violinist's art. One could ask for no greater boon than the privilege of hearing the young genius with America's greatest musical organization, especially when that orchestra makes its first Buffalo appearance under its new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg.

Seats for the concert are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the prices ranging from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om ....

dress

e ....

Next Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock in Convention Hall, America's most famous musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give its annual Buffalo concert, which is the crowning achievement of the musical year. The event is of unusual importance this season, for next Monday night marks the Buffalo debut of two great artists, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the new conductor of the orchestra, and Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has been the musical idol of America this season and whose recitals have been the sensation of New York and the few other cities where this young genius has appeared.

Elman's career has been meteor-like and not since the days of Mozart has any artist created such a sensation as this little Jewish boy of eighteen, whose mastery of the violin is complete and whose technique is the marvel of the musical world.

The first number at this concert will be Smetana's lovely symphonic poem, "The Moldau." Then will come that most tragic and the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique." Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's Concerto in D for violin and orchestra, the final and complete test for any violinist, and the closing number on this exquisite program will be the "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

From ....

Address .... NEW YORK CITY

JAN 23 1909

Date ....

Germany, barring the works of the unique Strauss, continues to produce compositions expert in workmanship and of surpassing unimportance: music which recalls a reference once made by President Eliot to "the intellectual economy of most Episcopal sermons"—save that contemporary Teutonic music exhibits rather an economy of inspiration than of cerebral expenditure. The newest emanation in this field to come under immediate observation is a theme with variations, for orchestra, by one Heinrich Gottlieb Noren (born at Gratz in 1863, now living at Loschwitz, in the neighborhood of Dresden), which the Boston Sympho. Orchestra displayed in New York on January 7th, under the guidance of Mr. Fiedler.

Mr. Noren titles his composition Kaleidoscope. The music is said to date from the years 1904–07. It was first performed at Dresden in the summer of 1907, and it subsequently made its composer famous, largely because the introduction, in one of the variations, of two themes quoted (with acknowledgment) from Richard Strauss's Heldenleben, caused Strauss's publisher to institute a lawsuit for violation of copyright. The trial resulted in one of the most delectable verdicts ever recorded. The section of the copyright law which Noren was charged to have violated declares that "from a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody and incorporate it in a new work." The matter was submitted to a jury of alleged experts, who gravely decided—to the unseemly delight of those who do not love the music of Strauss—that, inasmuch as neither of the themes which Noren had borrowed from Heldenleben was a melody, he could not be said to have violated the law; whereupon he was permitted to publish his score. Yet, after hearing the work, it is easy to feel that Strauss's publisher was justified in his objection; for the variation in which Noren disports his borrowed plumes yields the only important passages in the score. Elsewhere the music is a triumph of ingenious banality, a dexterous web of commonplaces. The variations are mildly pictorial and suggestive. They contain a "Præambulum," a "Mournful Dance," a cannon, a scherzo, — "Humor," —a section called "In the Cathedral," a "Pastorale," a "Funeral March," a Slavic dance, a section called "From Far-off Days," a mazurka, and the disputed variation in which Strauss is paraphrased: "To a Famous Contemporary." The last is at once the most ingenious and the most engrossing. The "Funeral March" has striking moments; "From Far-off Days" is agreeably sentimental; the Cathedral scene has a certain easily wrought impressiveness; the rest is inconsequential. Mr. Noren has a deal of ingenuity, and he is fluent and facile; but of imaginative power or original thought he gives no sign. The work will in all likelihood be popular for it adheres to familiar paths, and it makes no disconcerting demand for co-operative imagination on the part of the hearer.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist now visiting America

It was beautifully played by Colonel Higginson's remarkable orchestra.

n ....

ress .... N. Y.

JAN

....

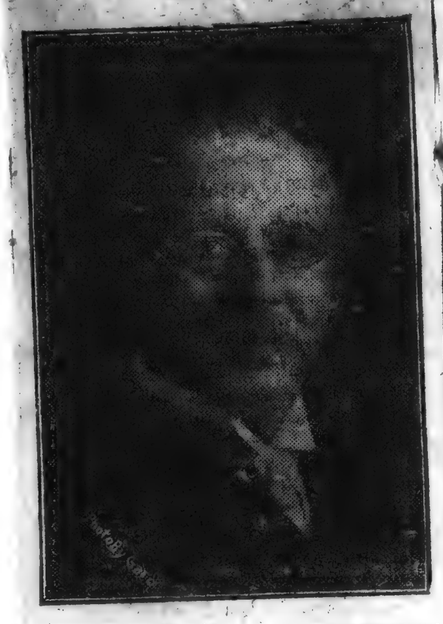
Paderewski's Return.

Paderewski is to give one recital in Washington, the date being Thursday afternoon, February 4, at 4:30 o'clock, and the place being the New National Theater. Paderewski sails for America the middle of this month for a stay of only a few weeks. His primary reason for coming is to have his new symphony performed by the Boston Symphony Ochestra. He will play eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, twice with the Chicago Orchestra, and once each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will give also a limited number of recitals, not more than one in any city, and will return to Europe some time in March.

On Friday last Miss Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, arrived in New York for her first American tour. Miss Arnaud is said to be one of the best pianists of the younger generation in Europe, and has appeared with scores of the most prominent musical societies and symphony orchestras abroad. Miss Arnaud will make her first appearance in this country on Jan. 21 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. Miss Arnaud's tour will cover most of the principal cities east of the Mississippi.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
POST EXPRESS
From ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Address

In Musical Circles



The first of several musical offerings which will greatly enrich the local season occurs one week from tonight in the ever-welcome coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra, this time with Mischa Elman as its soloist. We are to hear the orchestra under its new director, Max Fiedler, who has been chosen to carry on the work laid down by Dr. Muck, than whom no conductor since Nikisch has won more universal esteem.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has few peers among the great orchestras of to-day and, since the more perfect the instrument, the more completely is revealed the intention of the player, so a director's musical personality becomes of great interest when felt in the work of this great organization. The programme, comment on which is reserved, follows:

PROGRAMME.

Smetana—"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the Cycle, "My Country") .....
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.
Tschaikowsky (Died Nov. 6, 1893). Symphony, No. 6, "Pathetic," in B Minor, op. 74.....
1. Adagio: Allegro non troppo
2. Allegro con grazia
3. Allegro molto vivace
4. Finale; Adagio lamentoso
Beethoven—Concerto in D Major for Violin, op. 61.....
1. Allegro ma non troppo
2. Larghetto
3. Rondo
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

Following this event of manifold promise, on February 10th, comes Dr. Wullner, whose song-recitals have proved him to be a musical personality of great dignity and force.

Three days later, on February 13th, a programme is to be given by a quartette from the personnel of the Metropolitan Opera forces, the tenor being Caruso's erstwhile rival and present colleague, Bonci.

Probably no singer of the day more perfectly illustrates in his work the best traditions of Italian singing than does this artist.

Lilli Lehmann in her book, "How to Sing," says that of the men whom she has heard of late years Bonci most excites her admiration for the perfect evenness of his tone, his brilliant technique and perfect phrasing. While no tenor of the day has such a plenitude of gorgeous tone as Caruso, yet even he, so a competent musical authority asserts, has been decidedly influenced, and for the better, by Bonci's singing. Local contributions to musical offerings include the first of the chamber concerts of the Dossenbach String quartette and some interesting things to be found on the programmes of Walter Bentley Ball.

Mr. Ball has issued in attractive form the programmes for three recitals which he announces for January 29th, February 26th and March 26th. The first recital is devoted to songs of Schubert and a reading of Poe's "Raven" with Max Heinrich's musical setting. At his second recital Mr. Ball will sing songs of Schumann and ballads of Loewe, while Brahms, Wolf, Richard Strauss, Mac Dowell and other American composers furnish the musical matter for the third evening. The programme for next Friday's recital follows:

FRANZ SCHUBERT, 1797—1828.
Songs from "The Maid of the Mill" Wilhelm Mueller Wandering
Wither
Halt by the Brook
After Work
Impatience
Mine
Jealousy and Pride
Withered Flowers
The Miller and the Brook
Night-Piece .....Mayerhofer
Calm at Sea .....Goethe
To Music .....Schober
Postillion Kronos .....Goethe
To be Followed by "The Raven,"
A Melodrama.
Poem by Edgar Allan Poe
Music by Max. Heinrich.

Europe, having lent us Elman, has developed another violin prodigy in the person of a fifteen-year-old Russian-American, Sascha Colbertson, so the Berlin correspondent of the "Musical Leader" announces.

In him we have another product of the Sevcik school in Prague, where he has been hailed as a "second Kubelik."

Vienna has also accorded him a royal welcome, one critic adding to the young man's burden the uncomfortable title, "a young Paganin."

Berlin criticism, if less extravagant in nomenclature, yet accords the violinist warm appreciation and finds in his playing of many of his numbers an astonishing maturity.

One of Colbertson's recent programmes included the Dvorak concerto, Bruch's Scotch fantasie, the Wieniawski concerto, Paganini's "Nel cor pin" and four lesser numbers, a technical task, which, if musically performed, certainly deserves attention.

***

A programme received from New York presents two names well known to Rochester, those of Alois Trnka, whose work as soloist and teacher of the violin commanded the sincere respect of local musicians, and that of David Hockstein, whose playing as a student of Mr. Trnka in Rochester excited admiration, not so much because of the extreme youth of the player, as for its own genuine worth.

Both teacher and pupil are at work in New York and Mr. Trnka presents his pupil in recital at Carnegie Chamber Music hall, Monday evening, January 25th, in the following programme.

Quartette in A Minor Op. 16.....Dvorak
Allegro ma non troppo
Andante cantabile
Allegro scherzando
Allegro ma non troppo
A. Trnka D. Hochstein
V. Kolar A. Reiser
Carmen, Fantasie Op. 25.....Sarasate
David Hochstein
Cadenza to 1st Concerto, Paganini.. Sauret
(violin alone)
David Hochstein
a Andante Op. 19 .....Vieuxtemps
b La Capricieuse Op. 17.....Edw. Elgar
David Hochstein
Tarantelle de Concert Op. 2..... Leopold Auer
David Hochstein

***

Paderewski will be heard in Philadelphia only twice this season, at the Academy of Music, at a recital which he is to give on Wednesday afternoon, February 3, and as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday evening, February 15.

Illustrated EXPRESS
Address

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Splendid Programme by the Adamowski Trio—Miss McConnell's new Songbook—Association Choral Club on Tuesday Night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MISCHA ELMAN

Three reasons combine to make the concert to be given tomorrow night in Convention Hall a crowning musical achievement of the year. In the first place, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized as one of the greatest musical organizations in the world; in the second, tomorrow will introduce for the first time in Buffalo the new conductor of the orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who gave up his place at the head of the Hamburg Conservatory and as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg to accept this, the most important musical post in America; third, and by no means last, at tomorrow night's concert Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, who has proved the idol of the hour in New York, Boston and the few other cities where he has played, will make his Buffalo debut, coming here as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

More like a fairy tale than reality reads the story of Mischa Elman's career. He is eighteen years old, the son of poor Jewish parents, born in an obscure part of Russia. From a baby his passion for the violin was so pronounced that his fame spread abroad and soon he was taken [illegible] of the Russian conservatories. He went from teacher to teacher until four years ago, when he made his professional debut in Saint Petersburg, and the world was told that a new musical genius had once found.

Since then his rocketlike career has been the marvel of Europe. In December he came to America and captured New York. But it remained for Boston to give him the greatest reception ever recorded any violinist in the New World.

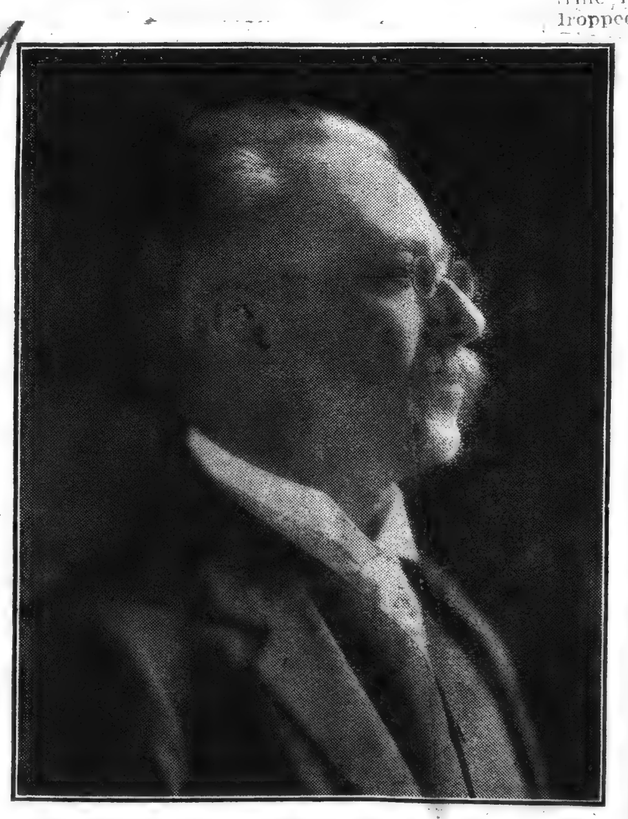
It was on New Year's Day and Symphony Hall was filled with a typical audience, cold, critical, exacting, an audience that was more attracted by its pet orchestra than by the fame of the little Jewish boy who was to be the soloist. At last Elman stepped forward with his Stradivarius and began the Tschaikowsky concerto. The audience listened for a moment with polite indifference, then it began to awake and before the number was half finished it broke into a storm of applause, a thing that never happens in Symphony Hall, where the no-encore rule and no applause during the performance of a number is rigidly enforced.

That was not all. The orchestra, recognizing that it was accompanying a master, played as if inspired and when the concerto was finished and Elman, a trifle flushed and a little weary, had dropped his Stradivarius from his shoulder, that great company of picked musicians, more than 80 strong, led by Willy Hess, the concertmaster, rose to its feet and cheered the boy who had captured the most critical audience in America.

Since then Elman has played again and again with the orchestra, and Willy Hess, himself a solo violinist of no small reputation, says that Elman is the greatest genius among violinists that the world has ever known. It is something to be long remembered to watch Willy Hess when Elman is playing. His admiration for the lad amounts to positive adoration.

Great interest will be felt in seeing Mr. Fiedler at the head of the Boston orchestra. As an interpreter he has a thorough knowledge of tradition and routine, added to which is the imagination needed to bring out the full poetic value of the works performed. He excels as a programme maker and the programme he has selected for Buffalo tomorrow night might well serve as a model. It begins with Smetana's lovely symphonic poem, The Moldau. Then comes that most tragic and the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's Pathetic. Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto in D for violin and orchestra and the final number will be the Tannhauser Overture.

Tomorrow night's concert begins promptly at 8.15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early. No one will be seated during the performance of a number and absolute silence will be maintained in the hall. Late comers will miss one of the most beautiful selection on the programme.



MAX FIEDLER.

New conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its annual concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening. This will be Mr. Fiedler's first appearance in Buffalo, and it will also mark the local debut of Mischka Elman, the young Russian violinist, who will be the soloist with the orchestra.

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday morning, Jan. 26, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and his eighth concert tour of America will begin almost immediately. Owing to the great demand for concerts by him, C. A. Mills, of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to prolong his stay in America until April 1 and in that time he will give forty concerts, twelve of which will be with orchestras. The others will be recitals. His first appearance will be as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, Feb. 19. He will also appear in recital at the Academy of Music on Monday afternoon, March 1. Full details regarding the programme will be published in due time.

NEW YORK PRESS,
New York City.

Germaine Arnaud, a young French pianist, who won a first prize in the Paris Conservatory, has just arrived in America. She will begin her tour with three appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and eventually will play here and in other Eastern cities.

ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON

IS LAST OF TALBOT SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY, MOST EXPENSIVE ORGANIZATION OF ITS KIND, COMES TO ENGLISH'S THURSDAY—LARGE AUDIENCE EXPECTED.

The sale of seats for the third annual concert in Indianapolis by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the box office of English's Opera House tomorrow morning. The concert will be given in English's Opera House next Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at 8:15 o'clock.

The coming of Boston's famous orchestra is always the climax of the Indianapolis musical season and this city counts itself fortunate in being one of the few which the orchestra visits in the middle West during its brief tour of one week. This means that Indianapolis realizes the value of these concerts and gives them adequate support, for, as the orchestra is one of the most expensive organizations in the world, a full house is necessary wherever it appears.

Interest in this year's concert will chiefly be in Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who came from Hamburg last fall to succeed Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler brought with him the reputation of being one of the few really great conductors of Europe, and this reputation he has more than vindicated by his success in America this season. It may safely be said that no conductor that ever came to this country has won popular favor to a greater degree than this modest, quiet gentleman, who came to America without preliminary puffing and was satisfied to let his work speak for itself. Incidentally Mr. Fiedler has shown that he has, to a rare degree, the faculty of making attractive programs. Curiously enough this faculty is seldom found in great conductors and when it is found it is all the more valuable.

To Meet Willy Hess.

Indianapolis will welcome as soloist, Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and one of the great violin virtuosi of the world. Last year Prof. Hess was not with the orchestra, being in Europe on a leave of absence, and during that time his services were constantly in demand as soloist in the larger cities of Great Britain and the continent.

The program which Mr. Fiedler has made for Indianapolis is a vivid illustration of his success in this direction. It comprises four works: Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," symphony; Max Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Beethoven's "Egmont" overture is one of the imperishable masterpieces of musical literature. It was a part of the incidental music that Beethoven wrote to Goethe's play, which consisted of this overture, four entr'actes, two songs sung by Clarchen and the "Triumph" symphony—nine numbers in all, which was played for the first time with the tragedy at the Hofberg Theater, May 24, 1810. The tragic story of the gallant Egmont as outlined by Goethe, appealed strongly to Beethoven's imagination, and this overture is regarded as one of the greatest examples of tragic expression in music that the world possesses.

Not His "Swan Song."

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is always welcomed by lovers of the best in music. Although the composer's brother, Modest, has given a death blow to the fancifully tragic story that Tschaikowsky wrote this symphony in premonition of approaching death, and that this may be regarded as his "conscious swan song," the tradition will endure for long in the popular mind. It will always be difficult to disassociate the overwhelming despair found in the last movement, Adagio lamentoso from the fate which so soon after the completion of the work, robbed the world of its greatest genius. It is known now that Modest Tschaikowsky suggested the name "Pathetic," his brother being at a loss for an appropriate title. It is known now that death was never so far distant from the mind of the composer as it was when he wrote the symphony; that he was in better health and spirits than he had been in years, and that he was full of plans for the future. Yet, despite the destruction of the tradition, the fact that the composer lived long enough only to direct the first performance of this, his greatest work, and that he was swept away without warning by the cholera, will make it always, in the mind of the public, the great tragical work of symphonic literature.

Bruch's Concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra, is a masterpiece of its kind. It is probably the best example of the "violin Concerto" in existence. This does not mean that Bruch, himself, was a violinist, but it means that he succeeded in writing one of the most grateful pieces for that instrument that musical literature contains. It shows every good quality the instrument possesses. It demands of its performer plentiful technique, and smooth flowing cantilena and a round mellow tone. It is full of rich melody and graceful ornamentation.

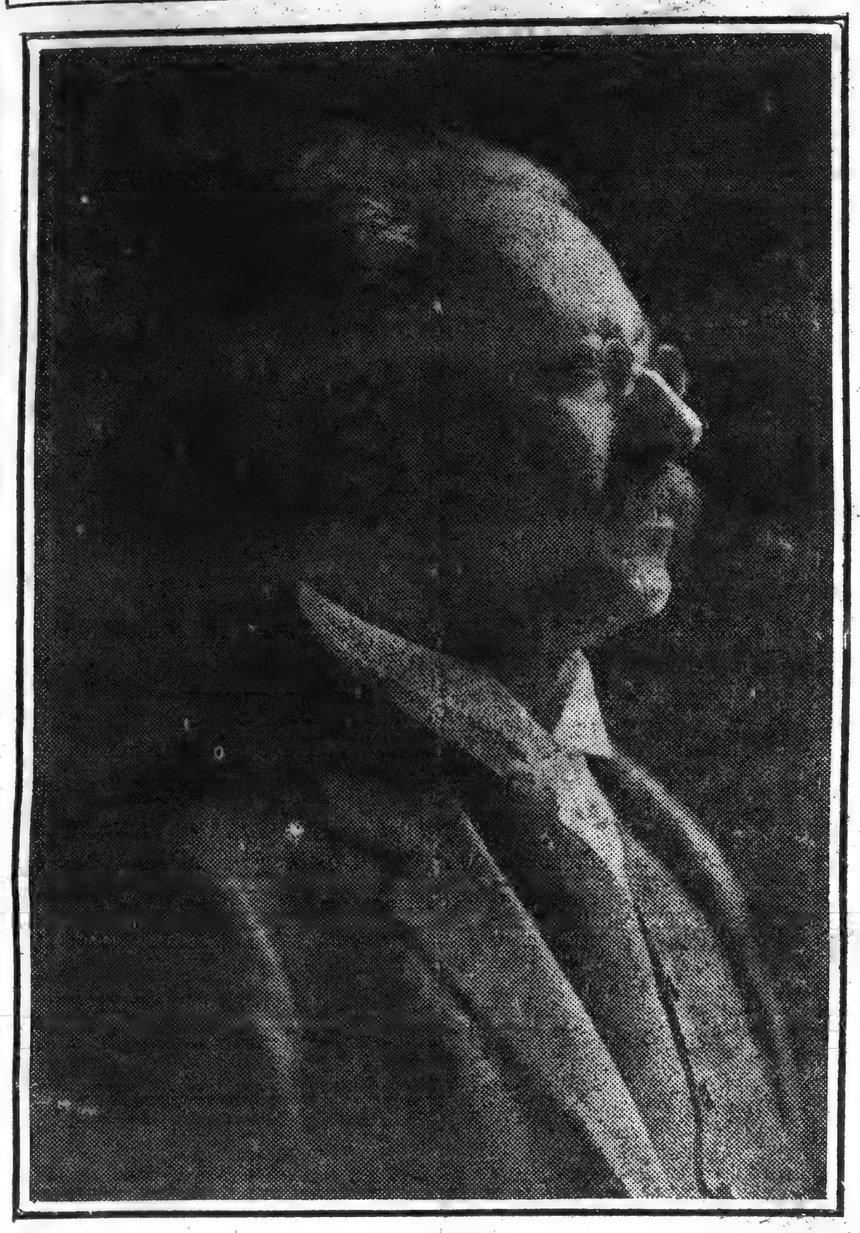
The final number, the Tannhauser overture, stands today, as when it was written, as being one of the finest specimens of dramatic overtures the world possesses, and its popularity has never been seriously disputed by any other work of its kind.

rom NEW YORK AMERICAN,

ldress New York City.

ate

Wields Baton Surrendered by Muck.



MAX FIEDLER. —Photo by Garo.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first Indianapolis appearance at English's Opera House next Thursday evening. He is a man of wide musical knowledge, and is maintaining the same high standard set by his predecessor, Dr. Muck.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tomorrow night's concert in Convention Hall will mark the musical climax of the season, for it will bring to Buffalo America's foremost musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will introduce the new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, also the musical sensation of the hour, Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who will be the soloist.

Elman's first appearance in Boston was in the Tschaikowsky concerto and before the number was half finished the great audience broke into a storm of applause, while the orchestra played as if inspired. Then, the concerto over and Elman's violin lowered, that mighty organization of over 80 men rose to its feet, forgetting all about the rigid discipline that has been enforced for the last 28 years and cheered the boy until he was completely overcome.

Willy Hess, who after a year's absence abroad is again back at his old place as concert master with the orchestra, is the most enthusiastic of all. He says that Elman is the greatest violinist the world has ever known. This is from a man who is himself a fine violinist. An interesting figure at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mr. Fiedler, who gave up his important post in Hamburg at the head of the conservatory and conductor of the Philharmonic concerts to take charge of the American orchestra. His success as a program maker is no less than as a conductor and certainly the most captious music lover could ask for nothing more beautiful than the program he has selected for Buffalo.

It begins with Smetana's lovely symphonic poem, "The Moldau." Then comes that most tragic and one of the greatest modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." Beethoven's concerto in D, for violin and orchestra, will serve to introduce Mischa Elman for the first time to a Buffalo public, and the program ends with the beautiful "Tannhauser Overture."

Tomorrow night's concert will begin promptly at 8:15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated during the performance of any number and those coming late will miss one of the most beautiful parts of the program. The Buffalo concert opens a week's Western tour by the famous orchestra.

MAX FIEDLER.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Be Heard at Convention Hall Tomorrow Evening. Photo by Garo.

Germaine Arnaud, a young French pianist, who won a first prize at the Paris Conservatory, has just arrived for her first American tour. Miss Arnaud will begin her tour in three performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later on will visit New York and other large Eastern cities.

ublished: London,

ss

—Germaine Arnaud, a young French pianist, who won a first prize at the Paris Conservatory, has just arrived for her first American tour. Miss Arnaud will begin her tour in three performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later will visit New York and other large East-ern cities.

[156]

SUN,

s New York City.

JAN 1 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to make a short flight into the middle and near West. The tour will begin to-morrow evening in Buffalo, after which the organization will visit Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. The chief composition to be played will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which will be given in Buffalo, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. In Detroit Beethoven's fifth will be the symphony and in Cleveland Schumann's D minor symphony, together with MacDowell's "Lamia," Weber's "Oberon" overture and some "Tristan und Isolde" music, will be heard.

Mischa Elman will play Beethoven's concerto in Buffalo and Rochester, while Willy Hess will play Bruch's first concerto in Indianapolis. Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture is on all the programmes. Detroit will hear not only "Lamia," but also "Death and Transfiguration." It is interesting to note the kind of music that these cities require to satisfy their appetites.

The growth of musical taste in this country is perhaps not so rapid as some uninformed persons may imagine it to be, for the cities outside of New York, Boston, Cincinnati, Pittsburg and Chicago have by no means just begun to demand the very best kind of music. If any one is laboring under the delusion that he can please these cities by offering them the second best in the domain of the tonal art he is likely to hear of things to his istaste.

If operatic excitements can be kept away from the far West long enough we shall develop widespread and beautiful taste in music there also, for already orchestras in Seattle and other cities are teaching people to love the creations of the mighty masters. Long may the golden West exist without high B'flats, screaming stretti and other delirious joys of the lyric drama.

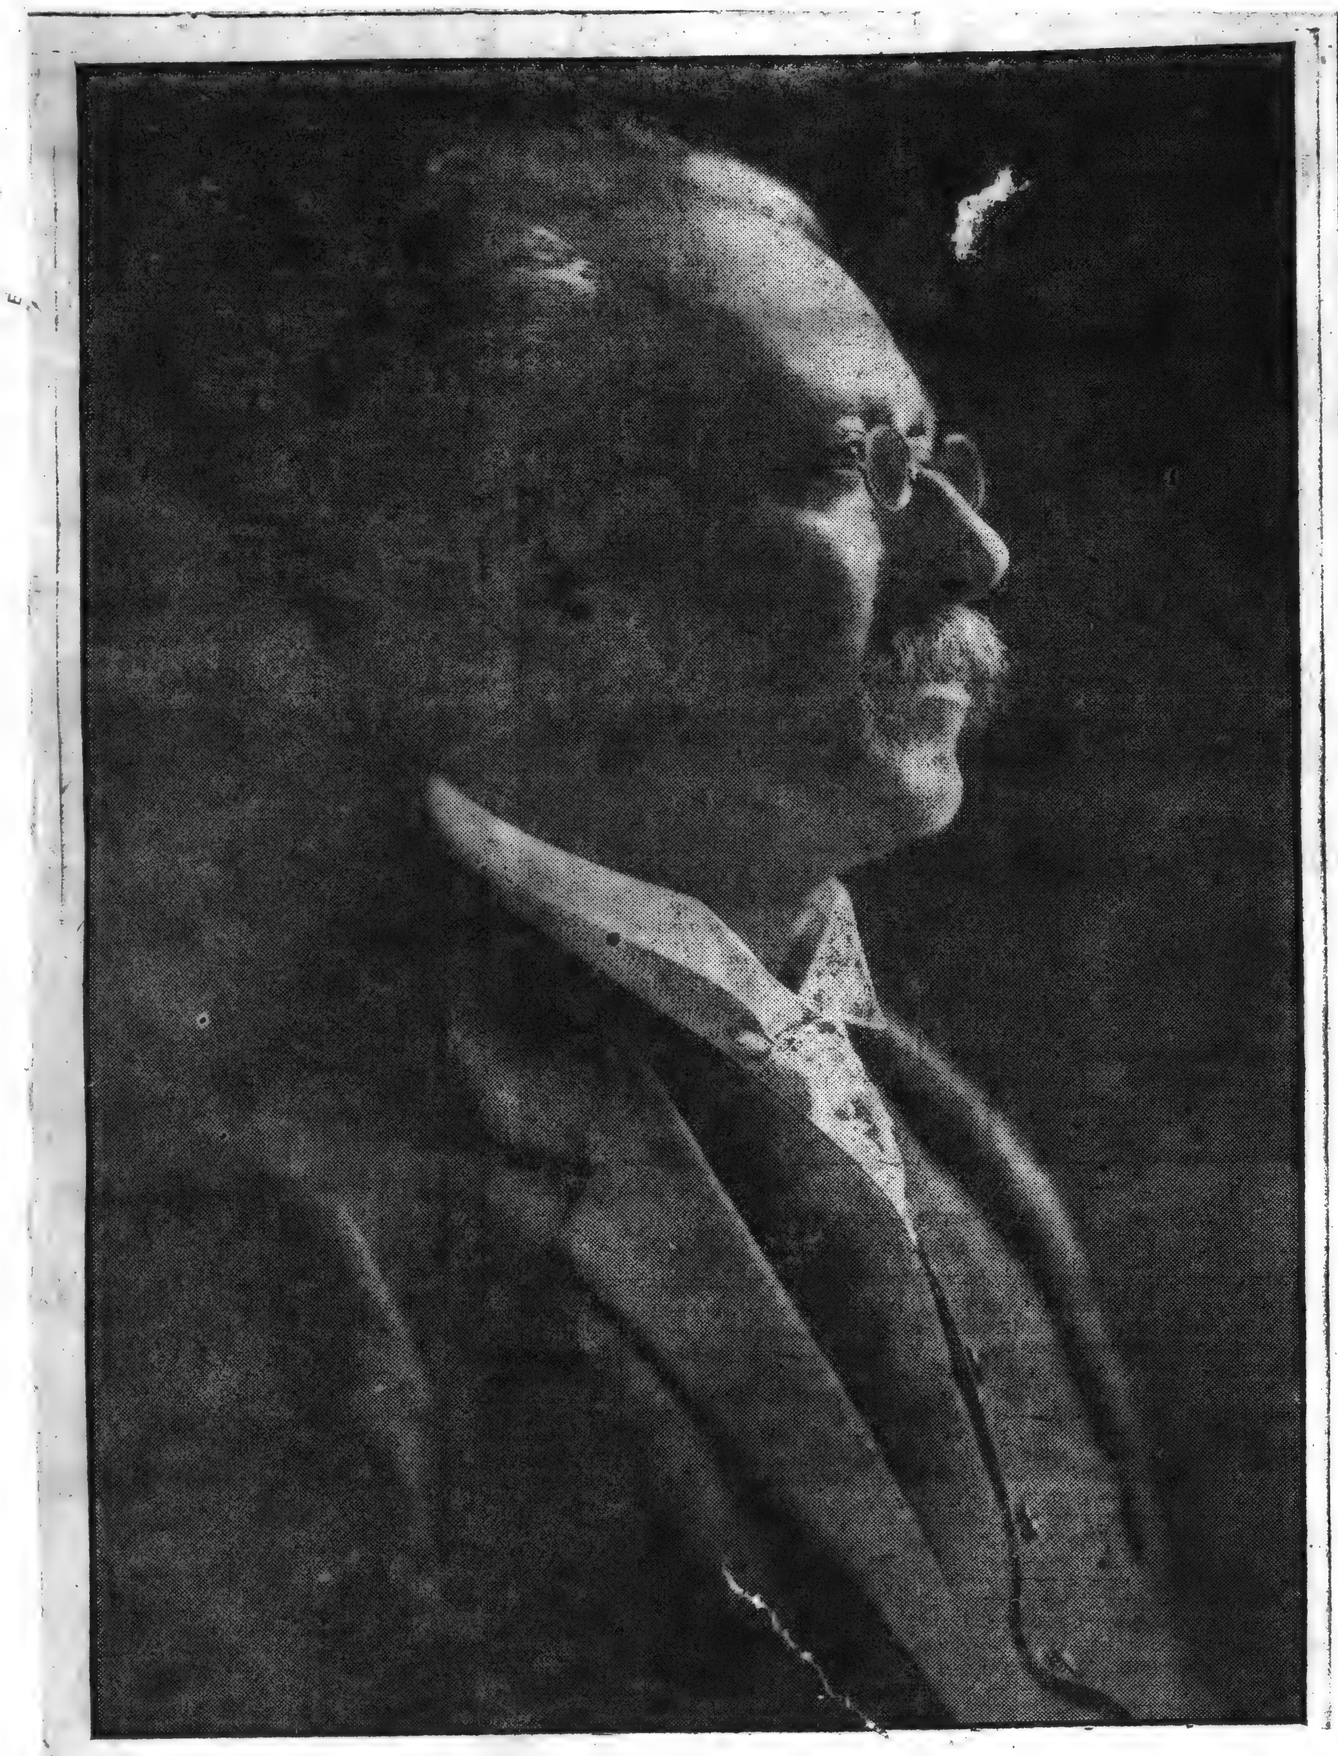
W. J. HENDERSON.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

ss New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this week is carrying its message of light to the Middle West. It leaves Boston to-night (Sunday) on its annual western trip of one week. The cities to be visited are Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. The orchestra returns to Boston next Sunday.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World



MAX FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
At Convention Hall.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Famous Boston Organization to Be Heard at Convention Hall on Saturday Evening Next.

The musical event of the coming week will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on next Saturday evening, January 30th, at 8:15 o'clock. The coming of the famous organization must always mark the climax of the musical season and this year the concert gains added importance by bringing to Rochester for the first time Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who seems to be the musical sensation of the present day. The orchestra comes west to give six concerts this week, the other places visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis and Columbus. Only in Buffalo and Rochester will Mischa Elman appear. Also with the orchestra comes Max Freidler, the new conductor, of whom much is expected because of his great success in the east.

The first number on the programme is Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." Smetana is one of the tragic figures in musical history. The greatest of Bohemian composers was born in Leitomischl, Bohemia, on March 2d, 1824, and died in a mad-house in Prague on May 12th, 1884. The clouding of his mind first become apparent about two years before his death, but almost ten years before the end came he became totally deaf and it was his fate not to hear any of his greatest works. At the time his deafness began to show itself he was at work on a cycle of symphonic poems by which he wished to celebrate his beloved fatherland. There are six of them, all grouped under the general title of "My Country."

The second of the series is "The Moldau" to be played here. "The Moldau" written in celebration of the famous river of Bohemia has the following programme: "The source, the hunt, the rustic wedding, the moonlight and dance of the nymphs, the St. John rapids, the broad river, Vysehrad motive."

Following the Smetana number will come what is generally acknowledged as the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's symphony in B minor, No. 6, known as the "Pathetique." Although the composer's brother Modeste has given a death to the fancifully pathetic story that Tschaikowsky wrote this work inspired by a premonition of his approaching death, that tradition will endure long in the public mind. It will always be difficult to dissassociate the overwhelming despair of the "Adagio lamafter the completion of the work robbed the world of one of its greatest geniuses. We know now that Modeste Tschaikowsky suggested the title, his brother being at loss for a name for the symphony. We know now that his death was never so far distant from the mind of the composer than it was when he wrote the symphony; that he was in better health and spirits than he had been for years and that he was full of plans for the future. Yet, despite the destruction of the tradition, the fact that the composer lived long enough only to direct the first performance of this, his masterpiece and that he was swept away without warning by the cholera, will make it always in the mind of the public the greatest tragical work in musical literature.

Mr. Elman will play the greatest of all works for the violin and orchestra, Beethoven's concerto in D major. This work is the ultimate test of the violinist, for it shows whether the artist is merely a fiddler who can perform all manner of "stunts" on his instrument in works by Paganini, Wieniawski and the like, or whether he is a musician as well.

The final number will be Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. The sale of seats will open at Gibbons and Stone's music store on next Wednesday morning, January 27th.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Kommende Konzerte.

Der Deutsche Liederkranz kündigt für Samstag, den 6. Februar, Abend ein öffentliches Konzert zu Wohlthätigkeitszwecken in Carnegie Hall an, wobei der gesammte Vereinschor unter Leitung seines Chormeisters Herrn Arthur Claassen mitwirkt. Außerdem sind zur Mitwirkung gewonnen das New Yorker Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch und Frl. Destinn, sowie Herr Albert Spalding, der Violinvirtuose, als Solisten.

Ignace Paderewski ist auf dem „Kaiser Wilhelm der Große" am kommenden Dinstag hier fällig. Der Künstler veranstaltet sein erstes New Yorker Rezital am 2. Februar Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall. Das Programm hierzu wird später bekannt gegeben werden. Herr Paderewski wird bis gegen Ende März hier verweilen und in dieser Zeit circa 40 Konzerte geben. Er wird in New York auch im Rahmen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester auftreten, und zwar am 18. und 20. Februar.

Die Bostoner treten heute unter der bewährten Leitung ihres zweiten Managers Herrn Fred. R. Comee eine auf 8 Tage anberaumte Tour an, welche sie nach folgenden Städten bringen wird: Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus und Rochester.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Plans of Paderewski.

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will begin his concert tour almost immediately. Owing to the great demand made for concerts, C. A. Ellis, of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to stay in this country somewhat longer than he originally intended, and he will be in America until about the first of April.

In this time he will give forty concerts instead of the twenty originally planned. He will play twelve times with orchestras, eight of which will be with the Boston Symphony, two with the Chicago Orchestra and one each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras, and give about thirty recitals.

The pianist will make but two appearances in Philadelphia—a recital at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 3, and as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday, February 15.

Mlle. Germaine Arnaud has arrived in this country and will begin her first tour with three performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mlle. Arnaud who is a young French pianist, studied at the Paris Conservatory.

Paderewski.

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday, January 26, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and will begin his eighth concert tour in America almost immediately. Owing to the demands made for recitals by him, C. A. Ellis, of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to extend his stay in this country until the first of April, and in that time he will give 40 concerts, 12 of which will be with orchestra. His only appearance in Baltimore will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 17. Full details regarding the program will be made public in due time.

[157]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

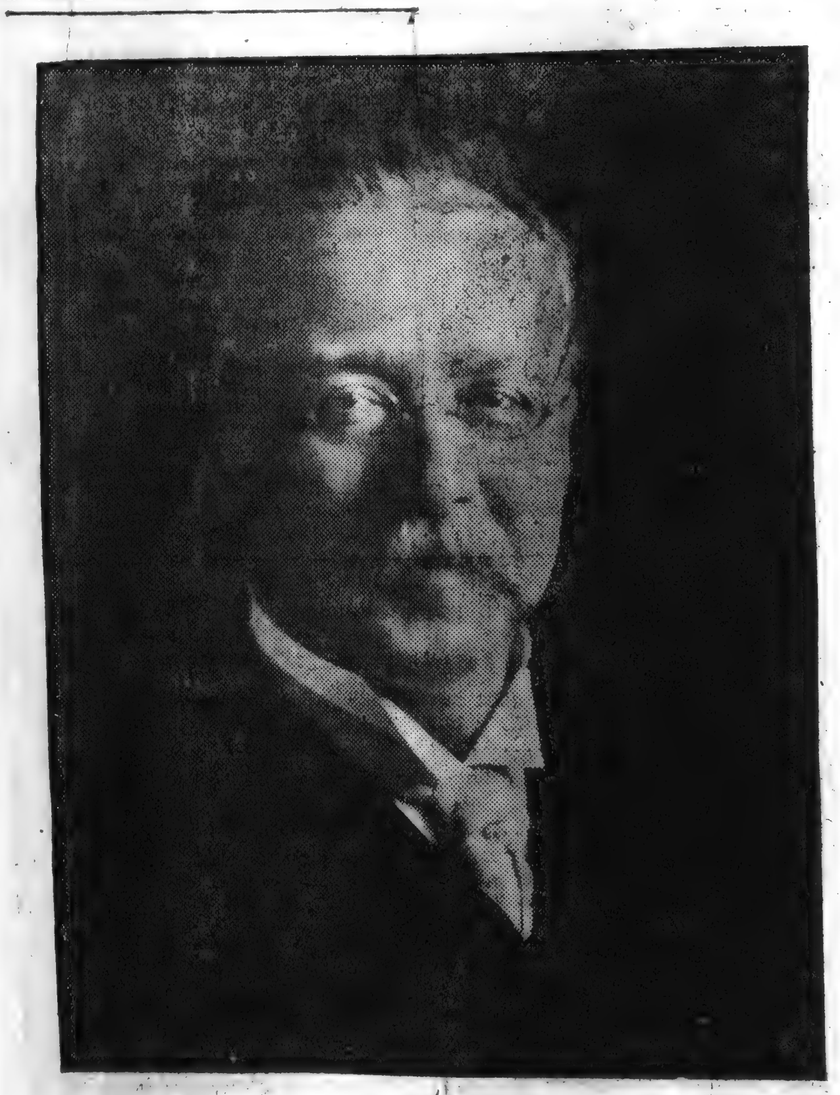
Not since the advent of Paderewski on his first tour has any artist lived up to the advance heralding of his coming as has Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that famous organization gives its annual Buffalo concert tomorrow night in Convention Hall. This little Jewish boy, only 18 years old, has captured America. In New York, where he has already given half a dozen recitals, the house is sold out on the opening day. He has broken the season's records for attendance at recitals. He has also made the Boston Symphony Orchestra break its previous records on the occasions when he has appeared as soloist. The first time he played with the orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, the audience forgot the strict no encore rule, stamped and applauded and cheered the marvelous boy with his magical violin, and the orchestra, losing sight of long years of discipline, stood as one man when the Elman concerto was finished and cheered with the vast audience until the young genius was completely overwhelmed at the magnitude of the tribute to his art.

So Elman's coming to Buffalo tomorrow night is quite as much of an event as the coming of America's foremost musical organization, and the combination of orchestra and soloist marks the greatest musical achievement of the year in Buffalo.

This will be the Buffalo debut of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has given up his post at the head of the Hamburg Conservatory and the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg to come over to America and take charge of one of the greatest orchestras in the world. For years Fiedler has been one of the most sought after conductors in Europe and as guest he has conducted most of the leading orchestras on the continent. He is a worthy successor to Dr. Muck, a superb musician, and his skill as a programme maker is renowned. Certainly no one could ask for a more beautiful programme than the one he has selected for Buffalo tomorrow night, which would serve well as a model for all others to go by.

Smetana's lovely symphonic poem, "The Mollusc." is the opening number. Then will come that most tragic and the greatest of all modern symphonies, Tschaikowsky's Pathetic. Mr. Elman will play Beethoven's concerto in D for violin and piano, the final test of the violinist's art, and the last number will be the "Tannhauser Overture." Could the most exacting music lover ask for more?

Tomorrow night's concert will open a week's tour of the orchestra and



MAX FIEDLER.

Eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert at Convention Hall tomorrow evening.

will begin promptly at 8.15. The audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will miss one of the most beautiful numbers on the wonderful programme.

Willy Hess, the concert master, who was abroad last year, is back in his accustomed place and those who want a treat are advised to watch his face as the famous violinist listens to Elman's playing. Prof. Hess cannot say enough about Elman. He considers him the greatest violinist in the world today and his love for the boy amounts to positive adoration.

—Paderewski will arrive in New York on Tuesday by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will begin his concert tour almost immediately. Owing to the great demand made for concerts C. A. Ellis, of Boston, Paderewski's manager, has prevailed upon him to stay in this country somewhat longer than he originally intended, and he will be in America until about the 1st of April. In this time he will give 40 concerts instead of the 20 originally planned. He will play 12 times with orchestras, eight of which will be with the Boston Symphony, two with the Chicago Orchestra, and one each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras, and will give about 30 recitals. He will make but two appearances in Philadelphia. The first will be his recital, which will be in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 3. The second will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday, February 15.

Arrival of Paderewski.

Paderewski is due to arrive here by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Tuesday, Jan. 26. His recital in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Tuesday week, Feb. 2, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. His programme for this recital will be announced immediately after his arrival. Owing to the demand for concerts C. A. Ellis of Boston, his manager, announces that he will stay in this country until the end of March, and in that time will make about forty appearances instead of the twenty which were originally planned. His only appearance with orchestra in this city will be with the Boston Symphony on Feb. 18 and 20, when he will be the soloist at both of the February concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

On Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concert at Convention Hall, with Mischa Elman, the famous young Russian

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Noted Musical Organization To Give Concert Saturday Evening.

At Convention Hall on Saturday evening one of the musical treats of the season will be offered. This is a concert by the noted Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be the only appearance of this organization in Rochester this season. With the orchestra, as soloist, is Mischa Elman, the young Russian violin player, whose sensational success in Europe the past few years has been widely heralded. It is said that Elman's playing in New York City and Boston has aroused enthusiam which has not been equaled by the advent of any virtuoso in this country since the debut of Paderewski.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted for the high musical quality of its individual members, many of whom are of virtuoso rank and gave up the career of soloist to join its ranks, while not a few of the greatest virtuoso of to-day are graduates from the orchestra. Particularly fortunate is the orchestra in the leaders of its various sections. Its concert master, Professor Willy Hess, is a violinist of world wide reputation and is acknowledged as one of the greatest masters of his instrument in the world. As concert master he probably has no equal. His long years of experience have given him an enormous routine, and no matter what the emergency may be he is always an absolutely safe leader. His associate at the first desk, Sylvain Noack, is another virtuoso of great reputation, and for several years occupied a similar place in Amsterdam's celebrated orchestra.

Emile Ferir, the leading viola, is another artist who enjoyed a most enviable reputation in Europe before he came to Boston. He is a Belgian, a winner of the first prize in the famous Conservatory of Brussels, and is the fortunate possessor of one of the finest violas in the world, made by the celebrated Gaspar di Salo in Brescia in 1610. Carl Barleben, the leader of the second violins, was one of the first to play the Tschaikowsky violin concerts in this country. Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist, is a virtuoso of highest standing and was famous throughout Germany before he came to Boston. Particularly strong are the double basses of the orchestra. No less than three of the men in this back row of the orchestra can play Pakanini etudes, written for the violin, on their cumbrous instruments.

In the wind section of the orchestra are just as notable artists. George Longy the first oboe, occupies a unique position in the world of music, for he is credited with being the finest oboe in the world. Andre Maquarre, the first flute, was held to be the greatest master of his instrument in Paris while Peter Sadony, the first bassoon, held a similar position in Germany. The solo horn is Max Hess, who is one of the three great hornists now in America, and it is doubtful whether there is a better trumpet in this country than Louis Kloepfel. All these men draw high salaries and having them and others of their kind makes the Boston Symphony Orchestra the most expensive orchestra in the world. Its annual expenses are at least fifty per cent greater than those of any orchestra in this country. While its income runs into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, it is rarely equal to the demands made on it by its great salary list and other expenses.

This programme will be given on Saturday evening:

"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle, "My Country") .....Smetana

The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" in B minor, Op. 74.....Tschaikowsky

I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
II. Allegro con grazia
III. Allegro molto vivace
IV. Finale; Adagio lamentoso

Concert in D major for violin, Op. 61 .....Beethoven

I. Allegro ma non troppo
II. Larghetto
III. Rondo

Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Soloist, Mischa Elman.

Seats for the concert will go on sale at Gibons & Stone's music store Wednesday morning.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighty strong, left Boston last night bound for Buffalo, where a concert will be given to-night. After Buffalo the orchestra will play at Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis and Columbus. The concert at Columbus will take place on Friday night, after which the orchestra will come to Rochester by special train for the concert here at Convention Hall on Saturday night.

The soloist, Mischa Elmon, will play the Beethoven Concerto, at the Rochester concert.

Fred Comee as Evangelist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventy-six strong, carries its evangel of perfect playing into the Middle West this week. Fred R. Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, is in charge of the expedition, and the soloists are Mischa Elman, violinist; Mrs. Seabury C. Ford, soprano, and Professor Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester will be visited in the order indicated. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and the overture to "Tannhaeuser" are Conductor Fiedler's battle horses.

Three of the programmes are peculiarly notable because of their length. Here they are: Detroit, January 26, Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 5; MacDowell, "Lamia;" R. Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration;" Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," and overture to "Tannhaeuser." Cleveland, January 27 (with Mrs. Ford as soloist), Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Schumann, symphony No. 4; MacDowell, "Lamia"; Sibelius, "Finland"; Verdi, aria from Aida"; Wagner, prelude and "love death" from "Tristan und Isolde," and overture to "Tannhaeuser." Columbia, January 22, Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Tschaikowsky, "Pathetic" symphony; Smetan, "Moldau"; Sibelius, "Finland"; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," and overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will begin his concert tour almost immediately. Owing to the great demand made for concerts, G. A. Ellis, of Boston, his manager, has prevailed upon him to stay in this country somewhat longer than he originally intended, and he will be in America until about the first of April. In this time he will give forty concerts, instead of the twenty originally planned. He will play twelve times with orchestras, eight of which will be with the Boston Symphony, two with the Chicago Orchestra and one each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras, and give about thirty recitals. He will make but two appearances in Philadelphia. The first will be his recital, which will be in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 3. The second will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday, February 15. These will positively be his only appearances in Philadelphia this year.

Paderewski is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday, January 26, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will begin his concert tour almost immediately. Owing to the great demand made for concerts, Manager has prevailed upon him to stay in this country somewhat longer than he originally intended, and he will be in America until about the 1st of April. In this time he will give 40 concerts instead of the 20 originally planned. He will play 12 times with orchestras, eight of which will be with the Boston Symphony, two with the Chicago Orchestra and one each with the Minneapolis and St. Paul Orchestras, and give about 30 recitals. He will make but two appearances in Philadelphia. The first will be his recital, which will be in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 3. The second will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday, February 15. These will positively be his only appearances in Philadelphia this year.

Paderewski To Play Here.

Paderewski's only Baltimore appearance this year will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he will be the soloist with that organization at its fourth Baltimore concert on February 17.

The great Polish artist is due to arrive in New York Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and will begin his eighth concert tour of America immediately. He will remain in America until April 1, and in that time will give 40 concerts.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From UNION AD

Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pass through Rochester this noon, arriving at 12:20 and stopping for luncheon at the New York Central station. The first of the six concerts to be given in the interior cities will be at Buffalo to-night. Other engagements to be filled are as follows: Tuesday evening, Detroit, Mich.; Wednesday evening, Cleveland, Ohio; Thursday evening, Indianapolis, Ind.; Friday evening, Columbus, Ohio; Saturday evening, Rochester, making a total trip of 2,211 miles. The party travels in a special train of three sleeping cars and baggage car, and is in charge of Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee. Seats for the local engagement go on sale Wednesday [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

ss

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

JAN 2 1909

Manchester's Crackerjacks will be the attraction at the Corinthian Theater this week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its series of six concerts in the interior cities at Buffalo to-night. The organization left Boston at 11 o'clock last night by special train and will pass through Rochester at noon to-day. From Buffalo the orchestra will go to Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis and Columbus. Following the Columbus concert on Friday night the eighty musicians will come direct to Rochester by Special train for the concert here on Saturday night at Convention Hall. Seats for the engagement may be had Wednesday morning at Gibbons & Stone's.

JAN 25 1909

From

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra passed through Rochester today en route to Buffalo where a concert will take place tonight. Six cities are to be visited in all on the present tour of the orchestra, and the Rochester engagement will take place next Saturday night at Convention Hall. The full orchestra numbers 98 performers. They will return to Boston next Sunday, and resume their concerts at Symphony Hall, which are given every Friday afternoon and Saturday evening until May 1, with the exception of one week in each month, when the Boston performances are omitted and the orchestra visits in succession, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Seats for Saturday night's concert will be on sale Wednesday at Gibbons and Stone's.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

Paderewski's New Symphony ~~Soon to Be Heard~~

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday he brought with him the long-expected Symphony, which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours, he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last Summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month.

The Symphony, which is said to be a work of considerable importance, was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements, and is complete as it stands. But Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. About an hour and a quarter are occupied in its performance.

The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland, and in the second the composer has endeavored to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the Revolution, which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred.

A full modern orchestra is used, and, in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones (which are new instruments, distantly related to the saxophone), besides a new instrument of percussion, which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

The first performance of this Symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18.

om

dress

te

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

COLUMBIAN

ess

1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS.

Places Are Engaged for Several Out-of-Town Parties.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at English's Thursday evening opened to-day at the box office of the theater. There are to be several box parties, for which seats have been taken, and seats have been reserved for parties from Seymour, Muncie, Shelbyville, Crawfordsville, Frankfort and other places, as well as many for music lovers of this city. This will be the first time Indianapolis will hear the orchestra under its new director, Max Fiedler, who came from Europe to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who directed the orchestra on its last two visits. Willy Hess, concert master, will appear on the program as soloist, playing the Bruch concerto in G minor for violin with the orchestra. The sale of seats will continue until the evening of the concert.

m

iress

e

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the best orchestras in the world — the special glory and distinction, musically, of New England. It is partly endowed and is not in the money-making business. Its great purpose is to render great music in the best way and so to raise the standard of music culture and appreciation, primarily in Boston, and as far as practicable, like all good deeds, in the country at large. The orchestra makes one brief trip into the central West each year, giving four concerts. This year the cities it will visit are Rochester, Detroit, Columbus and Indianapolis. The concert here will be Thursday night of this week. This will be the third annual visit of the orchestra to our city; it only goes where it is most appreciated; and other cities have tried to get it away from Indianapolis, which has been so greatly favored. Unless our music lovers show their appreciation of the opportunity offered them by greeting this orchestra with a large audience we can not expect that it will continue its visits in future. It will go where people are glad to hear it.

ELMAN, VIOLINIST, COMING.

To Play Here Saturday with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seats for the engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mischa Elman as soloist, at Convention hall on Saturday evening, will be on sale to-morrow at Gibbons & Stone's.

It is due to the engagement of the orchestra here that Rochester is to have the privilege of hearing Elman. Several months ago the young Russian violinist was secured by the Boston Symphony management for ten appearances. He has already filled eight of these and his appearance here on Saturday night will complete his engagement with the orchestra for the present.

EVENING OF DELIGHT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mischa Elman Gave Great Concert.

The annual visit to Buffalo of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event which is always anticipated with the greatest interest and never fails to attract an immense audience. Last night was no exception.

Besides the orchestra, which alone is sufficient to draw crowds of lovers of high-class music, there were two additional attractions—the first appearance of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who succeeds Dr. Muck, and the debut of the gifted young violinist, Mischa Elman, as soloist.

The orchestra now numbers nearly 100 picked men, and the artistic program, arranged so wisely by Mr. Fiedler, was played with the skill and finish for which this organization is so famous.

"The Moldau," symphonic poem by Smetana, was the opening number and proved a most beautiful and appealing tone-picture. The flutes, accompanied by pizzicato chords by the violins and harp, represent most vividly the source of the river. Then follows the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs, and ending with the rapids and the broad river in all its grandeur. The orchestra gave this delightful selection a most perfect rendering, bringing out the details of the picture with vivid realism.

The Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, called also the Pathetique symphony, with its four movements, adagio, allegro, allegro molto vivace and adagio lamentoso, was the last important work of the great composer. Its grand and majestic harmonies and its mournful melodies were his final and most complete bequest to the musical world. The allegro molto vivace was especialily beautiful, the dainty scherzo effect ending with a gorious movement in the form of a triumphal march. This so captivated the audience that Mr. Fiedler was not content to accept all the praise, and graciously motioned to his men, who rose in their places in acknowledgment of the prolonged applause.

The concerto in D major for violin, by Beethoven, was the selection played with the orchestra by Mischa Elman. The wonderful attainments of this young violinist have not been exaggerated. His execution is marvelous, and he has a masterful way of manipulating his instrument that is astonishing and worthy of a mature artist. He fairly swayed his audience with the power and sympathy of his playing, and as he closed the last movement he was given an ovation. The applause was tumultuous. He was recalled eight or nine times, but only bowed his acknowledgments. It is a question whether such insistent applause is advisable, but when given as it was last night it might have been well to gratify an audience whose appreciation and admiration for this young artist's playing was so enthusiastically demonstrated. The rules of any management should not be so inflexible as to prevent an occasional exception.

The final number on the program was he ever popular overture to "Tannhauser," hich the orchestra gave with spirit and recision, thus closing a most delightful nd wholly satisfactory concert.

om

ddress

The policy adopted three years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of having each season only a limited number of soloists has brought much woe among the visiting virtuosi. Until the season of 1906-1907 it was the custom of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in common with most other orchestras of this country to have a soloist at every concert. With the coming of Dr. Muck this was changed so that soloists were engaged for only about half of the concerts and for these only soloists of highest rank. Mediocrity was discarded entirely. Not only did this policy have no ill effect on the patronage given to the orchestra, but it was interesting to see that with the exception of such times as a Paderewski, Ysaye, Melba or some other artist of towering personality and strength, the public patronized the sololess concerts even better than they did those with soloists. All artists, pianists, violinists, 'cellists and the like have regarded an engagement with America's first orchestra as the only means of a proper introduction to the American public, for an appearance with the Boston Symphony has come to mean for any virtuosi a guarantee of excellence. Managers offer any inducements to the orchestra to have their artists appear with it, but the rule of the orchestra has been from the beginning that what is worth having is worth paying for. Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who is one of the most prominent figures in the musical world will be the soloist at the Rochester concert, to be held in Convention Hall on Saturday evening of this week.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MUSICAL FEATURE OF SEASON

Mischa Elman, the Boy Violinist, Created a Sensation by His Wonderful Playing.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mischa Elman "A heaven born genius," as he has been rightly described, interpreted Smetana, Tschaikowski, Beethoven and Wagner to an audience last night which filled the vast spaces of Convention Hall, an audience at once sympathetic and warmly apreciative, an audience which was keyed up to intense silence during which Elman spun the finest of his violin tones, an audience that swayed in tremulous response to the "Tannhauser" Overture in which Mr. Fiedler demonstrated his love for big, broad, stirring, orchestral harmony, bring out every salient detail with tremendous eloquence and telling emphasis.

It was a fitting climax for a program which began with Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau." The orchestra showed endless resources from the first faint swelling flute passage accompanied by pizzicato chords of the violin and harps, painting to the mind's eye the tiny spring of the Bohemian forest, through its wild ungovernable passion of the rapids, until it vanished into a tended singing voice which trailed itself thin as a spiders thread into the poet's ethereal fancy.

Then came Tschaikowsky's "Symphony "Pathetic" in B. Minor-Op. 74. It was the composer's last work and all the passing languors, the haunting tears, were caught by leader and orchestra and woven into a vivid and thrilling appeal to the very ears of the heart. The perfect fusion of tone gave this familiar offering a new meaning to the audience.

Of course the interest of the program was centered in young Elman. He is small in stature with massive brow and sensitive features. A mere boy? Yes.

A master? Yes. Out of the tiny shell in his hands he bronght all the tragedy, the love, the hope, the faith, and passion of the gray old world. From its strings he called out the soul of Beethoven in tones as deep and reasonant as a church organ or as clear and high as the voice of the morning lark.

He was recalled again and again and it is to be deplored that the vast audience did not know that encores are never given with the Symphony concerts. It was the musical event of the season. Mr. Fiedler will always be recalled to mind for his vividness and power. As was said of the orchestra itself.

"To particularize of Mr. Hess's violin, of Mr. Schucker's harp, of Mr. Longy's oboe, Mr. Grisez's clarinet, or Mr. Sadony's bassoon were almost invidious. Every man in the band spun his particular thread of shimmering color and perfected a program long to be remembered as the inspiration of the year."

CAPITAL WILL HEAR YOUNG ELMAN AGAIN

Remarkable Boy Violinist to Appear in Recital Next Friday.

Music lovers who heard the remarkable performance of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, when he appeared here several weeks ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be interested to know that he will return to Washington for a recital Friday afternoon, January 29, in the New National Theater. The recital will be a benefit in aid of the Mt. Vernon Seminary Free Kindergarten at Neighborhood House, and society is holding open the date in order to give its support and have the pleasure of hearing this musician again.

Many artists come to Washington during the season, and there is always sure to be some feature of his or her work which attracts attention. Elman came heralded as "the latest young genius of the age," and, as is usual in such cases, the local public went to hear him as an adjunct of the Boston Symphony. But the big audience that afternoon was hardly prepared for the surprise in store. Rarely has a more beautiful or more unusual performance ever been given by a young artist of the concert stage. His work was a revelation and from the conclusion of the first movement of the concerto he played he was ilonized.

[159]

Cable Address, "MEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ADVERTISER
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 27 1909

SYMPHONY OR-CHESTRA OF BOSTON

Greeted by an Immense Audience—Wild Enthusiasm Over Elman, the Russian Violinist.

Mischa Elman, the great violinist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its new director, Max Fielder, were the attractions at one of the most brilliant concerts of the season held last evening in Convention Hall.

There was an immense audience, which thoroughly enjoyed some of the finest works of the greatest masters, and the concert will long be remembered.

Elman has created a sensation in the musical world and all were eager to hear him. He is but 18 years old, of Russian birth, and is the wonder of the country.

His genius is marvelous, and he plays the most difficult compositions with the greatest ease.

His rendition of the Beethoven concerto in D major for violin op. 61 was marvelous, and his hearers were left breathless with admiration. His wonderful legato and flawless intonation were displayed in the second movement. So delighted were his hearers that he was recalled at least a dozen times to bow his acknowledgments.

Mr. Fiedler, the new director, proved himself worthy of all the remarkable things that have been said of him.

He showed great musical intelligence and directed the orchestra with dignity.

A symphonic poem, "The Moldau No. 2 of the Cycle My Country," by Smetana, was delightfully played.

The magnificent Tschaikowsky symphony, "Pathetic," in B minor, op. 74, followed. A storm of applause greeted this number, which is one of the most exquisite symphonies that has ever been written.

The Tannhauser overture closed the programme, and was superbly played.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

WILLY HESS, VIOLINIST.

Willy Hess, concertmaster with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play at English's Opera-house to-morrow night, is also the soloist for the occasion. Mr. Hess is widely known in both this country and Europe as a master of his instrument, and his number to-morrow night will be the Bruch concert No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26, with three movements. This is one of the greatest of violin compositions, and is played throughout the world by the best performers. The complete program for the concert will be:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.... Beethove
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" in B minor. Op. 74.... Tschaikowsk
Adagio: Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, Op. 26.. Bruch
Allegro moderato.
Adagio.
Finale: Allegro energico.
Overture to "Tannhæuser" ..... Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

—Reports continue to come in of the remarkable violin playing of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist who will be heard here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall Saturday night. In an article in this weeks Musical America the Boston correspondent of that paper says of the young virtuoso's playing; "The attempt to explain the extraordinary maturity of this young man as an artist would be as futile as unprofitable. Such wisdom is inborn, and more than any knowledge acquired with years. Say, rather, that Mischa Elman is one of the few who spring from the consciousness of a century, as Minerva from Jupiter, to voice the sensibilities and the aspirations of the gae." Seats for the concert on Saturday evening went on sale to-day at Gibbons & Stone's.

Cable Address, "MEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will be given in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 2nd. This concert will bring to Providence for the first time Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, who had such a sensational success at her debut in Boston on last Friday afternoon and Saturday eveing. Miss Arnaud, who is but 17 years old, aroused the utmost enthusiasm in both of the audiences, and the general opinion was that what Mischa Elman is to the violin, this French girl is to the piano.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive program for this his last concert in Providence. It begins with Weber's overture to "Oberon." Then comes Schumann's delightful symphony in D-minor, No. 4. Miss Arnaud will play Saint-Saens' concerto for piano and orchestra in G-minor, No. 2, and the final number will be the overture to "Tannhauser."

The sale of seats will open at Steinert's on next Saturday morning, Jan. 30th.

The work which is being accomplished in the religious and social departments was also graphically described. In the latter are two clubs—the Friendship club, made up of girls in the educational department, and the Entre Nous club, made up of girls in the boarding house and entirely of a social character, meeting twice during the month.

Miss Farrar explained that the work of the industrial department had not advanced as far as they could wish—to enlarge it means willing workers to go to the industrial establishments and the factories and form clubs. Just here Miss Farrar sent out the plea to club women: "Come and help us push it."

The physical department is presided over by a trained director and is very popular. The home training junior department is very prosperous with its 250 little people, who are taught to sew. Also the kindergarten, kitchen gardens and home training, all under this department.

Miss Farrar also referred to the value of the Travelers' Aid department and gave illustrations of the "little things that count for so much" which Miss Billings is constantly doing, which go to demonstrate that this department is indeed worth while. To the question often asked, "What kind of girls are you helping?" she said: "Girls in the shops, cash girls, stenographers, bookkeepers, factory girls. In fact," she added, "we meet girls in every class of life, and we need them—the girl of leisure, the business girl, all are needed in our work, which knows no class distinction."

The work of the Y. W. C. A. was classed as a work of prevention rather than a rescue work (although the latter is not neglected when it presents itself). It takes the girl before wrong has found its way and furnishes a home and social life, affording her an opportunity to mingle with frieds who are hopeful.

In closing her talk, which was listened to with the deepest interest, Miss Farrar noted the number of girls in this city who are without homes, showing that while Providence is essentially a city of homes, it is also a city of industries, and within its borders are 28,000 working women, 7000 of whom are boarding. The present needs of the association, she said, are workers and money—money to aid to raise the indebtedness upon the home and thus be able to carry on the work more completely, and workers whose hearts shall be touched with the needs of these 7000 women and girls.

Following several selections by the graphophone, Mrs. Clark H. Johnson gave an instructive paper on "Greece Under the Roman Conquerors," which closed the afternoon's program, followed by a social hour and refreshments served by the hostess and her daughters.

ARTISTS GET PENSIONS

ORCHESTRA HOLDS MEMBERS

SYSTEM ADOPTED BY FAMOUS BOSTON ORGANIZATION TO KEEP HIGH STANDARD OF MUSICAL PERFECTION.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at English's Opera House tomorrow evening in an interesting program chosen from Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Wagner. Apart from the musical reputation of this organization, its maintenance of a pension fund for old members has attracted much attention, there being a large number of men who, after long service in the orchestra, are now retired on comfortable incomes. This has insured a long-continued membership in the orchestra and a more perfect musical organization.

The Tschaikowsky numbers to be given tomorrow evening are particularly promising. The program will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

This year the orchestra began to pay pensions to thirteen of its former members who had been retired from the orchestra for one reason or another. Before a member of the orchestra becomes eligible to a pension, he must have been in its ranks for ten years. Retiring after ten years' service he receives a minimum pension, the pension increasing up to twenty-five years of service, which is the maximum pension.

Methods of Raising Fund.

The money for the pension fund is raised in three ways: By annual assessment on the members of the orchestra; by the receipts from two special concerts given each winter by the orchestra in Symphony Hall, and by gifts made to the fund by friends of the orchestra.

Some rather interesting statistics were brought out recently regarding the membership of the orchestra. The number of musicians employed is ninety-seven. Of these eighty have been in the orchestra more than four years. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. The program follows:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.. Beethoven
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74.. Tchaikowsky
(a) Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
(b) Allegro con grazia.
(c) Allegro molto vivace.
(d) Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, Op. 26.. Bruch
(a) Allegro moderato.
(b) Adagio.
(c) Finale: Allegro energico.
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 28 1909

PADEREWSKI BRINGS SYMPHONY

Pianist Says New Work Will Take 75 Minutes to Perform.

New York, Jan. 27.—Ignace Jan Paderewski, Polish pianist and composer, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, to make a short American tour.

"It is more as a composer than as a pianist that I come to America this time," said Mr. Paderewski. "I have just finished the symphony which is going to be produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—it is a sort of symphonic poem—and that is mainly what has brought me over here. I shall not play in many concerts, not more than thirty or thirty-five, at most, and those mostly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra or other similar organizations.

"I have devoted all my attention of late to the symphony. It is extremely long, and will take more than an hour and a quarter to perform. tI took five months to compose it, and I am satisfied.

"It was my ambition to have the symphony produced first over here, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its excellence has been attained by uniformity of direction and conducting, and also by continuous playing together."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 28 1909

The Buffalo newspapers of yesterday gave enthusiastic reports of the playing of Mischa Elman, the violinist, who appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloist on Monday night. The young Russian was repeatedly recalled and cheered. He played the Beethoven concerto in D major, the same number in which he will be heard here on Saturday night, with the Boston Symphony at Convention hall.

COMES IN SPECIAL TRAIN

ORCHESTRA GIVEN COMFORTS

ORGANIZATION MUST HAVE BEST OF EVERYTHING IN ORDER TO PLAY UP TO BOSTON STANDARD—CONCERT HERE TONIGHT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of eighty men, will arrive from Detroit at 8 o'clock this morning for its concert at English's Opera House tonight.

The Boston orchestra travels in a special train consisting of three Pullman sleepers and a baggage car. The orchestra always travels most luxuriously, because it is a theory in Boston, the result of many years' experience, that unless the men have all the comforts that money can secure for them in a week of arduous traveling they will be unable to play as well as their reputation demands. Whether the orchestra spends a night in a city or not, rooms are always engaged at one of the best hotels for the men to rest in in the afternoon and to dress in before the concerts—and never more than two men are allotted to a room. If it is possible, traveling is done in the daytime, to avoid sleeping on the cars, but the same train of Pullmans is held throughout the trip. The orchestra will spend the day at the Claypool Hotel.

Never Twice a Day.

Under no conditions does the orchestra ever give two concerts in one day. If there is a concert in the afternoon there is none in the evening, and vice versa. Further than that it is only under the most exceptional conditions that there is ever a rehearsal and concert on the same day, traveling or at home. In the East, among the musicians of New York particularly, a great deal of fun is made of the way the management of the Boston Symphony looks after its men, but the management has found that it pays in the end. It costs more money to treat the members like artists and to provide them with every comfort, but the concerts given by the orchestra tell the story.

[160]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNDER MR. FIEDLER

New Conductor Exhibits Rare and Wholesouled Devotion to His Noble Art.

SOME PHASES SPOKE ALMOST OF MAGIC

There are few musical events of a season that can at all compare in importance with a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The ideals and achievements which this organization represents have long since had a reputation that is national and even international.

The concert last night at Convention Hall, under local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, was noteworthy for the first appearance here of Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, and of Mischa Elman, violinist.

The program included Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto in D, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." The entrancing beauty of tone, technical perfection and other unsurpassed qualities of the orchestra were shown to the utmost in these performances which were worthy of the noblest traditions of this great organization.

Spoke Almost of Magic.

Mr. Fiedler displays strong characteristics as a conductor; breadth of effect, power to build impressive climaxes, virile, dramatic conceptions, complete lack of the sensational in his readings, together with such an earnestness and sincerity that the listener feels that here is one inspired by a rare and whole-souled devotion to art.

Mr. Fiedler brought to the interpretation of the Smetana work a delightful play of fancy, and no demand made by him on the orchestra was too small or too great not to be responded to with a spontaneity that spoke almost of magic.

The new conductor's reading of the "Pathetic" symphony has distinction and character of its own that is full of individuality and interest. In the performance of this wonderful work, of which Tschaikowsky said he was prouder than any other he had written, there was missing to a large extent the personal note of poignant grief, infused with such compelling insistence in the music by more than one conductor that it was like the baring of his own heart.

Genius of Elman.

Instead of this, Mr. Fiedler's reading gives the impression of a more universal and impersonal emotion; a grief that has passed beyond being expressive of an individual grief for the entire race. If it was more restrained it was also nobler and graver, failing nowhere of deep impressiveness. The final movement and slow introduction were given with great loftiness of conception. The applause following the symphony was so prolonged that Mr. Fiedler twice brought the orchestra members to their feet to share in it.

The soloist, Mischa Elman, has for the last few years been a wonder of the world in his extraordinary technical achievements, and the still more remarkable quality and maturity of his musicianship. Mr. Elman is a great violinist, to be ranked as virtuoso among the first in the world, and possessing an inspiring freshness, life and beauty of tone, almost invariable purity of intonation, together with an insight into music and power of interpretation that can only be explained by the magic word "genius." He was recalled a dozen or more times after the Beethoven concerto.

The concert was brought to a brilliant close with the Tannhauser overture, in which the vivid painting of the Venus music, and the sonorous breadth of the last appearance of the principal theme were of great effect. It was greeted most enthusiastically by the very large audience present.

aper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

.....

.....

There was a large sale of seats yesterday for the engagement of the Boston Symphony and Mischa Elman at Convention Hall Saturday night. The diagram is at Gibbons & Stone's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s .....

.....

Musical Topics

With the members of the Longy club piping as seductively as so many descendants of the God Pan, or of a madrigal-singing shepherd, and the great Boston orchestra expounding the beauties of some of the best things in musical literature, Tuesday was a remarkable day in Detroit's musical calendar. It was a day to make the dweller in the provinces envy the favored of the Gods who, camping around Beacon hill, may have such choice things almost as a daily menu.

The unquestioned supremacy of the Boston band was enough to draw the most numerous and appreciative audience of the season to the Light Guard armory in the evening when one of the regular programs of the Detroit Orchestra association was given. The feature which marked the event with unusual interest was of course the appearance of Max Fiedler, as conductor; for the program offered nothing that was unusual, although it was a most attractive array of some of the best things that could be crowded into one evening.

Mr. Fiedler has none of that cold austerity that characterized Dr. Muck and some of the latter's predecessors. Although that stiff back and the poise of the head and arms indicated at once rigid authority and will force, yet as soon as there was action there was likewise an indication of warmth without any of the bizarre effects that some of the Latin gentlemen of the baton assume. In the long program, from Weber's "Oberon" to Wagner's "Tannhauser," the one point that impressed itself perhaps as much as any, beyond the magnificent powers of the man, was his aim for contrast. He secured it with astonishing effect in some cases. Always there was the perfect control that when occasion required worked the orchestra up to the most exacting display of musical expression.

With the Beethoven symphony, No. 5, in C minor, which is regarded by many as the greatest the master wrote, the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" by Strauss and such old favorites as the overtures from "Tannhauser" and "Oberon," there was enough on the program to reach every taste and the fact that some of these selections were exceptionally familiar to even the casual concert-goers took nothing from the enjoyment of the evening. An interesting change was made in the program when for Smetana's "The Moldau," MacDowell's "Lamia" was substituted.

The appearance of the Longy club, the members of which are in the woodwind choir of the Boston orchestra, was made in the afternoon in the Church of Our Father under the auspices of the Tuesday musicale. The program was a peculiar delight, for it offered little heard music by a most unusual and attractive combination of instruments, two oboes, two flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons and two horns. The luscious, mellow combination of tone is peculiarly suited to certain musical passages and gave exquisite pleasure.

Gilbert ...

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The policy adopted three years ago by the Boston Symphony orchestra of having each season only a limited number of soloists, has brought much woe among the visiting virtuosi. Until the season of 1906-1907 it was the custom of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in common with most other orchestras of this country, to have a soloist at every concert. With the coming of Dr. Muck this was changed so that soloists were engaged for only about half of the concerts and for these only soloists of highest rank. Mediocrity was discarded entirely.

Not only did this policy have no ill effect on the patronage given to the orchestra, but it was interesting to see that with the exception of such times as a Paderewski, Ysaye, Melba or some other artist of towering personality and strength, the public patronized the sololess concerts even better than they did those with soloists

All artists, pianists, violinists, 'cellists and the like have regarded an engagement with America's first orchestra as the only means of a proper introduction to the American public, for an appearance with the Boston Symphony has come to mean for any virtuoso a guarantee of excellence. Managers offer any inducements to the orchestra to have their artists appear with it, but the rule of the orchestra has been from the beginning that what is worth having is worth paying for.

The policy adopted with such success by the Boston Symphony has been followed, to a certain extent, by the Chicago orchestra with equal success and other orchestras this year have cut down the number of their soloists. All of this is pretty serious business for the traveling virtuoso, who looks to his orchestral appearances for his best press notices.

The only concert that the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in this city will be on Friday, January 29, in Memorial hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

bm .....

dress .....

te .....

GREAT SOLOISTS IN THE SYMPHONY

Some of the World's Most Famous Virtuosi Will Be in Columbus Friday Night.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is famous for the high musical quality of its individual members, very many of whom are of virtuoso rank and gave up the career of soloist to join its ranks. Particularly fortunate is the orchestra in the leaders of its various sections. Its concert-master Professor Willy Hess, is acknowledged as one of the greatest masters of his instrument in the world, and as concert-master he probably has no equal. His associate at the first desk, Sylvain Noack, is another virtuoso of great reputation and for several years occupied a similar position in Amsterdam's celebrated orchestra.

Emile Ferir, the leading viola, is a Belgian, a winner of the first prize in the famous Conservatory of Brussels and is possessor of one of the finest violas in the world, made by Gaspar di Salo in Brescia in 1610. Heinrich Warnke, leading 'cellist, was famous throughout Germany before he came to Boston. Particularly strong are the double basses of the orchestra. No less than three of the men in this back row can play Paganini teudes, written for the violin, on their cumbrous instruments.

In the wind section of the orchestra are just as notable artists. Georges Longy, the first oboe, is credited with the finest oboe in the world. Andre Marquarre, the first flute, was held to be the greatest master of his instrument in Paris, while Peter Sadony, the first bassoon, held a similar position in Germany. The solo horn is Max Hess, who is one of the three great hornists now in America, and it is doubtful whether there is a better trumpet in this country than Louis Kloepfel. All these men draw very high salaries and having them and others of their kind makes the Boston Symphony orchestra the most expensive orchestra in the world.

The only concert the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Columbus will be at Memorial hall, Friday night.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 2. This concert will bring to Providence for the first time Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist who had such a success at her debut in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Miss Arnaud, who is but 17 years old, aroused the utmost enthusiasm in both audiences and the general opinion was that what Mischa Elman is to the violin, this French girl is to the piano.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive programme for his last concert in Providence. It begins with Weber's overture to "Oberon." Then comes Schumann's delightful symphony in D-minor, No. 4. Miss Arnaud will play Saint-Saens's concerto for piano and orchestra in G-minor, No. 2, and the final number will be the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The sale of seats will open at Steinert's Saturday morning.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

There was a big sale of seats yesterday at Gibbons & Stone's music store for the engagement of the Boston Symphony and Mischa Elman at Convention Hall on Saturday evening. Orders for sittings from out of town places were numerous.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A critic of Musical America, writing from Boston of a recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of its wonderful young soloist, says:

"Mischa Elman's immediate and unqualified success at the symphony concert two weeks ago packed Jordan Hall to its capacity last Tuesday afternoon. It has been well remarked that the attempt to explain the extraordinary maturity of this young man as an artist would be as futile as unprofitable. Such wisdom is inborn, and more than any knowledge acquired with years. Say, rather, that Mischa Elman is one of the few who spring from the consciousness of a century, as Minerva from Jupiter, to voice the sensibilities and the aspirations of the age."

Mischa Elman is announced as the soloist for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Convention hall on Saturday night.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

GREAT BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT ENGLISH'S TO-NIGHT

INDIANAPOLIS ONE OF THE FEW CITIES FAVORED.

ONLY FEW EQUALS IN WORLD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, that will give a single concert this evening at English's, has arrived in the city and with it the renowned director, Max Fiedler, who is at the Claypool. Mr. Fiedler, as well as other famous directors of this great organization, is from Germany. He is a well-built man of medium hight, with a kindly face and hair and mustache touched with gray. Mr. Fiedler, like many other Germans who come to this country, speaks excellent English. He has spent much time in England, and besides married an English wife. Mr. Fiedler's brother is a professor of German at Oxford, England, and two of the director's children are in Oxford with him.

The Boston orchestra will spend only one week away from Boston, and Indianapolis is one of the few cities to enjoy a visit from this organization. Mr. Fiedler, in speaking of the trip West, said: "It is a great pleasure for me to come West, but your country is so huge. Here I am twenty-four hours on a fast train from Boston and most of the country is in front of me still.

Hard to Realize.

"Germans who have never been here can not realize and it is difficult to give them any idea of it. It is the same with your musical and artistic life. Musically America is the child of Germany, and yet the stay-at-home German hasn't the faintest idea of what the musical life in this country means—and he wouldn't admit it if he had. Of course, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is famous in Germany, for every musican who comes here makes it a point to hear it and carries the news back home, but even the best disposed European who has never heard it has no idea how wonderful an instrument it is. I can not conceive any higher pleasure for a conductor than to have such an orchestra to lead—and there are only one or two orchestras in Europe to compare with it.

"The basis of music to-day, as always, rests on the great classics, the works of the great masters of the past. But one should not neglect the superstructure and ornamentation. An honest love for Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann should not preclude an honest love for Richard Strauss or Tschaikowsky or Smetana or Claude Debussy. Because one loves Wagner does that mean that he should not care for Verdi, or Donizetti, or Puccini? And the reverse is just as true.

Strauss a Master.

"Richard Strauss I regard as a master and Debussy has a wonderfully original talent, if not genius. What is more, I have a decided fondness for ballet music of the better sort and include it sometimes in my programs. Everything is grist that comes to the conductor's mill.

"America has composers of great talent—MacDowell, Chadwick, Loeffler, Foote, Converse and others. You have magnificent orchestras which are making you familiar with the best works in musical literature. You spend enormous sums each year for music and get the best, and who knows when out of this great melting pot of America the great genius is not coming to the surface. The love of good music seems to be genuine and each year it is brought to a greater public. I see no reason why America should not have a brilliant future, musically."

884

[161]

NEW CONDUCTOR IS INTRODUCED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pays Annual Visit to Cleveland.

Mrs. Seabury C. Ford Left an Excellent Impression as Soloist.

BY PAUL E. TEICHERT.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Cleveland last night at the Grays' Armory was marked by the usual large audience, which, however, did not quite fill the hall. Two years ago, at the last concert of the greatest orchestra in the country, and, perhaps, the world, quite a number of extra chairs had to be placed near the stage to accommodate those clamoring for admission. The empty seats last night, therefore, indicated that the metropolis of Ohio has not made much progress in musical growth and appreciation in the last two years. The musical event of the season, which the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly is, should have drawn the record audience of the year.

Cleveland, thanks to the efforts of the Fortnightly Musical Club, has been introduced to each of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductors since the days of Gericke. Two years ago Dr. Muck directed the last concert, and last night Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, Muck's successor, stood before the conductor's desk here for the first time as leader of this great orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler's conducting reminded of Hans Von Buelow's adage that the conductor is the concert. Since Von Buelow asserted the right of ownership of an audience's attention the days of the prima donna conductor in America have left their impression and have shown Von Buelow's wisdom to be reasonable, even impartial. Fiedler's manner and method forced upon the audience the impression that he is a strict disciplinarian, who wants what he wants when he wants it. His manner is direct and forceful, his attitude emphatic and energetic. He springs at details with the muscular hammering of a Vulcan, and drives his intent into the sections of the orchestra with iron bolts. He is emphatic in climaxes and in detail passages. A rhetorical pause he delights in, using it often, but not for showy effects. Such pauses with him are strict, necessary, convincing. He makes his readings graphic and vigorous, emphasizing without mercy, as in the "Tannhaeuser" overture. His fire burns quickly and spreads with enormous speed.

Whenever the tempo is slow, Mr. Fiedler takes it, indeed, slow as in the opening measures of the "Oberon" overture and the prelude of "Tristan." He builds his climaxes on short notice, so to say, but they are felt before they appear. His work is that of a painter who splashes his colors vigorously, but with an excellent drawing underneath. It is impressionistic in detail as well as in ensemble, but with the emphasis on the detail.

This emphasis on detail makes his readings intensely illuminative, but somehow emotion and warmth are lacking in his conducting. The Schumann symphony was not a work of emotional and poetic contrast, but of intellectual precision. At least that was the impression.

There were two novelties on last night's program—McDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia" and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finland." "Lamia" is quasi program music, music of romanticism, music of modernism. It is a work which impresses at the first hearing of coming not from the pen of a madman, as McDowell has been accused of being before he really was driven mad, but from the pen of a decidedly sane musician who has wonderful command of the full resources of the modern orchestra. The Sibelius work is a rugged piece of modern orchestral writing, stern, grim, gray and powerful in its coloring and in its impression upon the auditor.

Mrs. Seabury C. Ford was the recipient of many flowers at the close of the "Aida" aria which she sang with spirited conception, and with excellent vocal control. She was recalled several times, but did not respond to the demands for an encore.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

Boston Symphony Orchestra To-night

To-night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall will begin at 8.15. Tickets for unreserved balcony seats will be on sale at 7.30 this evening. The orchestra is due to arrive here about noon to-day by special train from Columbus, O.

WORK DIFFERS AS BATON IS CHANGED

Boston Symphony, Under New Leader, Makes Totally Contrasting Impression.

Program at Armory Concert Devoted to Romantic School.

It is interesting to observe the different impressions which the same orchestra makes when playing under different conductors. Thus the Boston Symphony, which played here under Max Fiedler at the Grays' armory last night, was totally distinct from the Boston Symphony which played here under Karl Muck two years ago. The orchestra of the earlier date was an organization of faultless technic and faultless interpretation, which found its highest ideal in faultlessly rendering works of faultless form. The orchestra of last evening devoted itself exclusively to the romantic school, Schumann, Weber, Wagner, MacDowell and Sibelius. Moreover, its performances of these modern works were marked by striking emotionalism, an emotionalism which mostly made, but sometimes marred.

Thus one could hardly imagine a better presentation of the overture to "Oberon," with its colossal contrasts of elfin pianissimo songlike melody and explosive climax. The MacDowell tone-poem, "Lamia," a rarely beautiful work, with its lusciousness of melody—there is no other word and its color of orchestration was splendidly given. MacDowell is, unfortunately, best known through his charming but microscopic piano pieces. The rendition of larger works, such as this "Lamia," especially when so excellent, must arouse the enthusiasm of all, tending as they do fittingly to honor the one genius whom America has as yet produced, and her greatest martyr to an ungenerous musical public.

Sibelius' "Finlanda," with prisoned passion beating against the bars through its early measure was a piece of wonderful tone color and glowing feeling.

It was in the Schumann D minor symphony that the expressive powers of Fiedler overemphasized themselves. To be sure, the work was portrayed in ardent shadings and in great clearness of part detail. But the spirit of the whole was in a measure lacking. The work in general, with exception of the romance, was taken just a trifle too slow, and enough to rob it of its essential flavor. Schumann's vital energy is no less important than his softer poetic feeling. This was especially true of the finale which, with its complicated development, palls upon the average hearer unless carried through at a tremendous tempo. In the romance, also, though the first period still clings in our memories, for sheer beauty of utterance, the solo violin embroidered its lace like accompaniment with too sharp a needle. It was precise, rather than hazy dreaming.

Mrs. S. C. Ford sang "Ritorna Vincitor," from Verdi's "Aida," with unique effect. Her voice was flexible, expressive and commanding, and her interpretation forceful in the last degree. She created in the bare hall without stage or costume the very atmosphere of the scene which the song represents.

FLORENCE E. ALLEN.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WILL PLAY PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY HERE

The new symphony of Paderewski, who has arrived in this country to give about 30 concerts, mostly with the Boston Orchestra, will be played for the first time with the Orchestra in Boston on February 12 and 13. Max Fiedler will conduct, but Paderewski will supervise the rehearsals.

The symphony, on which the pianist has worked for more than a year, resembles a symphonic poem, has three long movements and requires 1 hour and 20 minutes for its performance. The work has no program, but the finale is built on the Polish national anthem. Paderewski will be heard in Baltimore at the next concert of the Boston Orchestra.

TIMES,

Juliet, and Richard III."

* * *

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall tomorrow night will be the fifth appearance of that body in Rochester. The orchestra came here first in 1884. Two years later another concert was given. Then after an absence of 12 years the Boston musicians came back. The support given the later concerts by Rochester seems to assure at least an occasional visit from the orchestra hereafter.

[162]

EVENING POST,

New York City.

JAN 28 1909

Paderewski and His Symphony.

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday, he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly-awaited symphony which was first anounced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month.

"The symphony is a work of monumental character," writes Mr. W. E. Walter of Boston. "It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64 and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred.

"A full modern orchestra is used and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones—an instrument which is a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder."

The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Smphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, February 18.

The only Paderewski recital in New York will be given at Carnegie Hall next Tuesday afternoon, when he will play: Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Bach; Sonata, op. 111, Beethoven; Etudes Symphoniques, Schumann; Nocturne, E major, op. 62; Mazurka A-flat, op. 59; Barcarolle; Polonaise, op. 53, Chopin; Reflets dans l'eau, Debussy; Rhapsodie hongroise, Liszt.

Star
Indianapolis Ind
Jan 29-09

ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON

GIVES CONCERT AT ENGLISH'S

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE, AND WILLY HESS, AS SOLOIST, IS RECALLED TIME AND AGAIN BY APPLAUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a new conductor, Max Fiedler, appeared last night at English's Opera House, sharing the honors of the evening with Will Hess, the concertmeister, who appeared as soloist.

A slight change was made in the program, the tone poem, "Death and the Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, being substituted for the final number, the overture to "Tannhauser."

The orchestra quite lived up to its reputation, adding to the esteem it is held in here through its previous engagements. In Mr. Fiedler the organization has gained a conductor of firm and convincing manner, and vigorous and intelligent interpretation. He is vigorous, yet dignified and imparted this spirit to the works offered by the orchestra.

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" opened the program, but the best of all was the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, Pathetic, which came next. This last work of the Russian composer was more than warmly received. After each of its four movements the applause was long and insistent. At the conclusion of the symphony, Mr. Fiedler was compelled to return many times to his stand and finally asked the members of the orchestra to stand and acknowledge with him the appreciation of the audience.

Hess Also a Star.

The Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, introduced Will Hess, the concertmeister, as soloist. The orchestra accompanied him, and so profound was the impression made by the soloist that he was compelled to return and acknowledge the applause so many times that the count was lost. It seemed that the audience would never permit him to retire. His work was brilliant and masterful. At all times he was at his ease and equal to the demands made upon his skill.

The final number, "Death and the Transfiguration," almost brought the audience to its feet as it reached the climax. It is a dramatic and inspiring work and was interpreted with such skill as to be convincing.

Under Mr. Fiedler the orchestra performed admirably. In its precision, sureness and technical skill the organization is as nearly perfect as men can make it. The seventy or eighty men played as one. The concert was a fitting climax to the season. It ended the subscription series of Mrs. Talbot.

News
Indianapolis
Jan 29 09

MAGNIFICENT WORK BY GREAT BOSTON ORCHESTRA

FIRST APPEARANCE HERE OF NEW DIRECTOR, MAX FIEDLER.

SOLO BY CONCERTMEISTER

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, at English's, closed Mrs. Talbot's season of four entertainments. The audience was of moderate size, but of large enthusiasm, showing an appreciation of a magnificently played, though a very heavy program. There was a special interest in the appearance of the new director, Max Fiedler, who came for the first time to this city for this concert. The impression he made was most favorable, and he astonished when he conducted the tremendously difficult and long Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony without a line of the score before him. The "Egmont" overture (Beethoven) he also conducted without the score, and never used a note until he led the orchestra in its accompaniment to the Bruch concerto for violin No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26, which was played by the concertmaster, Willy Hess.

The announcement was made that, as a finale, in place of the Wagner overture to "Tannhæuser," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" would be substituted. There was a general disappointment that the Wagner number was omitted entirely, for it was the only one on the program that would have made a general appeal on the ground of familiarity and favor.

Mr. Fiedler's directing is strong, firm and decisive. There is never the least bit of uncertainty about any movement, and, while he gives his whole mind and body to it, it never seems exaggerated, or that any movement is lost. He is a master of his art, and his reading of the symphony was superb, and more than that, it was wholesome.

Liking for It Grows.

With each hearing of this symphony the liking for it grows. The movements are long but each one presents its own special harmonious phrases, repeated in various ways until one realizes what the building of a great symphony like this means. What could surpass the grace of the second movement, with its peculiar swinging along, first carried by the violins and the other instruments answering here and there, weaving in and out, and ever the same exquisitely undulating measure? It is well named "allegro con grazia."

The third movement is joyous in character, wrought with another thread of suggestive melody, and a contrast with the exquisite beauty of the movement preceding it. And still in further contrast is the last movement, the adagio lamentoso, with its opening phrases making a veritable wail of grief. It is declared that the composer had no definite idea as to what sort of a story or picture he was making, it was simply music. That the name "Pathetic" was fitted to it is no wonder, when one hears the fourth movement with its insinuating lament, and no matter how often distracted with other measures, this lament comes back like a soul stricken with grief and must needs brood over it. The many instruments of the orchestra were but speaking for the master, whose hand evoked their sond. When it was finished and the baton dropped there was a second's hush and then the audience began an applause that continued so long that Mr. Fiedler and all the men of the orchestra stood in acknowledgement.

Modern School.

The Richard Strauss tone poem is one of the strongest illustrations of the extremely modern school of composition. It is a mass of musical sounds woven into a wonderful tapestry of tone color. It has a title "Death and Transfiguration," but what this means musically to the lay mind would be difficult to determine. It is not difficult to picture death nor is one unfamiliar with the supposed transfiguration.

In listening to it one hears discordant harmonies, a bringing together of what used to be thought woeful discords, but which in this ultra-modern music are discords of harmony, a term almost contradictory in theory, but becoming quite common in this new field of musical composition. The skill with which Strauss works out his new and strange ideas of music can best be understood in listening to a finished playing of them such as a great body of fine musicians like these of the symphony orchestra can give. Wagner became a cultivated taste and so it is with Richard Strauss. It is not a tune, nor a melody, but the interpretation of an idea or a feeling that is presented to the music lover.

The overture to Goethe's "Egmont" (Beethoven) opened the program. The overture begins with a lamentation and ends with triumphant rejoicing. Its reading was of a well-balanced character, and the least striking of any number on the program. Its lugubrious first part made up a trio of heaviness with the final movement of the symphony and the Strauss tone poem. When Mr. Fiedler had been so complimented as a program maker, it was a pity that a "request" from patrons should have brought any change. Mr. Fiedler was too gracious in consenting to it. The "Tannhæuser" would have lightened the program effectively.

Concertmeister's Solo.

Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the orchestra, did not appear at his desk until after he had played his solo, the Bruch concerto. As he came on the stage he was cordially welcomed, and when he had finished playing he was so warmly applauded that one lost count of the times he walked from wings to front and back again to make his bows of acknowledgement.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 30 1909

SYMPHONY LEADER TALKS OF HIS ART

Max Fiedler Says Germans Have no Conception of Music in America.

As Strange to It as They Are to the Bigness and Resources of the Country.

The interest in the advent of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Memorial hall, this evening, makes pertinent some remarks of its director, Max Fiedler in a recent interview regarding music as an art, the various forms and schools of music, and the future and possibilities of music in America. It should be remembered that Max Fiedler is a German who is receiving his first impressions of this large country. Among other things he said:

"It is a great pleasure for me to come west, but your country is so huge. Here I am twenty-four hours on a fast train from Boston and most of the country is in front of me still. Germans who have never been here cannot realize and it is difficult to give them any idea of it.

"It is the same with your musical and artistic life. Musically America is the child of Germany and yet the stay-at-home German hasn't the faintest idea of what the musical life in this country means—and he wouldn't admit it if he has. Of course, the Boston Symphony orchestra is famous in Germany for every musician who comes here makes it a point to hear it and carries the news back home, but even the best disposed European who has never heard it has no idea how wonderful an instrument it is.

Triumph of Ideas.

"I think that ultimately there will be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work based on strong or beautiful themes and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Yet, I also think that the future music of more substantial form will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

"A conductor who is wise, tactful and diplomatic, should have no preference, at least not publish them. I try to find good in everything and emphasize that. But when I do not find good in a place, or think I do not, I don't play it. The basis of music, today as always is the great classics, the works of the great masters of the past. But one should not neglect the superstructure and ornamentation.

Many Loves Possible.

"An honest love for Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann should not preclude an honest love for Richard Strauss, or Tschaikowsky, or Smetana or Claude Debussy. Because one loves Wagner does that mean that he should not care for Verdi or Donizetti, or Puccini? And the reverse is just as true. Richard Strauss I regard as a master and Debussy has a wonderfully original talent, if not genius.

"America already has composers of great talent, MacDowell, Chadwick, Loeffler, Foote, Converse and others. You have magnificent orchestras which are making you familiar with the best works in musical literature. You spend enormous sums each year for music and get the best and who knows when out of this great melting pot of America the great genius is not coming to the surface? The love of good music seems to be genuine and each year it is brought to a greater public. I see no reason why America should not have a brilliant future musically."

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ADVERTISER
Address UNION
Date

Mischa Elman, who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, to-morrow night, made his first public appearance as a violinist at the age of five years. Instead of bowing to the audience on that occasion, he says that he ran onto the stage, which was very slippery, and fell at full length to the great amusement of all. This young Russian who is only eighteen years old, is a veritable wizard with the violin; he is called a second Paganini.

JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 30 1909

Boston Symphony

The visiting orchestras this season have been most unfortunate as regards the weather on the nights of their concerts. When Mr. Damrosch was here several weeks ago, the streets were almost impassable because of a deep snow. Last night a small blizzard raged, which doubtless kept many people away from the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The audience last night was a much larger one than greeted the New York Symphony orchestra. It was a representative one musically and socially. Governor and Mrs. Harmon were among the prominent people in attendance.

The Boston orchestra has a new conductor this year in the person of Mr. Max Fiedler. His readings last night certainly justifies the wise selection the directors of the Boston orchestra made when they chose a successor to Dr. Karl Muck. Mr. Fiedler's readings are fraught with the deepest insight into the music; they are intensely temperamental readings, too. It is not too much to say that nothing finer than his conducting of the Pathetique Symphony of Tschaikowsky has ever been heard here. The Chicago orchestra played this composition here several months ago, but the Boston orchestra gave a much finer interpretation last night. At the close of the stirring third movement (Allegro Molto Vivoce) the audience gave an exhibition of enthusiasm such as is rarely seen here. After insistent recalls for Mr. Fiedler, he had the entire orchestra stand up to acknowledge the demonstration. Twice was the orchestra compelled to rise, so long continued was the applause.

This symphony, which was first performed in America by Mr. Walter Damrosch's New York symphony, May 16, 1894, is one of the most intense and tragic pieces of writing to be found in the whole literature of music. The symphonic poem by Smetana, "The Moldan," describing the rushing water, the hunt, moonlight, dance of the sylphs, etc., is a composition of uncommon beauty and it secured at the hands of Mr. Fiedler a reading of great beauty.

Other numbers on the program were a most striking symphonic poem, "Finland," composed by Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer; also the prelude to Lohengrin and the Tannhauser overture. In the opening bars of the Lohengrin selection the exquisite quality of the strings was heard to fine advantage. Possibly no orchestra in the world possesses so fine a body of violins as does the Boston orchestra. The orchestra as a whole is likely as fine as any to be found in the world.

This organization played last night as they are always wont to do, with splendid and sonorous tonal quality, exquisite shading, the best of intonation, and great precision in attacks. The Boston orchestra is a joy and to miss hearing it is a great loss to any lover of music.

The program contained copious explanatory notes on the compositions written by the eminent Boston critic, Mr. Phillip Hale. These were a great help to one in enjoying the program. This concert was the fourth in the Mrs. Ella May Smith series. This series of concerts has not had the large attendance it deserved. These concerts have been really noteworthy and each and every one deserved a very large audience.

OLEY SPEAKS.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TIMES
CLEVELAND, OHIO

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES

THIS week was a notable one in musical circles due to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor. Fiedler is Dr. Muck's successor, but not his equal, even though he had the orchestra under perfect control. The attacks of the orchestra were noteworthy because they came simultaneously with the baton. Max Fiedler's conducting is forceful and he had drilled his men so that they respond. The response of the orchestra to the conductor's baton was remarkable in that it demonstrates what drill means to an orchestra. The orchestra, however, for some reason did not please the same as it did when Dr. Muck had the direction of this excellent body of men. Conductor Fiedler is forceful and virile, but it takes more than that in order to present a work pleasingly and not too academically. A musician who has temperament must be given some leeway, but not so according to Fiedler. He held his men in check instead of giving them a trifle more freedom. This was apparent most in the symphony and especially in the Scherzo. MacDowell's "Lamia" was presented with genuine feeling, while Sibelius' "Finland" was given an ideal interpretation. Conductor Fiedler is graceful and he was exceedingly conversant with what he presented, especially if one paid attention to the way in which he gave each musician his cue without referring to his score. Mrs. Seabury C. Ford had an excellent opportunity to display her vocal capabilities in Verdi's "Ritorna Vincitor." It is needless to say she took advantage of the opportunity, and made a most auspicious success. She received more flowers than had ever before been passed over the armory stage at a symphony orchestra concert.

From TIMES
Address ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Date

THE REALM OF MUSIC

The Tuesday Musicale's Programme —Something About Dr. Wuellner —Rochester Musical Notes.

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mischa Elman will take place at Convention Hall this evening. The concert is announced to begin at 8:15 and it is the hope of the management that the audience will be seated by that time. The advance sale of seats is very large, though some desirable sittings are still to be had. The sale af balcony admission tickets will begin at 7:30. This is the programme for tonight's concert:

"The Moldau"—Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the Cycle, "My Country")...Smetana
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.

Symphony, No. 6, "Pathetic," in B Minor, op. 74 .....Tschaikowsky
1. Adagio: Allegro non troppo.
2. Allegro con grazia.
3. Allegro molto vivace.
4. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

Concerto in D Major for Violin, op. 61.. ..... Beethoven
1. Allegro ma non troppo.
2. Larghetto.
3. Rondo.

Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WATERBURY, CONN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra's Appearance Will Be Musical Feature of the Season.

Under the auspices of the Music League the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at the Buckingham on Thursday evening, March 23, Max Fiedler directing. The program which has been selected for this most important event of the musical season is an excellent one with works chosen from the modern, though not ultra-modern, composers. Strauss, Tschaikowsky, and DeBussy are some of the names on the composer side of the list. The soloist of the evening will be H. Warnke, premier cellist of the orchestra.

EXPRESS
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 30 1909

Anent the present tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which we are to have with us on Saturday night, Mr. Henderson, in the New York "Sun," comments on the programmes to be given as significant of the demands for the best in music, which are now made by the musical public of the Middle West. He reads New Yorkers a lesson in warning of "opera madness" and pleads for a more catholic appreciation of music as music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 30 1909

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Convention Hall to-night, is probably the finest organization of its kind in the world. Certainly there is no other organization in this country that approaches it, and probably not in any other country. Max Fiedler, the director, has arranged a programme of unusual excellence, the numbers being:

Smetana "The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle, "My Country")
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.

Tschaikowsky, (Died Nov. 6, 1893.) Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74.
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Beethoven Concerto in D major for violin. Op. 61.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.

Wagner .....Overture to "Tannhauser"
Soloist ..... Mischa Elman

Mischa Elman, the wonderful young Russian, who is the soloist for to-night, plays the Beethoven concerto in D major as no other man of to-day plays it. Eminent critics, familiar with his playing, have emphasized this repeatedly.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

Tuesday evening, brings the last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, and in a way marks the beginning of the end of the musical season of 1908-1909. So far as the great orchestra is concerned, it has been the most successful season it has ever had in this city. The audiences have been larger than ever before, interest seems to have been keyed up to a higher note, and without making any comparisons it is only fair to say that no conductor of the orchestra has ever given greater pleasure than Mr. Fiedler. His personality is attractive, his impassioned conducting seems to inspire his audiences, and his programs have been models of what programs should be. He has presented interesting works new to Providence; he has presented old works in an interesting fashion; and in his programs there has always been the necessary contrasts and the relief to keep the audience on edge throughout the evening.

The concert will have more than usual interest, as it will mark the first appearance here of Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, who had such an astonishing success in Boston, when she made her debut in America at the public rehearsal on Jan. 22 and the concert on Jan. 23. In the preliminary announcements of the season the management stated that the assisting artist at this concert would be the pianist, Miss Deyo of New York, but shortly after this announcement was made Miss Deyo sent word that owing to illness she would not be able to appear in public this year. The matter was left in abeyance because it was decided to wait and see if Miss Arnaud was all that reports had made her out to be.

Miss Arnaud has just turned 17. She is a native of Bordeaux, France, and when she was 14 she took first prize in piano in the Paris Conservatoire, where she had been studying with Duvernoy. Since then she has been living the life of a virtuoso in Europe, and the most extravagant things have been said of her remarkable talent. It required only a very few minutes of her playing in Boston on Friday afternoon to discover that the praises given to her in France and Germany were not exaggerated. No allowance need be made for her youth in criticising her performance. She plays with a surety and brilliancy and a finish which are masculine rather than typically feminine, and her musical ideas are those of a nature artist. She is of charming appearance and her modest carriage on the stage is most attractive. Comment was freely made in Boston that she was to the piano what Mischa Elman is to the violin.

For his last concert in Providence, Mr. Fiedler has arranged another program which is sure to please his audience. The first number will be Weber's "Oberon" overture, which holds its own as one of the masterpieces of musical literature. Then will come Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, which shows this lovable genius in one of his most attractive moods, bright, cheery, melodious and filled with that spirit of romance which makes all his music so fascinating. Miss Arnaud will play Saint-Saens concerto in G minor, No. 2, which she played in Boston. This is one of the most delightful works of its form and is particularly famous for its scherzo. The final number will be the overture to "Tannhauser."

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ss .....

ess .....

SYMPHONY LEADER TALKS OF HIS ART

Max Fiedler Says Germans Have no Consception of Music in America.

As Strange to It as They Are to the Bigness and Resources of the Country.

The interest in the advent of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Memorial hall, this evening, makes pertinent some remarks of its director, Max Fiedler in a recent interview regarding music as an art ,the various forms and schools of music, and the future and possibilities of music in America. It should be remembered that Max Fiedler is a German who is receiving his first impressions of this large country. Among other things he said:

"It is a great pleasure for me to come west, but your country is so huge. Here I am twenty-four hours on a fast train from Boston and most of the country is in front of me still. Germans who have never been here cannot realize and it is difficult to give them any idea of it.

"It is the same with your musical and artistic life. Musically America is the child of Germany and yet the stay-at-home German hasn't the faintest idea of what the musical life in this country means—and he wouldn't admit it if he has. Of course, the Boston Symphony orchestra is famous in Germany for every musician who comes here makes it a point to hear it and carries the news back home, but even the best disposed European who has never heard it has no idea how wonderful an instrument it is.

Triumph of Ideas.

"I think that ultimately there will be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work based on strong or beautiful themes and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Yet, I also think that the future music of more substantial form will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

"A conductor who is wise, tactful and diplomatic, should have no preference, at least not publish them. I try to find good in everything and emphasize that. But when I do not find good in a place, or think I do not, I don't play it. The basis of music, today as always is the great classics, the works of the great masters of the past. But one should not neglect the superstructure and ornamentation.

Many Loves Possible.

"An honest love for Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann should not preclude an honest love for Richard Strauss, or Tschaikowsky, or Smetana or Claude Debussy. Because one loves Wagner does that mean that he should not care for Verdi or Donizetti, or Puccini? And the reverse is just as true. Richard Strauss I regard as a master and Debussy has a wonderfully original talent, if not genius.

"America already has composers of great talent, MacDowell, Chadwick, Loeffler, Foote, Converse and others. You have magnificent orchestras which are making you familiar with the best works in musical literature. You spend enormous sums each year for music and get the best and who knows when out of this great melting pot of America the great genius is not coming to the surface? The love of good music seems to be genuine and each year it is brought to a greater public. I see no reason why America should not have a brilliant future musically."

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

Cable Address,
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

ldress .....

ate .....

Mischa Elman, who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, to-morrow night, made his first public appearance as a violinist at the age of five years. Instead of bowing to the audience on that occasion, he says that he ran onto the stage, which was very slippery, and fell at full length to the great amusement of all. This young Russian, who is only eighteen years old, is a veritable wizard with the violin; he is called a second Paganini.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s .....

Boston Symphony

The visiting orchestras this season have been most unfortunate as regards the weather on the nights of their concerts. When Mr. Damrosch was here several weeks ago, the streets were almost impassable because of a deep snow. Last night a small blizzard raged, which doubtless kept many people away from the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The audience last night was a much larger one than greeted the New York Symphony orchestra. It was a representative one musically and socially. Governor and Mrs. Harmon were among the prominent people in attendance.

The Boston orchestra has a new conductor this year in the person of Mr. Max Fiedler. His readings last night certainly justifies the wise selection the directors of the Boston orchestra made when they chose a successor to Dr. Karl Muck. Mr. Fiedler's readings are fraught with the deepest insight into the music; they are intensely temperamental readings, too. It is not too much to say that nothing finer than his conducting of the Pathetique Symphony of Tschaikowsky has ever been heard here. The Chicago orchestra played this composition here several months ago, but the Boston orchestra gave a much finer interpretation last night. At the close of the stirring third movement (Allegro Molto Vivoce) the audience gave an exhibition of enthusiasm such as is rarely seen here. After insistent recalls for Mr. Fiedler, he had the entire orchestra stand up to acknowledge the demonstration. Twice was the orchestra compelled to rise, so long continued was the applause.

This symphony, which was first performed in America by Mr. Walter Damrosch's New York symphony, May 16, 1894, is one of the most intense and tragic pieces of writing to be found in the whole literature of music. The symphonic poem by Smetana, "The Moldan," describing the rushing water, the hunt, moonlight, dance of the sylphs, etc., is a composition of uncommon beauty and it secured at the hands of Mr. Fiedler a reading of great beauty.

Other numbers on the program were a most striking symphonic poem, "Finland," composed by Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer; also the prelude to Lohengrin and the Tannhauser overture. In the opening bars of the Lohengrin selection the exquisite quality of the strings was heard to fine advantage. Possibly no orchestra in the world possesses so fine a body of violins as does the Boston orchestra. The orchestra as a whole is likely as fine as any to be found in the world.

This organization played last night as they are always wont to do, with splendid and sonorous tonal quality, exquisite shading, the best of intonation, and great precision in attacks. The Boston orchestra is a joy and to miss hearing it is a great loss to any lover of music.

The program contained copious explanatory notes on the compositions written by the eminent Boston critic, Mr. Phillip Hale. These were a great help to one in enjoying the program. This concert was the fourth in the Mrs. Ella May Smith series. This series of concerts has not had the large attendance it deserved. These concerts have been really noteworthy and each and every one deserved a very large audience.

OLEY SPEAKS.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s .....

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES

THIS week was a notable one in musical circles due to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor. Fiedler is Dr. Muck's successor, but not his equal, even though he had the orchestra under perfect control. The attacks of the orchestra were noteworthy because they came simultaneously with the baton. Max Fiedler's conducting is forceful and he had drilled his men so that they respond. The response of the orchestra to the conductor's baton was remarkable in that it demonstrates what drill means to an orchestra. The orchestra, however, for some reason did not please the same as it did when Dr. Muck had the direction of this excellent body of men. Conductor Fiedler is forceful and virile, but it takes more than that in order to present a work pleasingly and not too academically. A musician who has temperament must be given some leeway, but not so according to Fiedler. He held his men in check instead of giving them a trifle more freedom. This was apparent most in the symphony and especially in the Scherzo. MacDowell's "Lamia" was presented with genuine feeling, while Sibelius' "Finland" was given an ideal interpretation. Conductor Fiedler is graceful and he was exceedingly conversant with what he presented, especially if one paid attention to the way in which he gave each musician his cue without referring to his score. Mrs. Seabury C. Ford had an excellent opportunity to display her vocal capabilities in Verdi's "Ritorna Vincitor." It is needless to say she took advantage of the opportunity, and made a most auspicious success. She received more flowers than had ever before been passed over the armory stage at a symphony orchestra concert.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

THE REALM OF MUSIC

The Tuesday Musicale's Programme —Something About Dr. Wuellner —Rochester Musical Notes.

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mischa Elman will take place at Convention Hall this evening. The concert is announced to begin at 8:15 and it is the hope of the management that the audience will be seated by that time. The advance sale of seats is very large, though some desirable sittings are still to be had. The sale af balcony admission tickets will begin at 7:30. This is the programme for tonight's concert:

"The Moldau"—Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the Cycle, "My Country")...Smetana
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.
Symphony, No. 6, "Pathetic," in B Minor, op. 74 .....Tschaikowsky
1. Adagio: Allegro non troppo.
2. Allegro con grazia.
3. Allegro molto vivace.
4. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in D Major for Violin, op. 61.. ..... Beethoven
1. Allegro ma non troppo.
2. Larghetto.
3. Rondo.
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra's Appearance Will Be Musical Feature of the Season.

Under the auspices of the Music League the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at the Buckingham on Thursday evening, March 23, Max Fiedler directing. The program which has been selected for this most important event of the musical season is an excellent one with works chosen from the modern, though not ultra-modern, composers. Strauss, Tschaikowsky, and DeBussy are some of the names on the composer side of the list. The soloist of the evening will be H. Warnke, premier cellist of the orchestra.

...ss ..... N. Y.

Anent the present tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which we are to have with us on Saturday night, Mr. Henderson, in the New York "Sun," comments on the programmes to be given as significant of the demands for the best in music, which are now made by the musical public of the Middle West. He reads New Yorkers a lesson in warning of "opera madness" and pleads for a more catholic appreciation of music as music.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK

Cable Address,
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Convention Hall to-night, is probably the finest organization of its kind in the world. Certainly there is no other organization in this country that approaches it, and probably not in any other country. Max Fiedler, the director, has arranged a programme of unusual excellence, the numbers being:

Smetana "The Moldau," Symphonic Poem (No. 2 of the cycle, "My Country")
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.
Tschaikowsky, (Died Nov. 6, 1893.) Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor; Op. 74.
I. Adagio: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Beethoven Concerto in D major for violin. Op. 61.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.
Wagner .....Overture to "Tannhauser"
Soloist ..... Mischa Elman

Mischa Elman, the wonderful young Russian, who is the soloist for to-night, plays the Beethoven concerto in D major as no other man of to-day plays it. Eminent critics, familiar with his playing, have emphasized this repeatedly.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

Tuesday evening brings the last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, and in a way marks the beginning of the end of the musical season of 1908-1909. So far as the great orchestra is concerned, it has been the most successful season it has ever had in this city. The audiences have been larger than ever before, interest seems to have been keyed up to a higher note, and without making any comparisons it is only fair to say that no conductor of the orchestra has ever given greater pleasure than Mr. Fiedler. His personality is attractive, his impassioned conducting seems to inspire his audiences, and his programs have been models of what programs should be. He has presented interesting works new to Providence; he has presented old works in an interesting fashion; and in his programs there has always been the necessary contrasts and the relief to keep the audience on edge throughout the evening.

The concert will have more than usual interest, as it will mark the first appearance here of Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, who had such an astonishing success in Boston, when she made her debut in America at the public rehearsal on Jan. 22 and the concert on Jan. 23. In the preliminary announcements of the season the management stated that the assisting artist at this concert would be the pianist, Miss Deyo of New York, but shortly after this announcement was made Miss Deyo sent word that owing to illness she would not be able to appear in public this year. The matter was left in abeyance because it was decided to wait and see if Miss Arnaud was all that reports had made her out to be.

Miss Arnaud has just turned 17. She is a native of Bordeaux, France, and when she was 14 she took first prize in piano in the Paris Conservatoire, where she had been studying with Duvernoy. Since then she has been living the life of a virtuoso in Europe, and the most extravagant things have been said of her remarkable talent. It required only a very few minutes of her playing in Boston on Friday afternoon to discover that the praises given to her in France and Germany were not exaggerated. No allowance need be made for her youth in criticising her performance. She plays with a surety and brilliancy and a finish which are masculine rather than typically feminine, and her musical ideas are those of a nature artist. She is of charming appearance and her modest carriage on the stage is most attractive. Comment was freely made in Boston that she was to the piano what Mischa Elman is to the violin.

For his last concert in Providence, Mr. Fiedler has arranged another program which is sure to please his audience. The first number will be Weber's "Oberon" overture, which holds its own as one of the masterpieces of musical literature. Then will come Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, which shows this lovable genius in one of his most attractive moods, bright, cheery, melodious and filled with that spirit of romance which makes all his music so fascinating. Miss Arnaud will play Saint-Saens concerto in G minor, No. 2, which she played in Boston. This is one of the most delightful works of its form and is particularly famous for its scherzo. The final number will be the overture to "Tannhauser."

[163]

...the World
...RONICLE
...K, N. Y
...30 1909

...y Concert.

...hony Orchestra, ...ert at Convention ...ly the finest or... ...the world. Cer... ...r organization in ...proaches it, and ...er country. Max ...s arranged a pro... ...ellence, the num...

...Symphonic Poem ..., "My Country") ...the rustic wed... ...ce of the nymphs; ...the broad river;

...Nov. 6, 1893.) ..."Pathetic," in B

...non troppo. ...zia. ...vivace. ...lamentoso. ...major for violin.

...troppo.

...to "Tannhauser" .... Mischa Elman ...wonderful young ...loist for to-night. ...concerto in D ...of to-day plays ...miliar with his ...ized this re...

NEW YORK
...Complete
...the World

...HONY

...NEXT WEEK

...gs the last con... ...phony orchestra, ... and in a way ... the end of the ...go. So far as the ...ned it has been ...son it has ever ... audiences have ... before, interest ...d up to a higher ...ng any compari... ...say that no con... ...has ever given ...Mr. Fiedler. His ... his impassioned ...inspire his audi... ...have been mod... ...ould be. He has ...works new to ...ern old works ...ton, and in his ...ways been the ... the relief to ...s throughout the

...more than usual ...k the first ap... ...ine Arnaud, the ...ho had such an ...oston, when she ...ca at the public ... the concert on ...ary announce... ...e management ... artist at this ...nist, Miss Deyo ...tly after this ...e Miss Deyo ...to illness she ...pear in public ...s left in abey... ...ed to wait and ...ill that reports

...rned 17. She is ...nce, and when ... prize in piano ... where she ...uvernoy. Since ...e life of a vir... ...most extrava... ...of her remark... ...y a very few ...oston on Fri... ...r that the ...nce and Ger... ...l. No allow... ...er youth in ... She plays ... and a finish ...then typical... ...ideas are ...is of charm... ...est carriage ...e. Comment ...hat she was ...an is to the ...idence, Mr. ...r program ...idence. The ... "Oberon" ...n as one of ...Literature ...-numa... ...nova... ...ive, ... and ... which ... Miss ...to in ...d in ...ight... ...arly ...num... ...ber."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ldress
te JAN 30 19

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday he brought with him the symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer and the final copies of the parts were made only last month. The symphony is a work of monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, which is a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening.

om Daily Citizen,
ldress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te JAN 30 190

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday, he brought with him the long-expected symphony that was first announced for performance two years ago. The work was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64 and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is compete as it is, but Pederewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it sands, the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Pederewski has added three sarrusophones. The sarrusophone is a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Feb. 12. It will be repeated on the following evening.

...ess

...omposer's centenary.

—o—

When Paderewski arrived in New York from England last Tuesday, he brought with him his new symphony, which will be performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, on February 12. The work is of a monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements, and while complete, the composer contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. A full modern orchestra is used, Paderewski having also added three sarrusophones, a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxaphone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself, and which he calls a tonitroune. It is designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...88

Boston Symphony Soloist.

Miss Germaine Arnaud, who is to be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday, has been stopping in Boston since her debut there a week ago. Her sensational success in Boston has created a very decided demand for her services and she will play 25 or 30 times in the next two months. She will play here the same work she presented in Boston, Saint-Saens concerto in G-Minor, No. 4.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om ...DISPATCH... ldress ...1901
ate

MAX FIEDLER WINS COLUMBUS HEARTS

Very Small Audience Hears the Magnificent Boston Symphony Concert.

Eighty skilled musicians, each an artist, led by an artist, thrilled and delighted a ridiculously small audience Friday evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra presented an especially happy program at Memorial hall, under the direction of Max Fiedler, its new conductor.

Herr Fiedler firmly established himself in the hearts of Columbus music lovers—much more firmly than ever did or could his rather cold predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck. Under him the work of his orchestra—and from the manner in which he sways his men it is his, entirely his—as he stands before it—is an aggregation of musicians equaled, probably, but not excelled, anywhere in the world.

The program contained five numbers, interest in which centered in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Its rendition took 45 minutes and the brilliant performance of the third movement was particularly greeted with tremendous applause, to which Herr Fiedler asked his men to rise to their feet.

The first number was Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy, "Egmont." It has been heard before innumerable times, of course, but it was presented in a manner beyond criticism, as were also the overtures to Lohengrin and Tannhauser.

One can understand, after hearing "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, why the Russian government, during the political troubles between Russia and Finland, forbade the performance of "Finlandia" because it incited the Finns to riot. It is a stirring symphonic poem by the foremost of Finnish composers and one of the greatest of living musicians. There was great interest, too, in "The Moldau," by Smetana, the Bohemian, one of six poems he wrote to celebrate the beauty of his native land. Being written to immortalize the splendid river of Bohemia, which plays such a mighty part in its history, the rippling lightsomeness of its passages was lost in a measure because of the fact that it followed the magnificent production of that tragic "Swan Song" of Tschaikowsky, the "Pathetique."

An audience is very frequently attracted by the mechanical excellence that is displayed by a great artist at the piano. Again the human sympathy of a critical audience is often wrought upon by the feeling which is displayed in a number where the proper technique is decidedly lacking. Very seldom is there perfect skill united with an inborn genius sufficiently strong to satisfy both the real artistic and emotional sense of a very critical audience.

In this particular, Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the young Viennese pianiste, excels and it has been said of her by musical writers that she both astounds one and moves the tenderest chords of the heart in her recital work. An instrument may not possess a soul, yet the soul of a performer may be poured forth through its proper handling.

Born in a musical atmosphere, Miss Schnitzer had every opoprtunity to gratify her one ambition and her wonderful achievements at a very early age attracted the attention of those who were amply able to aid her in her advances. Of a modest and retiring disposition at the time, she did not attempt to push herself forward, but was brought to the front by the most noted teachers in Vienna, who saw in her future an irresistible force that of itself, each day, is lifting her to a pre-eminence among the noted pianists of two hemispheres.

No other young girl in modern times, has been honored in joint recital with two such famous organizations as the Vienna Philharmonic and the Berlin Philharmonic and within a short while, been engaged to play with the Symphony Orchestra of Boston, under the noted leadership of Max Fielder. Not only has she done this but she has made two successful tours of Europe and one short trip through the United States, in which she left such a lasting impression that she was prevailed upon to give a series of 40 recitals in the Northern States. Her bookings this year will extend from New England to the Pacific coast.

Terre Haute is most fortunate, in that Mrs. Charles B. Foster, under whose local direction, Miss Schnitzer is appearing, has placed the recital at the Grand Opera House tomorrow night within the reach of every one. She announces that she is so doing in order to test the sentiment of our musical and social community, with a view, if successful, of adding Terre Haute to the list of cities in the Middle West, in which these events may become regular in a season's offerings of especially good things.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...ERAL
...N. Y.
JAN 31 190

OVATION GIVEN HUB MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

CONCERT A SPLENDID TREAT

Mischa Elman, Wonderful Russian Violinist, Worthy the Great Reception Accorded Him.

Rochester was honored last night by a visit of the most distinguished musical organization the country boasts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rochester honored itself by turning out in splendid numbers to hear the concert, in nowise deterred by the young blizzard which came out of the West.

The orchestra not only bestowed the benediction of its own lovely music, but with lavish generosity gave the pleasure of hearing Mischa Elman, the wonderful Russian youth, whom one seemed likely to miss here this season. That it was a night of consummate delight goes without saying.

The orchestra is conducted this year by Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, one of the celebrated European directors of the day, who had been heard in this country before, during the two seasons in which the New York Philharmonic had "star" conductors. Fiedler is a man in the middle years, solid and dignified in appearance. His manner is much more animated than his predecessor's, and possibly because one was so impressed with Dr. Muck's concentration and repose, Fiedler's gestures seem to approach violence. Naturally he is a man of power and authority or he would not have won his great reputation, but in the same degree that his personality lacks picturesqueness and magnetism, his readings, while commanding all possible respect, are wanting in charm and individuality.

Any kind of praise of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is tautology. It has been for many years and remains a unique organization, as nearly perfect in its constitution as is humanly possible, and maintained through the 28 years of its existence by a great-hearted music-lover, Mr. Henry L. Higginson. The orchestra never played more brilliantly here than last night, never with more extraordinary tonal splendor. The quality of the various choirs is undiminished in beauty. It is an old speech about this orchestra, but one that is good to remember, that "its 'cellos play with the mellowness of horns and its horns sing with the lusciousness of 'cellos." If there were times when one missed the ultra-mundane euphony and aristocratic precision of Gericke's day, it must be confessed that Fiedler is a man of different methods and the muscularity and sonority of the band were never heard to such advantage as last night. Especially was this true in the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

It is such a rare and lovely treat to hear this organization that no word of reproach of the programme shall be said. But with the exception of "The Moldau" everything was very familiar And this charming symphonic poem of Smetana was played here some four years ago by the Pittsburg Orchestra under its Bohemian title "Vltava." It is the second of the series of tone-pictures, "My Fatherland," in which this most patriotic of composers, "a Czeck of the Czecks," as Philip Hale calls him, wished to describe his country and tell its history and its legends. "The Moldau" is prefaced as follows by its composer.

Two springs gush forth in the shade of the Bohemian Forest, the one warm and sprouting, the other cold and tranquil. Their waves, gaily rushing onward over their rocky beds, unite and glisten in the rays of the morning sun. The forest brook, fast hurrying on, becomes the river Vltava (Moldau), which, flowing ever on through Bohemia's valleys, grows to be a mighty stream; it flows through thick woods in which the joyous noise of the hunt and the notes of the hunter's horns are heard ever nearer and nearer; it flows through grass-grown pastures and lowlands where a wedding feast is celebrated with song and dancing. At night the wood and water nymphs revel in its shining waves, in which many fortresses and castles are reflected as witnesses of the past glory of knighthood, and the vanished warlike fame of bygone ages. At the St. John Rapids the stream rushes on, winding in and out through the cataracts, and hews out a path for itself with its foaming waves through the rocky chasm into the broad river bed in which it flows on in majestic repose toward Prague, welcomed by time-honored Vysehrad, whereupon it vanishes in the far distance from the poet's gaze.

This tells the tale, and it is set forth in the most delightful musical colors, with the freshest and most spontaneous melody, now tender, now gay, and always with the vitality and decision of inspired enthusiasm. It formed a fine "show piece" for the orchestra, and its tone was never more ravishing.

Of the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, what is there left to be said, except concerning the manner of its interpretation? It is easily the most popular of modern symphonies; everyone knows the story of its composition and its significance. Nothing better was ever said than Huneker's "page of Ecclesiastes set to music" and "the cosmos in crape." "Israfel" said it has "the instinct of death" in it, and Krehbiel rose to rebel against it as expressing a pessimism which music was not meant to express. Whatever the critics say, it is written out of the suffering of a human soul and in a musical speech which even the most untutored can understand. Fiedler gave a reading which was not unusual in any respect. Of course, the most dramatic interpretation to be heard to-day is Safonoff's. The "Tannhaeuser" overture was superbly played—in fact, the orchestra with any sort of a leader would not play it otherwise. The ovation and numerous recalls at the close of the programme were very justly shared with the orchestra by the conductor.

Mischa Elman has had prodigious success in Europe for several seasons. When he came here he was respectfully but unenthusiastically received by the metropolitan critics, who were rendered unsympathetic by the various wonder-children like Vecsey, Kocian, etc. But Elman has made a tremendous success with the public, and he is the sensation of the winter in New York at present. Rochester was very fortunate to hear him, and the cordiality of his reception here was perfectly deserved by his wonderful playing. The Beethoven concerto makes interpretative demands beyond the powers of any youth, but for beauty of tone, impeccable intonation and flawless mastery of all technique difficulties, it is unlikely that anyone has ever heard a more beautiful performance. His violin is one of the most famous "Strads" in existence, and was given to Elman by Joachim. Despite the applause and continued recalls, the inflexible rule of the orchestra would not permit an encore.

Credit is due James E. Furlong for bringing this treat to the community, but a word of reproach is due for the dreadful seating arrangements, the absence of discipline among the ushers, who kept Mr. Fiedler waiting nearly ten minutes before the audience could be sufficiently quieted to allow him to commence, and for the lack of ventilation, which caused many ladies to leave the hall.

om NEW YORK PRESS,
ldress New York City.
te

When Paderewski arrived here from England on last Tuesday he brought with him the long-expected symphony first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he was unable to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were made as late as last month.

The symphony is a work of monumental dimensions. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64. In its present form it has three movements, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. Even as it stands it will take about one and a quarter hours in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland, and the second describes the lyric nature of the Polish nation. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly, though only a small child when it took place.

A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, a new instrument, distantly related to the saxophone, and a percussion instrument invented by himself which he calls a tonitruone. It is designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

The performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Fiedler in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on the afternoon of February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on the evening of February 18.

[164]

From ...
Address ...
Date ... JAN 31 1909

MUSICAL NOTES.

Last Symphony Concert.—Students' Course Presents Hess-Schroeder Quartet.

On next Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its third and last concert here in Providence. It may truly be said that in every respect this has been the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city. The patronage has been better than ever before and the concerts so far have given utmost satisfaction to all classes of music lovers. Mr. Fiedler has shown himself to be a conductor of the highest order. His impassioned reading of the words that have been presented has pleased his audiences and if he should not be at the head of the orchestra next season, his year in America will have at least made him a splendid reputation and won for him innumerable friends.

Germaine Arnaud, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday.

The soloist for this concert will be Miss Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl but 17 years of age, and a pupil of the Paris Conservatory, where she took the first prize for piano when but 14. For the past two years she has played in concert in Europe and everywhere met with praise that seems almost extravagant. At her Boston debut two weeks ago her success was again most pronounced.

The programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged promises much pleasure. The first number will be the ever-welcome "Oberon" overture by Weber, one of those immortal three which more than anything else have kept his fame untouched by time. The second number will be Schumann's delicious symphony in D-minor. Mr. Fiedler in no way displays his versatility as in his sympathetic love of Schumann. Few men are great in modern music like Mr. Fiedler, but yet have that peculiar sympathy for the early romantic school which is necessary to do justice to Schumann.

Miss Arnaud will play the same concerto she played in Boston, Saint-Saëns in G-minor, which is famous for its wonderful rippling scherzo. The final number will be the overture to "Tannhäuser."

...leasure awaits

...rst Established and most Complete
...aper Cutting Bureau in the World

...

Paderewski, the great pianist and composer, arrived last week on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, to make a short American tour. He will make his first appearance in this country this season in Boston, February 12, coming to New York on February 18.

"It is more as a composer than as a pianist that I come to America this time," said Paderewski. "I have just finished the symphony which is going to be produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—it is a sort of symphonic poem—and that is mainly what has brought me over here. I shall not play in many concerts, not more than thirty or thirty-five, at most, and those mostly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or other similar organization.

"Since I was here last year I have played at a few concerts in England, but the last five months I have passed at hard work at my place near Lausanne, where, I am delighted to say, many of my American friends visited me last Summer.

"I have devoted all my attention of late to the symphony. It is extremely long, and will take more than an hour more and a quarter to perform. It took five months to compose it, and I am satisfied.

"It was my ambition to have the symphony produced first over here, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its excellence has been attained by uniformity of direction and conducting, and also by continuous playing together.

"The orchestra in the Conservatoire in Paris is a fine one, but it lacks spirit. Its members, impelled by ultra republican ideas, resent authority and don't like to work hard. Now that M. Messager is conductor, however, we shall expect great things. The Imperial Orchestra in Dresden and the London Symphony Orchestra are fine, but the Boston Symphony is the orchestra par excellence."

RECORD
...1909

PADEREWSKI RECITAL

Announcement of His Program for Next Wednesday Afternoon.

The only recital which Paderewski will give in Philadelphia this season is announced for next Wednesday afternoon. Paderewski arrived from England last Tuesday and began his short tour with a concert in Newark, N. J., yesterday afternoon. As soon as he reached New York he announced that he would limit himself to one recital in each city in which he shall appear, making thirty visits in all. In a fortnight he will be the soloist here at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His program for his recital here is as follows:

Sonata, op. 53 (Waldstein	Beethoven
Nocturne, E major, op. 62
Mazurka, A flat, op. 59
Barcarolle	Chopin
Etude, No. 5, op. 10
Polonaise, op. 53
Reflete dans Peau	Debussy
Rhapsody, No. 12	Liszt

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly-awaited symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month.

The symphony is a work of monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. The work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland, and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite program, treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred.

A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Paderwski has added three sarrusophones (a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone) and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12.

...s ...
...1909

Last Friday night in Memorial hall a fair sized audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra, an audience made up of society and musical people, who were well able to appreciate the class of music offered, and were not afraid to show their enjoyment, calling the conductor back several times after each number to bow acknowledgment.

This splendid concert deserved a much larger attendance, but many who might have gone probably stayed home on account of the blizzard which raged out of doors.

Max Fiedler, who is conducting the orchestra this year, as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is one of the most capable and artistic directors in the world, and interprets the masters in a truly remarkable manner. He is a deep student of music and his influence was clearly felt in the different numbers.

Probably we will never have so good a reading of the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic," certainly never a better one, than was given Friday night. This symphony which Tschaikowsky considered his best composition, is a great test of the worth of players, and showed that the men in the Boston orchestra are all artists, separately and collectively. The interpretation of the different movements as played by the Boston Symphony, was far superior to that of the Thomas orchestra and it seemed as though even the composer himself could not wish to have them better played.

Mr. Fiedler is a more pleasing director than Dr. Muck proved to be, responding much more graciously to the wishes of his listeners, and several times requesting his players to stand and bow with him, although even this enthusiasm did not bring forth an encore.

Every number on this excellent program was a gem, each one being, as it seemed, even more beautiful than the preceding one, but of all, "The Moldau," symphonic poem by Suretana, contained the greatest possibilities. The prelude to Lohengrin and overture to Tannhauser were of course admirably done, for, as often as they are played, they never grow tiresome, but always show some beauty of form heretofore undiscovered.

This concert was the fifth musical attraction brought here this winter by Mrs. Ella May Smith, the sixth and last one of her series being a piano recital which will be given February 12 by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the famous pianist.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Closing Concert of Symphony Orchestra.—Sharps and Flats.

Tuesday evening brings the last local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So far as the great orchestra is concerned, it has been the most successful season it has ever had in this city. The audiences have been larger than ever before, interest seems to have been keyed up to a higher note, and without making any comparisons it is only fair to say that no conductor of the orchestra has ever given greater pleasure than has Mr. Fiedler. His personality is attractive, his impassioned conducting seems to inspire his audiences, and his programmes have been models of what programmes should be. He has presented interesting works new to Providence; he has presented old works in an interesting fashion; and in his programme there have always been the necessary contrasts and the relief to keep the audience on edge throughout the evening.

The concert will have more than usual interest as it will mark the first appearance here of Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, who had such success in Boston when she made her debut in America at the public rehearsal on Jan. 22d, and the concert on Jan. 23d. In the preliminary announcements of the season the management stated that the assisting artist at this concert would be the pianist, Miss Deyo of New York, but shortly after this announcement was made Miss Deyo sent word that owing to illness she would not be able to appear in public this year. The matter was left in abeyance because it was decided to wait and see if Miss Arnaud was all that reports had made her out to be.

Miss Arnaud has just turned 17, and is a native of Bordeaux, France, and when she was 14 she took first prize in piano in the Paris Conservatoire, where she had been studying with Duvernoy. Since then she has been living the life of a virtuoso in Europe and the most extravagant things have been said of her remarkable talent. It required only a very few minutes of her playing in Boston on Friday afternoon to discover that the praises given to her in France and Germany were not exaggerated.

No allowance need be made for her youth in criticising her performance. She plays with a surety and brilliancy and a finish which are masculine rather than typically femine and her musical ideas are those of a mature artist. She is of charming appearance and her modest carriage on the stage is most attractive. Comment was freely made in Boston that she was to the piano what Mischa Elman is to the violin.

For his last concert in Providence, Mr. Fiedler has arranged another programme which is sure to please his audiences. The first number will be Weber's "Oberon" overture, which holds its own as one of the masterpieces of musical literature. Then will come Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D-minor, which shows this lovable genius in one of his most attractive moods, bright, cheery, melodious and filled with the spirit of romance which makes all his music so fascinating. Miss Arnaud will play Saint Saens's Concerto in G-minor, No. 2, which she played in Boston. This is one of the most delightful works of its form and is particularly famous for its scherzo. The final number will be overture to "Tannhaeuser."

MLLE. GERMAINE ARNAUD.
Pianist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening.

CABLE ADDRESS, "TOMEIKE" NEW YORK
ADVERTISER, NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...om ...
...dress ...
...te ...

...—To-morrow night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall will make the fifth visit of that organization to Rochester during the past fifteen years. The orchestra first played here in 1884. Another concert was given two years later. The patronage at both these concerts was so light that Rochester was avoided for an interval of twelve years. However, the last two concerts in Rochester have drawn large crowds and a like result is assured for to-morrow night's engagement.

[165]

...ress ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Delights Rochesterians With an Artistic Programme.

M. FIEDLER, DIRECTOR

The Wizard of the Violin, Mischa Elman, Wins All Hearts.

No organization in the world today is recognized as so flawlessly perfect in technique, in interpretation and in ensemble playing as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared before a large and fashionable audience at Convention Hall Saturday evening. To the student of music, the event was one long to be remembered. The gorgeousness of tone color, the intricacies of novel harmonic effects and originality of reading have always been characteristic of this body of artists, but this year's work shows an added force and strength noticeable in some of the most brilliant passages, especially in the conception of the new director, Max Fiedler.

Although Mr. Fiedler may not have the personal magnetism of some of the great orchestra leaders of the day, he is inspiring, and musicians under his baton are bound to be swayed by the active enthusiasm of the man. In the Tannhauser overture the splendor and the dignity of the music was never brought to a more convincing focus and the storm of applause which swept over the audience at the end of each number must have been gratifying even to artists who are accustomed to receive the homage of all cities and audiences wherever they may appear.

Smetana's "The Moldau."

The wonderful Bohemian composer, Friedrich Smetana, has produced nothing more characteristic of his country than "The Moldau," which is the second in the six works comprised in the cycle of "My Country" and from the uprising of the sparkling streams, under the shade of Bohemian forests, wandering past meadows and through deep valleys, hastening its music through the echoes of the wedding feast and lazily resting in darksome pools, holding visions of moonlight revels of water nymphs and the dignity of mediaeval castles along its banks, all was expressed by this great body of musicians, with every possible shade of feeling and graciousness.

Always a sad remembrance forces itself to the mind with the hearing of one of this composer's creations—that, after giving to the world wonderful melodies which today are becoming widely honored in all countries, his last days should have been spent in the dreariness of a madhouse, the light of the beautiful mind forever darkened.

Mischa Elman.

Of the wonderful witchery of the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, what can be added to the already flowery-strewn pathway of commendation? Young, almost boyish, yet with the poise and confidence of the great artist who feels the strength of his own power beneath every interpretation. To choose the Beethoven Concerto, Op. 61, for rendition was to cross musical swords with all the great violinists of the day and the world may well applaud one upon whom the natural gifts have been lavished which older artists have struggled years to obtain.

His purity and breadth of tone production, his wonderful execution and flawless bowing, and, above all, the real heart of the artist that thrilled through the technicalities of the music compelled such a tempest of recognition that has rarely been witnessed in Rochester.

Mischa Elman's American tour has been a series of triumphs from the first, and Rochester is highly favored to be one of the cities to greet one destined, it has been prophesied, to lead the world in his art.

James E. Furlong is giving the music-lovers of Rochester a treat by the series of concerts at Convention Hall which is bringing the great artists of today here, and the quartette of famous singers who will appear at Convention Hall on the evening of February 13 will be equally interesting.

Paderewski is again in America, and we are to hear him with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he is to play a concerto, there will be no opportunities for the brutal modulations with which he regaled us last year. Let us be profoundly thankful.

POST EXPRESS
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
FEB 1 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mischa Elman has come and gone, but a memory abides with the many Rochesterians who heard them play, which may well be included in what Sir John Lubbuck has termed "The Pleasures of Life." Absolute mastery of the thing to be done always makes the strongest appeal to intelligent observers in any field of activity. There could be no doubt of this element throughout the entire programme of Saturday night.

The attitude of players toward the score to be played, of conductor toward players and audience, of the splendid lad who was the soloist toward his work, all were masterful.

Of course this was to be expected and hardly needs saying but it would seem profitable, in attempting an appreciation of the offering made us, to speculate briefly on the elements which made it so very satisfying.

It is possible that if we had the presence of such an orchestra in our concert halls for twenty or more concerts each season, we might develop something of the satiety and eclecticism of our Boston and New York friends of the press, and lend approval with critical comment on this or that detail's being slightly out of the picture. But one finds it delightful to listen to such music, so competently interpreted, and to know that it is good.

Tone is such an immaterial thing that it is not easy to definitely assign terms to the causes contributing to such a tonal result as this orchestra achieves. But certain things seem evident. The strings are the essential component of orchestral tone. Unity of color, limpidity, absence of any strident tendency, intense energy without any fuss about it, and a constant pervasiveness, of the sort that never intrudes, are characteristics that are readily to be observed.

The wood-winds and brass-choir read a splendid lesson on the possibility of absolute tonal purity being combined with great sonority.

Not once in the superb climaxes reached in the Symphony and the Tannhauser overture did the brasses exceed the limits of perfectly musical tone. The horns and the contra-basses among the strings supplied such an ample foundation for the brilliant instrumentation above as one rarely hears.

With such tone values at his command, a director can secure his ideals.

One feels sure that Mr. Fiedler did and he leaves the memory of a distinctly impressive musical personality with his hearers. The man gives at once the assurance that he knows what the score means to him and that he carries in mind every detail that contributes to his ideal rendition of it. He seems totally absorbed in his work. Without a note before him, except when accompanying the violin concerto, he was completely master of music and men.

Naturally one recalls the work of the other men who have wielded the baton that fell to Mr. Fiedler's lot Saturday night. It is a great regret not to have heard the orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction, for there is unanimous testimony to this conductor's signal success in convincing the pubilc of his musical supremacy.

Vivid recollection of several programmes with Nikish as conductor, has remained to the writer as a measuring unit for the ideal and still so remains. With Mr. Gericke's readings of two of the works played on Saturday night, a more intimate comparison is possible if it were valuable, for they were played under his direction on the last visit of the orchestra to this city. That the mastery of detail and searching scrutiny of the score which Mr. Gericke brought to his work have proved of great worth to the orchestra, is assured.

It seemed that Mr. Fiedler managed somehow to get the content of the music before his hearers in its totality with more of vitality and robustness than was felt at its last hearing.

Certainly the third movement of the Symphony and the Tannhauser overture were more virile and positive to the writer.

Smetana's Symphonic Poem was charming. It is good programme music in that it suggests its intimate connection with the text which inspired it and what is better, it is musically good.

The Tschaikowsky symphony made its appeal to the audience as strongly as ever before. Much futile phrase-making is indulged in regarding this superb tone-picture of moods. Tschaikowsy wrote it, so Philip Hale says, as a "programme symphony," but its completion found the composer unable to assign to it any definite programme and even its title was a suggestion made to him by his brother after hearing the music. It does not appeal to us as logical for a hearer to crystalize his impressions into a neat didacticism and burden a work of such proportions with a phrase purporting to embody the meaning of the music.

The reading this symphony received Saturday night was remarkable in its justness and sympathy. The outline was bold, the rhythms delightfully differentiated, and the dynamic effects admirable, for with all the robustness Mr. Fiedler combined mensely impressive. Indeed it has never seemed to the writer to have been given a more dramatic rendition.

Mischa Elman came to us in the fullness of the success he has won in this season's presence in our concert-rooms. His captivating personality was pervasive from the moment of his entrance. He has so much of youthful spirit, of grace of manner, of special aptitudes, and withal such capability that when the tone of his violin carries all these to the hearer, one has no disposition to question but gives himself to whole-souled enjoyment. There was no hint of the "poseur" about him, but everything he did seemed directed by sincerity toward his art and musical maturity.

With nineteen years as a span of life, it is probable that what was accomplished by the fingers might result from well-directed and unremitting toil, but the source of the guiding musical intelligence belongs to that series of problems which the history of art presents and which psychologists do not explain. Elman made the Beethoven Concerto interesting to an absorbing degree. The first movement was saved from the semblance of discursiveness by the brilliance of his playing and its many lovely moments were appreciated by him to their fullest extent. The last two movements were charmingly done, the Rondo seeming a veritable frolic of delightful tone. Through the years of brooding over his art, which all musicandom hopes lie before him, Elman may add elements to his playing which are not yet in evidence, but his achievement is already full and satisfying and completely his own.

The audience was large in numbers and appreciative to a marked degree. Rochester has a public eager for such musical offerings as that of Saturday night. No better thing could happen for the artistic growth of this city than the creation of a guarantee fund, making possible each season a series of four concerts each by the Boston Symphony, Pittsburg and Theodore Thomas orchestras with such addition of choral organizations and artists as a wise choice might direct.

The betterment and increasing efficiency of our own active workers in music is of great importance but more important still in a civic sense is the development of musical taste; and this grows most steadily with the hearing of the best things musical.

From Opera
Address NEW YORK CITY
FEB 1 - 1909

HOPE HIS SYMPHONY SURPASSES HIS OPERA.

Mr. Paderewski is with us, and much is being said of his new Symphony, which will be performed on February 12 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall there.

We all know Mr. Paderewski as a pianist of great skill. As a composer, his merits have had an opportunity of being appreciated through the medium of an opera called Manru, which was performed under the management of the late Maurice Grau at the Metropolitan Opera House, and for which Mme. Sembrich patriotically volunteered to sing the principal female role.

Manru was a bad opera, an exceedingly bad opera. Its story was stupid, and if it were possible, the music was stupider. It contained hardly a gleam of inspiration. It was labored, dull and altogether abortive. Mr. Grau, who was a businessman first of all, only consented to do the work upon Mr. Paderewski's agreement to pay all the expenses. It was to all intents and purposes Mr. Paderewski's own production. It drew on the first night, through curiosity, and after one or two more performances, it died the death, one that was fully deserved.

As a symphonist and also as a maturer and more experienced musician. Mr. Paderewski may appear in better colors, but we conceive it hard to believe that any man who wrote Manru will ever evolve a symphony or anything else that is genuinely worth hearing.

The new Symphony is described as a work of monumental size, and will even as it stands, without a new movement that is intended to be inserted later, consume an hour and a quarter in the performance. This is almost equal to a two-act opera, and on the whole we have reason to be glad that Boston will get it first. Of course, it will have to come here afterwards, and the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts will be compelled to hear it. Our fears may be mistaken, but after Manru nothing too bad can be anticipated.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 1 1909

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday, he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly awaited symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to give time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were not made last month. The symphony is a work of monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements, and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, which is a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From UNION
Address ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

Rochester evidenced its appreciation of the finest in the line of orchestral music on Saturday night by turning out an audience that almost filled Convention Hall, the occasion being the concert given by the foremost musical organization of the county, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the thousands in attendance were rewarded with a delightful programme marvelously played. And the measure was filled to overflowing by opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian musical prodigy, whose performance upon the violin justified the enconiums that have been showered upon him since his first concert in this country. This season the orchestra offers a new conductor in Max Fiedler, a stranger to local concertgoers but assured of a warm welcome upon the occasion of any future appearance here. Long since the vocabulary of praise was exhausted, so far as the playing of the orchestra is concerned, and it suffices to say that on neither of its former concerts here was the organization heard to any better advantage than on Saturday night. Smetana's "The Mouldau," was the introductory number, a delightful example of modern descriptive music, and it was played in a manner that won for the performers an outburst of enthusiastic approval that, with the possible exception of the remarkable demonstration accorded Caruso last season, has had no equal in local musical annals. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, more or less familiar to the majority of the audience, won another outburst from the audience, the entire orchestra finally having to rise and bow acknowledgment. The "Tannhauser" overture, superbly played, was the orchestra's final offering. Mischa Elman proved himself a remarkable performer upon the violin. Beethoven's D. major concerto was his selection and afforded opportunity for a wondrous display of facility of technique and purity of tone with no sacrifice of interpretation to execution. Opportunity to hear the orchestra was given through James E. Furlong, who will offer a quartette of operatic stars, headed by the tenor Bonci, at Convention Hall, on the night of February

SUN,
New York City.
JAN 31 1909

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday he brought with him the long expected symphony. The symphony is a work of monumental size. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18.

PRESS
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 31 1909

The only recital which Paderewski is to give in Philadelphia this year is announced for next Wednesday afternoon, February 3, at the Academy of Music. Paderewski arrived from England last Tuesday and began his short tour with a concert in Newark, N. J., yesterday afternoon. As soon as he reached New York he announced that he would limit himself to one recital in each city in which he was going to appear, making thirty in all. Consequently the only opportunity his many friends and admirers in Philadelphia will have to hear him in recital will be this coming Wednesday, although in a fortnight he will be the soloist here at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His program for Wednesday afternoon is as follows:—

Sonata, Op. 53 (Waldstein)	Beethoven
Etudes Symphoniques	Schumann
Nocturne, E major, op. 62, Mazurka, A flat, op. 50, Barcarolle, Etude, No. 5, op. 10, Polonaise, op. 53	Chopin
Reflets dans l'eau	Debussy
Rhapsody, No. 12	Liszt

ADVERTISE
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
FEB 2 - 1909

When Paderewski arrived in New York from England last week, he brought with him the long expected symphony. Of this work the Sun says: The symphony is a work of monumental size. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12th. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18th.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From CHRONICLE
Address ROCHESTER, N.Y.
Date JAN 29 1909

The concert to be given to-morrow night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Convention Hall, will be the 2,674th performance of the organization since it was founded twenty-eight years ago. Of the total number of concerts, 1,370 were given in Boston, and the rest in outside cities principally in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Washington.

[166]

POST EXPRESS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mischa Elman has come and gone, but a memory abides with the many Rochesterians who heard them play, which may well be included in what sir John Lubbuck has termed "The Pleasures of Life." Absolute mastery of the thing to be done always makes the strongest appeal to intelligent observers in any field of activity. There could be no doubt of this element throughout the entire programme of Saturday night.

The attitude of players toward the score to be played, of conductor toward players and audience, of the splendid lad who was the soloist toward his work, all were masterful.

Of course this was to be expected and hardly needs saying but it would seem profitable, in attempting an appreciation of the offering made us, to speculate briefly on the elements which made it so very satisfying.

It is possible that if we had the presence of such an orchestra in our concert halls for twenty or more concerts each season, we might develop something of the satiety and eclecticism of our Boston and New York friends of the press, and lend approval with critical comment on this or that detail's being slightly out of the picture. But one finds it delightful to listen to such music, so competently interpreted, and to know that it is good.

Tone is such an immaterial thing that it is not easy to definitely assign terms to the causes contributing to such a tonal result as this orchestra achieves. But certain things seem evident. The strings are the essential component of orchestral tone. Unity of color, limipidity, absence of any strident tendency, intense energy without any fuss about it, and a constant pervasiveness, of the sort that never intrudes, are characteristics that are readily to be observed.

The wood-winds and brass-choir read a splendid lesson on the possibility of absolute tonal purity being combined with great sonority.

Not once in the superb climaxes reached in the Symphony and the Tannhauser overture did the brasses exceed the limits of perfectly musical tone. The horns and the contra-basses among the strings supplied such an ample foundation for the brilliant instrumentation above as one rarely hears.

With such tone values at his command, a director can secure his ideals.

One feels sure that Mr. Fiedler did and he leaves the memory of a distinctly impressive musical personality with his hearers. The man gives at once the assurance that he knows what the score means to him and that he carries in mind every detail that contributes to his ideal rendition of it. He seems totally absorbed in his work. Without a note before him, except when accompanying the violin concerto, he was completely master of music and men.

Naturally one recalls the work of the other men who have wielded the baton that fell to Mr. Fiedler's lot Saturday night. It is a great regret not to have heard the orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction, for there is unanimous testimony to this conductor's signal success in convincing the pubilc of his musical supremacy.

Vivid recollection of several programmes with Nikish as conductor, has remained to the writer as a measuring unit for the ideal and still so remains. With Mr. Gericke's readings of two of the works played on Saturday night, a more intimate comparison is possible if it were valuable, for they were played under his direction on the last visit of the orchestra to this city. That the mastery of detail and searching scrutiny of the score which Mr. Geriche brought to his work have proved of great worth to the orchestra, is assured.

It seemed that Mr. Fiedler managed somehow to get the content of the music before his hearers in its totality with more of vitality and robustness than was felt at its last hearing.

Certainly the third movement of the Symphony and the Tannhauser overture were more virile and positive to the writer.

Smetana's Symphonic Poem was charming. It is good programme music in that it suggests its intimate connection with the text which inspired it and what is better, it is musically good.

The Tschaikowsky symphony made its appeal to the audience as strongly as ever before. Much futile phrase-making is indulged in regarding this superb tone-picture of moods. Tschaikowsy wrote it, so Philip Hale says, as a "programme symphony," but its completion found the composer unable to assign to it any definite programme and even its title was a suggestion made to him by his brother after hearing the music. It does not appeal to us as logical for a hearer to crystalize his impressions into a neat didacticism and burden a work of such proportions with a phrase purporting to embody the meaning of the music.

The reading this symphony received Saturday night was remarkable in its justness and sympathy. The outline was bold, the rhythms delightfully differentiated, and the dynamic effects admirable, for with all the robustness of his readings, Mr. Fiedler combined mensely impressive. Indeed it has never seemed to the writer to have been given a more dramatic rendition.

Mischa Elman came to us in the fullness of the success he has won in this season's presence in our concert-rooms. His captivating personality was pervasive from the moment of his entrance. He has so much of youthful spirit, of grace of manner, of special aptitudes, and withal such capability that when the tone of his violin carries all these to the hearer, one has no disposition to question but gives himself to wholesouled enjoyment. There was no hint of the "poseur" about him, but everything he did seemed directed by sincerity toward his art and musical maturity.

With nineteen years as a span of life, it is probable that what was accomplished by the fingers might result from well-directed and unremitting toil, but the source of the guiding musical intelligence belongs to that series of problems which the history of art presents and which psychologists do not explain. Elman made the Beethoven Concerto interesting to an absorbing degree. The first movement was saved from the semblance of discursiveness by the brilliance of his playing and its many lovely moments were appreciated by him to their fullest extent. The last two movements were charmingly done, the Rondo seeming a veritable frolic of delightful tone. Through the years of brooding over his art, which all musiciandom hopes lie before him, Elman may add elements to his playing which are not yet in evidence, but his achievement is already full and satisfying and completely his own.

The audience was large in numbers and appreciative to a marked degree. Rochester has a public eager for such musical offerings as that of Saturday night. No better thing could happen for the artistic growth of this city than the creation of a guarantee fund, making possible each season a series of four concerts each by the Boston Symphony, Pittsburg and Theodore Thomas orchestras with such addition of choral organizations and artists as a wise choice might direct.

The betterment and increasing efficiency of our own active workers in music is of great importance but more important still in a civic sense is the development of musical taste; and this grows most steadily with the hearing of the best things musical.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Concert.

Rochester evidenced its appreciation of the finest in the line of orchestral music on Saturday night by turning out an audience that almost filled Convention Hall, the occasion being the concert given by the foremost musical organization of the county, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the thousands in attendance were rewarded with a delightful programme marvelously played. And the measure was filled to overflowing by opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian musical prodigy, whose performance upon the violin justified the enconiums that have been showered upon him since his first concert in this country. This season the orchestra offers a new conductor in Max Fiedler, a stranger to local concertgoers but assured of a warm welcome upon the occasion of any future appearance here. Long since the vocabulary of praise was exhausted, so far as the playing of the orchestra is concerned, and it suffices to say that on neither of its former concerts here was the organization heard to any better advantage than on Saturday night. Smetana's "The Mouldau," was the introductory number, a delightful example of modern descriptive music, and it was played in a manner that won for the performers an outburst of enthusiastic approval that, with the possible exception of the remarkable demonstration accorded Caruso last season, has had no equal in local musical annals. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, more or less familiar to the majority of the audience, won another outburst from the audience, the entire orchestra finally having to rise and bow acknowledgment. The "Tannhauser" overture, superbly played, was the orchestra's final offering. Mischa Elman proved himself a remarkable performer upon the violin. Beethoven's D. major concerto was his selection and afforded opportunity for a wondrous display of facility of technique and purity of tone with no sacrifice of interpretation to execution. Opportunity to hear the orchestra was given through James E. Furlong, who will offer a quartette of operatic stars, headed by the tenor Bonci, at Convention Hall, on the night of February 13th.

From Opera

Address .....

HOPE HIS SYMPHONY SURPASSES HIS OPERA.

Mr. Paderewski is with us, and much is being said of his new Symphony, which will be performed on February 12 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall there.

We all know Mr. Paderewski as a pianist of great skill. As a composer, his merits have had an opportunity of being appreciated through the medium of an opera called Manru, which was performed under the management of the late Maurice Grau at the Metropolitan Opera House, and for which Mme. Sembrich patriotically volunteered to sing the principal female role.

Manru was a bad opera, an exceedingly bad opera. Its story was stupid, and if it were possible, the music was stupider. It contained hardly a gleam of inspiration. It was labored, dull and altogether abortive. Mr. Grau, who was a businessman first of all, only consented to do the work upon Mr. Paderewski's agreement to pay all the expenses. It was to all intents and purposes Mr. Paderewski's own production. It drew on the first night, through curiosity, and after one or two more performances, it died the death, one that was fully deserved.

As a symphonist and also as a maturer and more experienced musician. Mr. Paderewski may appear in better colors, but we conceive it hard to believe that any man who wrote Manru will ever evolve a symphony or anything else that is genuinely worth hearing.

The new Symphony is described as a work of monumental size, and will even as it stands, without a new movement that is intended to be inserted later, consume an hour and a quarter in the performance. This is almost equal to a two-act opera, and on the whole we have reason to be glad that Boston will get it first. Of course, it will have to come here afterwards, and the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts will be compelled to hear it. Our fears may be mistaken, but after Manru nothing too bad can be anticipated.

SUN,

ss ..... New York City.

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday he brought with him the long expected symphony. The symphony is a work of monumental size. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18.

---

ss .....

The only recital which Paderewski is to give in Philadelphia this year is announced for next Wednesday afternoon, February 3, at the Academy of Music. Paderewski arrived from England last Tuesday and began his short tour with a concert in Newark, N. J., yesterday afternoon. As soon as he reached New York he announced that he would limit himself to one recital in each city in which he was going to appear, making thirty in all. Consequently the only opportunity his many friends and admirers in Philadelphia will have to hear him in recital will be this coming Wednesday, although in a fortnight he will be the soloist here at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His program for Wednesday afternoon is as follows:—

Sonata, Op. 53 (Waldstein) ..... Beethoven
Etudes Symphoniques ..... Schumann
Nocturne, E major, op. 62, Mazurka, A flat, op. 59, Barcarolle, Etude, No. 5, op. 10, Polonaise, op. 53 ..... Chopin
Reflets dans l'eau ..... Debussy
Rhapsody, No. 12 ..... Liszt

* * *

[166]

Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 1 1909

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday, he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly awaited symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month. The symphony is a work of monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements, and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, which is a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. It will be repeated on the following evening.

BLE ADDRESS, IKE" NEW YORK — NEW YO

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

s .....

FEB 2 - 1909

When Paderewski arrived in New York from England last week, he brought with him the long expected symphony. Of this work the Sun says: The symphony is a work of monumental size. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12th. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18th.

---

s .....

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

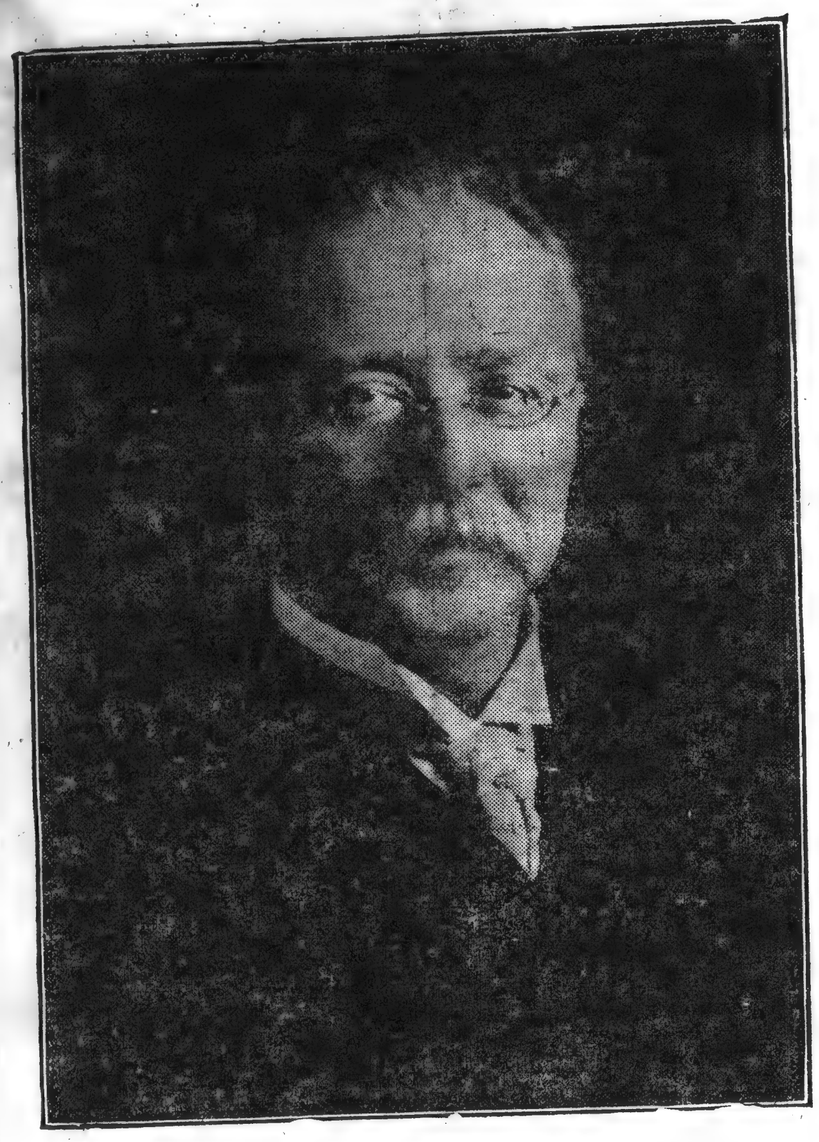
Address .....

Date .....

The concert to be given to-morrow night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Convention Hall, will be the 2,674th performance of the organization since it was founded twenty-eight years ago. Of the total number of concerts, 1,370 were given in Boston, and the rest in outside cities principally in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Washington.

CABLE ADDRESS, "KEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess
ess

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT OF THE SEASON



Max Fiedler, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tonight brings at Infantry hall the last Boston Symphony orchestra concert of the season. The soloist will be Germaine Arnaud, the young French pianist, who had such a remarkable success in Boston 10 days ago. The program is as follows: Weber, overture, "Oberon"; Schumann, symphony in D-minor, No. 4; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G-minor, No. 2; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

As this is the last concert of the season by this great aggregation of musicians, a large attendance is expected.

From
Address
Date

The Boston Symphony.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great treat to this community, and though the night was haggard and the snow blew furiously, there was a large attendance to listen to the delicious music. Of the fine technique of this well named symphony orchestra, it is not our privilege to dilate, but even the common observer sees how this beautiful art carries the finer feelings of our nature up in the region of dreams and visions.

There is no art that touches nature so closely, or which is so true to itself as when it is true to nature. There is sometimes an art that leaves nature and goes romping and ramping out into fields of its own conceit. Music sometimes does this. It aggravates its own technique. It essays to disregard that concord which nature loves, and goes to the verge of chaos and tumult. But that is not music. That is not the Boston Symphony. They bring within the compass of their own flight, the harmonies that nature sheds from the stars, the flowers, and the streams. It is the joy of these translated in the heart that makes music.

Such were the thoughts that were trickling through one's consciousness, as he listened to the strains lapsing away into silence, when a fair senora, breaking away from the spell, asked, "Did you ever hear such delight?"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess
ess

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINAL CONCERT IN BRILLIANT STYLE

End of Season of Famous Boston Organization Reached in Entertainment Which Enthusiastic Audience Enjoys. — Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, Soloist.

The end of the symphony season came with last night's concert in Infantry Hall by the Boston Orchestra. A fine audience was present, nearly filling the hall, and there was unwonted display of enthusiasm, quite justified, however, by the extraordinarily brilliant playing of the orchestra, the superbly virile readings of Conductor Fiedler and the remarkable performance of Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl, who appeared as solo pianist. Brilliancy was, in fact, the keynote of the concert from beginning to end. The interesting and thoroughly satisfactory programme ran as follows:

Overture to the opera "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120..Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

In the overtures to "Oberon" and "Tannhauser" last night's programme presented at one hearing two of the most beautiful and effective compositions of that class. Popular though they both are as concert pieces, there is this difference between them, that one is attached to an opera familiar from frequent representation, while the other belongs to a work which few people have ever seen upon the boards. The reason is not far to seek. Both "Tannhauser" and "Oberon" are packed full of beautiful music, but, whereas the former is a strong and coherent play, the latter is nothing more than a dramatic scrap heap. Designedly so, too. J. R. Planche, the author, wrote many fine librettos and was capable of first-class work. We have it on his own authority that in compiling the text of "Oberon," which he prepared for Weber because the latter had a commission to write an opera for Covent Garden (this was in 1826), he felt that in order to make it a success he must pander to the taste of the day. This was of the lowest, according to his account. "Ballads, duets, choruses and glees," he tells us, "provided they occupied no more than the fewest number of minutes possible, were all that the playgoing public of that day would endure." The patience to await the working out of a dramatic plot was lacking, as indeed were the singing actors to carry it on. "I therefore wrote a melodrama with songs," declares Planche, "instead of an opera." Tastes have changed since that day, and Weber's fine music alone cannot keep "Oberon" on the stage. Fortunately, the remarkably beautiful overture is available for concert use, and when played as Mr. Fiedler and his men gave it last night, it is a thing to linger in memory.

An unlooked-for feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mlle. Arnaud in Saint-Saen's second piano concerto. The young woman is new to American audiences, though for a year or two past she has been winning laurels in Europe. Certainly she is a remarkable player, and when it is considered that she has but just passed her 17th birthday a most brilliant artistic future may be predicted confidently for her. The concerto itself is a fine, interesting work, with a solid first and closing movements between which is sandwiched a rippling scherzo of unique beauty. In the playing of the young artist there were many things to admire, astonishing power, a technic so sure and clean-cut that every note in rapid passage work stood out from its neighbor, plenty of dash and animation, all-sufficient delicacy where that was called for, and an unusually developed sense of rhythm responsible for delightfully perfect phrasing. Seldom has so spontaneous an ovation been drawn out in our concert rooms as followed Mlle. Arnaud's performance. She was recalled again and again, the men of the orchestra joining the applause of the audience, which to the initiated means a great deal.

Schumann's pleasant D-minor symphony and the brilliant "Tannhauser" overture, which completed the programme, received most effective treatment at the hands of the orchestra. It seemed at times, especially in the Wagner overture, as if the splendid band was fairly outdoing itself. It was the apotheosis of brilliancy, the perfection of virtuosity, the very Ultima Thule of style. The concert was an inspiring finish to one of the most enjoyable and successful seasons ever afforded us, and regret must have been universal that it has come to so early a close.

NEW YORK PRESS,
New York City.

The only recital by Paderewski in New York this year is announced for Tuesday afternoon at 2.30 in Carnegie Hall. The pianist arrived here from England on last Tuesday and began his tour with a concert in Newark yesterday afternoon. As soon as he reached New York he announced he would limit himself to one recital in each city on his route, making about thirty in all. Consequently the only opportunity New Yorkers will have to hear him in recital will be this coming Tuesday, though a fortnight hence he will appear twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be his Tuesday programme: Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Bach; Sonata, opus 111, Beethoven; Etudes Symphoniques, Schumann; Nocturne in E major, opus 62; Mazurka in A flat, opus 59; Barcarolle and Polonaise, opus 53, Chopin; "Reflets dans L'eau," Debussy, and "Rhapsodie Hongroise," Liszt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess
ess

At the Symphony Concert.

Infantry Hall was thronged last evening at the last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the gathering were noted Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Mr. Howard K. Hoppin, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. Erling Osthy, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Robert W. Taft, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Anna Ellis Dexter, Boston; Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. John G. Aldrich, Mrs. Albert W. Clafin, Miss Louise Clafin, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Rockwell, Miss June Rockwell, Mr. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dempster, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mr. and Mrs. E. Lindsey Cummings, Mr. Percy Middleton, Mrs. Fred L. Smith, Master Norman Smith, Mrs. Fred W. Allen, Master Richmond Allen, Mr. John Foster, Mrs. John R. Tillinghast, Miss Bertha Buffinton, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Miss Carolyn Kelly, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. Frederic N. Luther, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, Miss Fanny Hunt, Miss Margaret Dwight, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Albert M. Steinert, Mrs. Henry Hunt Clark, Mrs. Grace L. Johnson, Miss Ada Johnson, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Miss Hartwell, Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Miss Grace Barstow, Mrs. Rathbone Gardner, Mrs. Henry B. Gardner, Mrs. Albert W. Smith, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Miss Edith Nichols, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister Miss Carolyn L. Peck, Miss Caroline Eddy, Mrs. Stella A. Wilcox, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss M. Helen Potter, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mrs. I. Gifford Ladd, Mrs. William Hughes, Miss Elizabeth Hughes, Mrs. Joshua M. Addeman, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. Edward Aborn Greene, Miss Sarah F. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, the Misses Sherman, the Misses Vaughn.

om
dress
te

Paderewski has arrived in New York and brings with him his new symphony, which will be given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on February 12th, and played for the first time in New York on February 18th by the same orchestra. Both performances will be directed by Mr. Fiedler.

Of the symphony the New York "Sun" gives the following interesting descriptive sketch:

"The symphony is a work of monumental size. It was inspired by the fortieth aniversary of the Polisch revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder."

Paderewski is to limit his recitals to one in each of the cities which he visits, although he appears several times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York and Boston, and with the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago. The programme for his New York recital of February 2d included Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue," Beethoven's sonata opus 111., Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," a Chopin group, "Regrets dans l'eau" of De Busy and a Liszt rhapsody.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 8 - 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT A MUSICAL TREAT

Orchestra In Splendid Form and Miss Arnaud, Piano Soloist, a Surprise.

Infantry Hall was nearly filled again last night for the third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the large audience heard a most delightful programme of instrumental music quite equal to those which have previously been rendered here this season.

The first number on the programme was the overture to the opera, "Oberon," which was admirably rendered by Conductor Fiedler and his men. This is a beautiful selection not often heard and the production last evening was a revelation to many. The second orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120, which is always appreciated and was admirably rendered by the skilled musicians. The final selection by the orchestra and the last on the programme was Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser," in which the players were at their best and kept the audience fairly entranced with their marvellous interpretation of this splendid music.

The soloist was Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl who has made an enviable reputation as a pianist. This was known, of course, and yet the performance of the young woman was a great surprise, for anything quite as remarkable as the powers revealed by her at the piano was not expected. She is so young, having just passed her 17th birthday, that it hardly seemed possible that she could have advanced so far in her art. For a couple of years she has been winning fame abroad, and she is now adding to her laurels on this side of the ocean. Her single selection was Saint-Saens's Concerto for Pianoforte in G-minor, No. 2, op. 22, which in itself is pleasingg and attractive, and as rendered by the young artist was doubly delightful, its rendition being marked by sweetness, force and admirable technique, with delicacy of touch and a fullness of animation where they were needed to bring out the character of the music. The verdict of the audience at the close of number was instantaneously and unmistakably expressed in a burst of applause that was not stilled until Mlle. Arnaud had appeared repeatedly in response to the flattering calls, even the members of the orchestra joining in the demonstration.

Last night's concert was a worthy ending of what has been perhaps the best season the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had in this city.

From

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date FEB 8 - 1909

Mischa Elman's Triumph.

Mischa Elman, who played here last week with Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been meeting with a tremendous reception in America. But his success cannot have been altogether without alloy, for people will still persist in regarding him as an infant prodigy, in spite of his long trousers and stand-up collars. Mischa Elman detests this, and he must have felt particularly indignant with the lady in Boston, the other day who, after he had finished playing, rushed up to him exclaiming in a voice choked with emotion: "Oh, you wonderful, you marvellous boy! I wish you were my boy!" The violinist has a great objection to being called a "boy," and does all he can to escape from the attentions of the ladies. When he first came to England, a gentleman acted as his guide at all his concerts, and if ladies pestered him for kisses, he used to point to his conductor and say: "He kisses. I play."

ess

Sunday Concert at Lyric.

A magnificent program of music will be offered at the Lyric Theater on tomorrow afternoon. Instead of an orchestra there will be a miscellaneous program, interpreted by artists of the very highest rank. Several artists new to Baltimore have been engaged. Miss Germaine Arnaud is said to be the most important pianist in America this season, and has just made her debut in four concerts with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Arnaud graduated from the Paris Conservatory and secured the first prize in the class of 1907. She is only 17 years old, and her success with this orchestra has been described as sensational.

The vocalist is Miss Mary Ranzenberg, who is the principal contralto at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Miss Ranzenberg will probably appear in Baltimore in opera later in the season, but this will be her first introduction to a Baltimore audience. Mr. Thaddeus Rich will be the violinist. Mr. Rich is well-known as the concert master of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and has appeared with success in Baltimore and other cities. Mr. Bart Wirtz, the well-known cellist, will also be on the program, and the

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JOURNAL

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 8 - 1909

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Playing by the Orchestra and Mme. Germaine Arnaud, Soloist.

The end of the symphony season came with last night's concert in Infantry Hall by the Boston Orchestra. A fine audience was present, nearly filling the hall, and there was unwonted display of enthusiasm, quite justified, however, by the extraordinarily brilliant playing of the orchestra, the superbly virile readings of Conductor Fiedler and the remarkable performance of Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl, who appeared as solo pianist. Brilliancy was, in fact, the keynote of the concert from beginning to end. The interesting and thoroughly satisfactory programme ran as follows:

Overture to the opera "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120..Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

In the overtures to "Oberon" and "Tannhauser" last night's programme presented at one hearing two of the most beautiful and effective compositions of that class. Popular though they both are as concert pieces, there is this difference between them, that one is attached to an opera, familiar from frequent representation, while the other belongs to a work which few people have ever seen upon the boards. The reason is not far to seek. Both "Tannhauser" and "Oberon" are packed full of beautiful music, but, whereas the former is a strong and coherent play, the latter is nothing more than a dramatic scrap heap. Designedly so, too. J. R. Planche, the author, wrote many fine librettos and was capable of first-class work. We have it on his own authority that in compiling the text of "Oberon," which he prepared for Weber because the latter had a commission to write an opera for Covent Garden (this was in 1826), he felt that in order to make it a success he must pander to the taste of the day. This was of the lowest, according to his account. "Ballads, duets, choruses and glees," he tells us, "provided they occupied no more than the fewest number of minutes possible, were all that the playgoing public of that day would endure." The patience to await the working out of a dramatic plot was lacking, as indeed were the singing actors to carry it on. "I therefore wrote a melodrama with songs," declares Planche, "instead of an opera." Tastes have changed since that day, and Weber's fine music alone cannot keep "Oberon" on the stage. Fortunately, the remarkably beautiful overture is available for concert use, and when played as Mr. Fiedler and his men gave it last night, it is a thing to linger in memory.

An unlooked-for feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mlle. Arnaud in Saint-Saen's second piano concerto. The young woman is new to American audiences, though for a year or two past she has been winning laurels in Europe. Certainly she is a remarkable player, and when it is considered that she has but just passed her 17th birthday a most brilliant artistic future may be predicted confidently for her. The concerto itself is a fine, interesting work, with a solid first and closing movements between which is sandwiched a rippling scherzo of unique beauty. In the playing of the young artist there were many things to admire, astonishing power, a technic so sure and clean-cut that every note in rapid passage work stood out from its neighbor, plenty of dash and animation, all-sufficient delicacy where that was called for, and an unusually developed sense of rhythm responsible for delightfully perfect phrasing. Seldom has so spontaneous an ovation been drawn out in our concert rooms as followed Mlle. Arnaud's performance. She was recalled again and again, the men of the orchestra joining the applause of the audience, which to the initiated means a great deal.

Schumann's pleasant D-minor symphony and the brilliant "Tannhauser" overture, which completed the programme, received most effective treatment at the hands of the orchestra. It seemed at times, especially in the Wagner overture, as if the splendid band was fairly outdoing itself. It was the apotheosis of brilliancy, the perfection of virtuosity, the very Ultima Thule of style. The concert was an inspiring finish to one of the most enjoyable and successful seasons ever afforded us, and regret must have been universal that it has come to so early a close.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVE

Address New York City

Date

PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

THE next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, will be devoted in a sense to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts, both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans, will be played on both Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in order that both sets of subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts may have an opportunity to hear it. Mr. Paderewski will also be the soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert, on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, he will play Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's concerto in A minor. Unless the rehearsals of the symphony, which begin in Boston next week, demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert. The first performance of the symphony will be in Boston Friday afternoon, Feb. 12.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 6 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert, the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 19, at 8:15. This concert will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which began in the summer of 1904, and was finished only last December, has not yet been published. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4. This will be his first appearance in Brooklyn during his present tour, and his only appearance with orchestra. His recital here is set for Monday evening, March 1.

m Daily Citizen,
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te FEB - 6 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 19, at 8:15. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest—in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. This symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and, as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4. This will be his first appearance in Brooklyn during his present tour, and his only appearance with orchestra. His recital here is set for Monday evening, March 1.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 6 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert will be the fourth, is dated for Friday evening, Feb. 19. Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's symphony for the first time at this concert. Paderewski will also be the soloist.

FEB 7 - 1909

Boston Symphony Coming.

The next Boston Symphony concert, the fourth in the present Baltimore series, will be given in the Lyric February 17. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest, since the assisting artist will be Ignace Paderewski, who will appear both as composer and pianist. Paderewski's Symphony will be given here for the first time.

This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and finished last December, has not yet been published, Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts with him. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself. The last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will probably play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4. This will be his only appearance in Baltimore on his present tour.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

FEB 7 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, will be devoted in a sense to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans will be played both on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in order that both sets of subscribers to the Boston concerts may have an opportunity to hear it. Paderewski will also be soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert on Thursday evening he will play Saint-Saëns Concerto in C minor, No. 4. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's Concerto in A minor. Unless the rehearsals of the symphony which begin in Boston next week demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 7 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 19. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest—in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's Symphony at this concert for the first time. This Symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904, and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The Symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4. This will be his first appearance in Brooklyn during his present tour, and his only appearance with orchestra. His recital here is set for Monday evening, March 1.

ess

FEB 7 - 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20, will be devoted, in a sense, to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans will be played both on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Paderewski will also be soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert on Thursday evening, February 18, he will play Saint-Saens' Concerto in C Minor, No. 4. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. Unless the rehearsals of the Symphony, which begin in Boston next week, demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert.

WORLD,

ess New York City.

FEB 7

Paderewski's New Symphony.

When Paderewski arrived here from England last he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly awaited symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month.

The symphony is a work of monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements, and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland, and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly, although only a small child when it occurred.

A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, which is a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18.

[168]

The First, Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

FEB 8 - 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT A MUSICAL TREAT

Orchestra in Splendid Form and Miss Arnaud, Piano Soloist, a Surprise.

Infantry Hall was nearly filled again last night for the third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the large audience heard a most delightful programme of instrumental music quite equal to those which have previously been rendered here this season.

The first number on the programme was the overture to the opera, "Oberon," which was admirably rendered by Conductor Fiedler and his men. This is a beautiful selection not often heard and the production last evening was a revelation to many. The second orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120, which is always appreciated and was admirably rendered by the skilled musicians. The final selection by the orchestra and the last on the programme was Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser," in which the players were at their best and kept the audience fairly entranced with their marvellous interpretation of this splendid music.

The soloist was Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl who has made an enviable reputation as a pianist. This was known, of course, and yet the performance of the young woman was a great surprise, for anything quite as remarkable as the powers revealed by her at the piano was not expected. She is so young, having just passed her 17th birthday, that it hardly seemed possible that she could have advanced so far in her art. For a couple of years she has been winning fame abroad, and she is now adding to her laurels on this side of the ocean. Her single selection was Saint-Saens's Concerto for Pianoforte n G-minor, No. 2, op. 22, which in itself is pleasingg and attractive, and as rendered by the young artist was doubly delightful, its rendition being marked by sweetness, force and admirable technique, with delicacy of touch and a fullness of animation where they were needed to bring out the character of the music. The verdict of the audience at the close of number was instantaneously and unmistakably expressed in a burst of applause that was not stilled until Mlle. Arnaud had appeared repeatedly in response to the flattering calls, even the members of the orchestra joining in the demonstration.

"Last night's concert was a worthy ending of what has been perhaps the best season the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had in this city.

From

Address

Date

Mischa Elman, who played here last week with Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been meeting with a tremendous reception in America. But his success cannot have been altogether without alloy, for people will still persist in regarding him as an infant prodigy, in spite of his long trousers and stand-up collars. Mischa Elman detests this, and he must have felt particularly indignant with the lady in Boston, the other day who, after he had finished playing, rushed up to him exclaiming in a voice choked with emotion: "Oh, you wonderful, you marvellous boy! I wish you were my boy!" The violinist has a great objection to being called a "boy," and does all he can to escape from the attentions of the ladies. When he first came to England, a gentleman acted as his guide at all his concerts, and if ladies pestered him for kisses, he used to point to his conductor and say: "He kisses. I play."

Mischa Elman's Triumph.

ess

Sunday Concert at Lyric.

A magnificent program of music will be offered at the Lyric Theater on tomorrow afternoon. Instead of an orchestra there will be a miscellaneous program, interpreted by artists of the very highest rank. Several artists new to Baltimore have been engaged. Miss Germaine Arnaud is said to be the most important pianist in America this season, and has just made her debut in four concerts with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Arnaud graduated from the Paris Conservatory and secured the first prize in the class of 1907. She is only 17 years old, and her success with this orchestra has been described as sensational.

The vocalist is Miss Mary Ranzenberg, who is the principal contralto at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Miss Ranzenberg will probably appear in Baltimore in opera later in the season, but this will be her first introduction to a Baltimore audience. Mr. Thaddeus Rich will be the violinist. Mr. Rich is well known as the concert master of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and has appeared with success in Baltimore and other cities. Mr. Bart Wirtz, the well-known cellist, will also be on the program, and the accompanist will be Mr. Charles Bochau

The First, Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Playing by the Orchestra and Mme. Germaine Arnaud, Soloist.

The end of the symphony season came with last night's concert in Infantry Hall by the Boston Orchestra. A fine audience was present, nearly filling the hall, and there was unwonted display of enthusiasm, quite justified, however, by the extraordinarily brilliant playing of the orchestra, the superbly virile readings of Conductor Fiedler and the remarkable performance of Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a young French girl, who appeared as solo pianist. Brilliancy was, in fact, the keynote of the concert from beginning to end. The interesting and thoroughly satisfactory programme ran as follows:

Overture to the opera "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120..Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

In the overtures to "Oberon" and "Tannhauser" last night's programme presented at one hearing two of the most beautiful and effective compositions of that class. Popular though they both are as concert pieces, there is this difference between them, that one is attached to an opera familiar from frequent representation, while the other belongs to a work which few people have ever seen upon the boards. The reason is not far to seek. Both "Tannhauser" and "Oberon" are packed full of beautiful music, but, whereas the former is a strong and coherent play, the latter is nothing more than a dramatic scrap heap. Designedly so, too. J. R. Planche, the author, wrote many fine librettos and was capable of first-class work. We have it on his own authority that in compiling the text of "Oberon," which he prepared for Weber because the latter had a commission to write an opera for Covent Garden (this was in 1826), he felt that in order to make it a success he must pander to the taste of the day. This was of the lowest, according to his account. "Ballads, duets, choruses and glees," he tells us, "provided they occupied no more than the fewest number of minutes possible, were all that the playgoing public of that day would endure." The patience to await the working out of a dramatic plot was lacking, as indeed were the singing actors to carry it on. "I therefore wrote a melodrama with songs," declares Planche, "instead of an opera." Tastes have changed since that day, and Weber's fine music alone cannot keen "Oberon" on the stage. Fortunately, the remarkably beautiful overture is available for concert use, and when played as Mr. Fiedler and his men gave it last night, it is a thing to linger in memory.

An unlooked-for feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mlle. Arnaud in Saint-Saen's second piano concerto. The young woman is new to American audiences, though for a year or two past she has been winning laurels in Europe. Certainly she is a remarkable player, and when it is considered that she has but just passed her 17th birthday a most brilliant artistic future may be predicted confidently for her. The concerto itself is a fine, interesting work, with a solid first and closing movements between which is sandwiched a rippling scherzo of unique beauty. In the playing of the young artist there were many things to admire, astonishing power, a technic so sure and clean-cut that every note in rapid passage work stood out from its neighbor, plenty of dash and animation, all-sufficient delicacy where that was called for, and an unusually developed sense of rhythm responsible for delightfully perfect phrasing. Seldom has so spontaneous an ovation been drawn out in our concert rooms as followed Mlle. Arnaud's performance. She was recalled again and again, the men of the orchestra joining the applause of the audience, which to the initiated means a great deal.

Schumann's pleasant D-minor symphony and the brilliant "Tannhauser" overture, which completed the programme, received most effective treatment at the hands of the orchestra. It seemed at times, especially in the Wagner overture, as if the splendid band was fairly outdoing itself. It was the apotheosis of brilliancy, the perfection of virtuosity, the very Ultima Thule of style. The concert was an inspiring finish to one of the most enjoyable and successful seasons ever afforded us, and regret must have been universal that it has come to so early a close.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVI

Address New York City

Date

PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

THE next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, will be devoted in a sense to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts, both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans, will be played on both Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in order that both sets of subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts may have an opportunity to hear it. Mr. Paderewski will also be the soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert, on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, he will play Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's concerto in A minor. Unless the rehearsals of the symphony, which begin in Boston next week, demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert. The first performance of the symphony will be in Boston Friday afternoon, Feb. 12.

[168]

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 6 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert, the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 19, at 8:15. This concert will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which began in the summer of 1904, and was finished only last December, has not yet been published. Paderewiski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4. This will be his first appearance in Brooklyn during his present tour, and his only appearance with orchestra. His recital here is set for Monday evening, March 1.

m

iress

te

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 6 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 19, at 8:15. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest—in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. This symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and, as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski will also be the soloist and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C Minor, No. 4. This will be his first appearance in Brooklyn during his present tour and his only appearance with orchestra. His recital here is set for Monday evening, March 1.

Stand d Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 6 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert at the Academy, which will be the fourth, is dated for Friday evening, Feb. 19. Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's symphony for the first time at this concert. Paderewski will also be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Coming.

The next Boston Symphony concert, the fourth in the present Baltimore series, will be given in the Lyric February 17. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest, since the assisting artist will be Ignace Paderewski, who will appear both as composer and pianist. Paderewski's Symphony will be given here for the first time.

This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and finished last December, has not yet been published, Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts with him. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself. The last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will probably play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4. This will be his only appearance in Baltimore on his present tour.

TIMES,

rom

ddress New York City.

FEB 7 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, will be devoted, in a sense to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans will be played both on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in order that both sets of subscribers to the Boston concerts may have an opportunity to hear it. Paderewski will also be soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert on Thursday evening he will play Saint-Saëns Concerto in C minor, No. 4. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's Concerto in A minor. Unless the rehearsals of the symphony which begin in Boston next week demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB - 7 1909

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 19. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest; in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Brooklyn will hear Paderewski's Symphony at this concert for the first time. This Symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904, and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The Symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4. This will be his first appearance in Brooklyn during his present tour, and his only appearance with orchestra. His recital here is set for Monday evening, March 1.

ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20, will be devoted, in a sense, to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans will be played both on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Paderewski will also be soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert on Thursday evening, February 18, he will play Saint-Saens' Concerto in C Minor, No. 4. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. Unless the rehearsals of the Symphony, which begin in Boston next week, demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert.

WORLD,

ess New York City.

FEB 7

Paderewski's New Symphony.

When Paderewski arrived here from England last he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly awaited symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month.

The symphony is a work of monumental character. It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64, and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements, and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland, and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself, and for this the composer has made a definite programme treating of the revolution, which he remembers distinctly, although only a small child when it occurred.

A full modern orchestra is used, and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, which is a new instrument and a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone, and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. It will be repeated on the following evening. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 18.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

TWENTY-EIGHTH SEASON, 1908-1909

2669th to 2674th CONCERT

WESTERN TRIP

Leave Boston, Special Train, Sunday, January 24, via Boston and Albany R. R., South Terminal Station, 11.05 p. m. Trinity Court Station, 11.09 p. m.
Arrive Utica Monday, January 25, at 8.50 a. m.
30 minutes for BREAKFAST.
Leave Utica at 9.20 a. m.
Arrive Rochester 12.20 p. m.
30 minutes for LUNCH.
Leave Rochester at 12.50 p. m.
Arrive Buffalo, Union Station, at 2.30 p. m.
LAFAYETTE HOTEL, Lafayette Square.
Concert at Convention Hall, at 8.15 p. m.
Leave Buffalo, Union Station, Tuesday, January 26, SPECIAL TRAIN, via Michigan Central R. R. at 8 a. m. Pass Niagara Falls about 8.40 a. m.
Arrive St. Thomas at 11.40 a. m.
40 minutes for DINNER.
Leave St. Thomas at 12.20 p. m.
Arrive Detroit, Michigan Central Depot, foot of Third Street, corner Jefferson Avenue, at 2 p. m.
WAYNE HOTEL, opposite Depot.
Concert at Light Guard Armory, at 8.15 p. m.
Leave Detroit, Michigan Central Depot, Wednesday, January 27, SPECIAL TRAIN, at 8.30 a. m.
Arrive Cleveland, Union Station, 1 p. m.
HOLLENDEN HOTEL.
Concert at Grays' Armory at 8 p. m.
Leave Cleveland, SPECIAL TRAIN, Union Station, 12.30 midnight.
Arrive Indianapolis, Thursday, January 28, Big Four R. R., Union Depot, Illinois Street and Jackson Place, at 7.45 a. m.
CLAYPOOL HOTEL.
Concert at English Opera House, at 8.15 p. m.
Leave Indianapolis, SPECIAL TRAIN, Big Four R. R., Union Depot, Friday, January 29, at 8.30 a. m.
Arrive Columbus, Union Station, Big Four R. R., at 12.45 p. m.
SOUTHERN HOTEL, corner High and Main Streets.
Concert at Memorial Hall, East Broad Street, at 8.15 p. m.
Leave Columbus, SPECIAL TRAIN, Union Station, Big Four R. R., Friday, January 29, at 12.30 midnight.
Arrive Buffalo, Saturday, January 30, 8 a. m. [Central Time.]
BREAKFAST in dining station, 40 minutes.
Leave Buffalo, 9.40 a. m. [Eastern Time.]
Arrive Rochester, 11.30 a. m.
POWERS HOTEL.
Concert at City Convention Hall, Clinton Avenue South, at 8.15 p. m.
Leave Rochester, 12.30 midnight.
Arrive Springfield, Sunday, January 31, at 8 a. m.
40 minutes for BREAKFAST.
Leave Springfield at 9.25 a. m.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 31, at 12 o'clock noon.

SPECIAL NOTICE. As the Orchestra leaves each city in a SPECIAL TRAIN, it is ABSOLUTELY IMPERATIVE that each member of the Orchestra having a trunk shall PERSONALLY arrange with the hotel porter to have same delivered at the baggage room; otherwise the Management will not be responsible for trunks left behind.

Members of the Orchestra are also cautioned to note the changes in TIME in the different cities visited.

Personal baggage must be ready for collection on Saturday, January 23.

CHAS. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FRED. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.
SYMPHONY HALL, HUNTINGTON AND MASS. AVENUES,
BOSTON, SATURDAY, January 23, 1909.

Programmes

CONVENTION HALL, . . . BUFFALO
MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 25, AT 8.15.
SMETANA, "MOLDAU."
TSCHAIKOWSKY, SYMPHONY, "Pathetic."
BEETHOVEN, CONCERTO for Violin.
WAGNER, OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."
Soloist: MISCHA ELMAN.

LIGHT GUARD ARMORY, . . DETROIT
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 26, AT 8.15.
WEBER, OVERTURE to "Oberon."
BEETHOVEN, SYMPHONY No. 5.
MACDOWELL, "LAMIA."
R. STRAUSS, "Death and Transfiguration."
WAGNER, PRELUDE to "Lohengrin."
WAGNER, OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

GRAYS' ARMORY, . . . CLEVELAND
WEDNESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 27, AT 8.
WEBER, OVERTURE to "Oberon."
SCHUMANN, SYMPHONY, No. 4.
MACDOWELL, "LAMIA."
SIBELIUS, "FINLAND."
VERDI, ARIA from "Aida."
WAGNER, PRELUDE AND LOVE DEATH from "Tristan and Isolde."
WAGNER, OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."
Soloist: MRS. SEABURY C. FORD.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE, . INDIANAPOLIS
THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 28, AT 8.15.
BEETHOVEN, OVERTURE "Egmont."
TSCHAIKOWSKY, SYMPHONY "Pathetic."
BRUCH, CONCERTO for Violin, No. 1.
WAGNER, OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."
Soloist: PROF. WILLY HESS.

MEMORIAL HALL, . . . COLUMBUS
FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, AT 8.15.
BEETHOVEN, OVERTURE "Egmont."
TSCHAIKOWSKY, SYMPHONY, "Pathetic."
SMETANA, "MOLDAU."
SIBELIUS, "FINLAND."
WAGNER, PRELUDE to "Lohengrin."
WAGNER, OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

CITY CONVENTION HALL, . ROCHESTER
SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 30, AT 8.15.
SMETANA, "MOLDAU."
TSCHAIKOWSKY, SYMPHONY, "Pathetic."
BEETHOVEN, CONCERTO for Violin.
WAGNER, OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."
Soloist: MISCHA ELMAN.

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1909

Here in Boston

As early as twenty minutes past seven this morning, the first comer for a "rush" ticket for the Symphony Concert this afternoon took his place on the steps of Symphony Hall. Others came quickly and by half-past ten fully a thousand persons were waiting for the 520 tickets that are actually sold. So much for the double prestige of Mr. Paderewski as pianist and composer, though the pianist, in the public mind, is still the larger and the better half of the two.

When the Symphony Orchestra pays its monthly visits to New York, Philadelphia and the neighboring cities, the conductor usually varies the programmes of the six concerts that fill the week. For the next journey, however, which begins in Philadelphia on Monday and ends in New York the following Saturday, there will be virtually a single programme—Mr. Paderewski's symphony and a piano concerto—Schumann's, Beethoven's "Emperor" or Saint Saëns's in C minor—played by Mr. Paderewski. The symphony will even be performed at both the concerts in New York.

BOSTON HERALD,

FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 12, 1909.

BOSTON COUPLE ARRESTED.

Daniel Maquarre and Mrs. Lenom Taken in San Francisco.

After being traced across the continent by the Boston police, Daniel Maquarre, formerly a soloist of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Mathilda Lenom, wife of Clement Lenom, a music teacher and a member of the Symphony Orchestra, were arrested today in San Francisco and are being held for the Boston police.

Inspector Armstrong, through whose efforts the couple were located, and Inspector McGarr will start for the Pacific coast as soon as the necessary papers have been secured from Gov. Draper. The couple refuse to return without extradition papers.

Prof. Lenom and his wife lived at 6 Atherton street, Roxbury. On the evening of Nov. 28, when Prof. Lenom was to play at a concert of the Longy Club, at Symphony Hall, at which Maquarre was to play a solo, the couple disappeared.

The next heard of Mrs. Lenom was through friends, who were asked to get some of her belongings from her home.

Maquarre had left his boarding place at 245 Columbus avenue without leaving any address. Inspector Armstrong found that letters were being received from Mrs. Lenom at New York, but before he could secure the woman's address he found that letters were being received from points in the West.

At first it was believed that the couple had gone to Europe, but later evidence proved that they were going across the continent.

Inspector Armstrong secured letters written to Mrs. Lenom from Maquarre, and with Chief Watts appeared before the grand jury and secured an indictment in seven counts against Mrs. Lenom and Maquarre.

The couple were traced to San Francisco, where the Boston police forwarded descriptions and addresses and asked that the couple be arrested and held. News of the arrest came today.

Prof. Lenom and Mrs. Lenom were married in Paris in 1899. They are natives of Belgium. Mrs. Lenom is considered an exceptionally attractive woman. They came to Boston in 1901. Maquarre is 27 years old, but has the appearance of a boy. He was befriended by Prof. Lenom, who took him to his Roxbury home and entertained him often.

In speaking of the case, Prof. Lenom said: "My wife and Maquarre were very good friends, but I never suspected anything out of the ordinary. I trusted my wife, for I loved her. Yes, I loved her better than your language could tell.

"My heart breaks when I think how my wife deceived me. That man was to me always a friend, and I believed him to be, I did so much for him. When he came to this country I liked him and secured for him a place in the orchestra. He came to my home often and was always welcomed."

...s Bureau in the World

S

288

PADEREWSKI IS COMING

Will Be at Lyric February 17 With His Own Symphony.

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth in the series, will be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening, February 17, at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest—in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Baltimore will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time.

This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America, 10 days ago. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself; and this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4. This will be positively his only appearance in Balti-

BOSTON TRAVELER,

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1909.

VAST THRONG WAIT TO HEAR PADEREWSKI

Symphony Hall Is Stormed by Music Lovers Who Seek Admittance.

Over 2000 persons—some of whom had been waiting since early morning—stood outside the doore of Symphony Hall at noon today waiting to secure seats for the first performance in the world of the Paderewski symphony and to hear Padèrewski play the piano for less than 20 minutes.

As has been the custom since 1881, when the first symphony concerts were given, the second balcony was not reserved and the doors were thrown open to the public at 1:30. Seats in the second balcony sold at 25 cents and the "first come, first served" rule was followed.

Mrs. Mary E. Crowell of Parsons street, Brighton, was the first woman to be on hand today. She arrived on the steps with a book and a long heavy coat at just 7:20 and remained close to the door until it was opened.

Soon another came, then another, and then many others, until at noon the line, two abreast, extended along Huntington avenue, past the Children's Hospital and along Gainsboro street.

The crowd was a cosmopolitan one. Many were shawls for warmth. A woman sitting on the steps reading a book was not an uncommon sight, and at noon many lunch boxes were opened and the contents eaten.

Despite the fact that the second balcony will hold but 550 persons, the crowd waited till it was filled, and then hundreds turned away disappointed.

Mr. Comee, manager of the hall, said that the arrival of the first person, at 7:20, was a new record. "The crowd also looks larger than ever before for a Paderewski concert," he added.

...rwspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

Transcript
Hale, Mc Mars
FEB 6- 1909

STAGELAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at Court Square theatre Tuesday evening, the 23d. For this concert the orchestra will make a special journey to Springfield from Boston returning the same night. The success of the two other concerts this year has been most gratifying to all interested in the welfare of the orchestra and there seems to be every reason to believe that another splendid audience will greet Mr. Fiedler on his last appearance. In fact, the success has been such that C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is making quite elaborate plans for the concerts next year and it may be taken for granted that the orchestra in the future will give three concerts in Springfield every season.

BULLETIN

Musical Notes

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 15, will have unusual interest in the presentation of Ignace Paderewski both as composer and pianist. As already announced, Philadelphia will on this occasion hear Paderewski's symphony for the first time. The work was begun in the summer of 1904, was finished only last December, and has not yet been published. It is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, being peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski will also be the soloist at this concert, his present plan being to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C-minor, No. 4. This will positively be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia during his present tour.

—o—

...ital as an in-

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,

FEBRUARY 13, 1909

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY

YESTERDAY ITS FIRST AUDIENCE HEARD IT

The Disappointment That It Brought and a Lukewarm Reception for It—The Distinction Between Mr. Paderewski, the Pianist, and Mr. Paderewski, the Composer—The Expectations That He Involuntarily Raises—The Traits of the New Symphony—Its Ideas and Structure and the Composer's Treatment of Them—The Monotony of Mood and Color and the Lack of Vital Emotional Appeal

Mr. Paderewski is the most illustrious pianist of his time. He is of distinct intellectual force in whatever direction he may turn his mind; to hear him play is to recognize those qualities of imagination and emotion that set the recreating interpreter above the mere performing virtuoso; and even for those that know him only in the concert room his personality is distinctive and impressive as a man of thought, feeling, power and intense inner life. The image of Mr. Paderewski as one of the unusual and puissant figures of our time, alike in the arts and among men, has stamped itself gradually upon the imaginations of all of us. Whatever he may attempt, therein we expect large and fine achievement. Like most executive musicians of his power and rank, and inevitably with his traits, he is ambitious of acomplishment and eminence as a composer. More: he has found ideas shaping themselves in his mind, stirring his imaginaion and translating themselves into emotion, that the music of others, however personal he make his interpretation, may not express. For years past, accordingly, he has given his leisure and some of his deepest thought and most zealous toil to composition, and often made himself opportunity for it. His symphony, played by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon for the first time, he numbers the twenty-fourth of his pieces, and the list that runs through the piano sonata, the variations and fugue for piano, the "Polish Fantasia" for piano and orchestra and the piano concerto to the opera "Manru," represented in America seven years ago, is long and considerable.

Yet this very enumeration suggests an immediate and curious reflection: "Manru" aside, how seldom have these pieces been played by anyone except Mr. Paderewski himself and how completely most of them have fallen from the living repertory. Though a pianist spoke with the tongues of men and of angels, self-sufficient virtuoso nature is such that few other pianists would play his music in his lifetime, while Mr. Paderewski himself in recent years has ignored his earlier pieces. Often as he has appeared with the Symphony Orchestra, he has not played his concerto in sixteen years, or the "Polish Fantasia" in thirteen, and no other pianist has attempted them. Practically they have dropped from the living ... of concert rooms as completely as "Manru," after its first vogue of eager curiosity, has dropped from the working repertory of opera houses. Last season he made known his own variations and his own sonata. Scarcely another pianist has undertaken them, and the composer himself may or may not choose to cherish and play them as he has Beethoven's sonata and Schumann's "Symphonic Studies" of his recital last week. In fine, Mr. Paderewski's opera and his pieces for piano and orchestra have not endured, in spite of the first enthusiastic curiosity over them, and the fate of his sonata and his variations for piano hangs in the balance. Their large and intricate style, their asceticism of idea and expression, their dominant intellectuality do not promise well for their future.

Instinctively none the less, by the association, or the confusion, of ideas that eminence in one dierction infers eminence in another, most of us do approach a new piece by Mr. Paderewski in much the same spirit in which we should come to new work by a composer of established distinction and fame as such. Instinctively, too, we apply similar standards to the judgment of it. In cold blood and hard logic, because Mr. Paderewski is an illustrious pianist is no reason that he should prove an illustrious composer. Likewise, because we properly try Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, by the highest and the severest tests is no reason why we should subject his compositions to similar standards. Yet the insistent and abiding impression of a unique and puissant personality will not down. Mr. Paderewski has stamped himself upon his generation for what he is as much as for what he does. It has received great interpretations of the music of others through his great personality. Instinctively, albeit illogically, it expects great music of his own from it. His manager is indeed artful to quicken public anticipation, but thereby he has only made to run the higher, the enthusiastic expectation that has awaited each of Mr. Paderewski's larger pieces when it has come to first performance in America. Yesterday afternoon the symphony was performed for the first time anywhere and the composer himself had chosen the Symphony Orchestra for the first performers. Inevitably the hall was filled to the last seat. The occupants of the second balcony had waited hours to preempt ther places; and professional or personal interest had brought a little company from New York. Everyone was in place promptly. The atmosphere was as still and as charged as it is at one of Mr. Paderewski's own recitals.

By the demeanor of the particular audience of this particular performance, the outcome was disappointment. The symphony runs in three movements. To the first the listeners paid the closest attention, and it is twenty minutes long. At the end came scattered and rather artificially prolonged applause that finally brought Mr. Paderewski once to the stage. The second movement is short; but an unfailing sign—the reading of the beguiling "entr'actes" of the programme-book—indicated that the attention of the house had begun to wander, and at the close the applause was brief and thin. The third movement, more directly stirring in mat... and in manner than its predecessors, measurably recalled attention and revived applause and again Mr. Paderewski was summoned a little laboriously to the platform. Of course, the audience at the afternoon ocncerts is a feminine and a peculiar company; but it has been thrice as warm in its applause for other pieces at other concerts. It was curious to note, too, how chary of its plaudits was the usually generous orchestra. What, moreover, audience and orchestra, even on Friday afternoons, can do in applause was obvious enough when the hall rang with their admiration and emotion over Mr. Paderewski's playing of Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor. The pianist, and not the symphonist, was he who engrossed and thrilled them. And the unmistakable disappointment over the symphony lay in the music and not the performance. Mr. Paderewski, and with reason, warmly congratulated Mr. Fiedler. All that the conductor and the men might do for the symphony, by every token of a single performance, they did. They imparted, as it seemed, its structure and substance, its spirit and its voice. They justified Mr. Paderewski's choice of them. They added the distinction of their performance to the symphony. But they could not bring to life music that in itself often lacked vital quality.

Melodically the symphony is rich. Unlike Brahms at one extreme and Strauss at the other, Mr. Paderewski has not invented his themes with assiduous thought of their fitness for certain necessities and contingencies or for their plasticity as so much musical material for development. They are imagined as well as invented themes, short-breathed as they often are, they have emotional and characterizing quality. The listener does not discover them as so much musical fact and musical possibility. Intrinsically, too, they are songful themes, and Mr. Paderewski's use and development of them throughout the symphony is distinctly and agreeably melodious. The second and slow movement, in which Mr. Paderewski would mirror "the lyric nature of the Polish race," is indeed melancholy song, moody, dreamy, tender, shadowed and shivering at the close. The vein of the first movement—of the ancient glories of Poland—is often that of solemn, heroic chant or of grave and sorrowing song of vanished days of old prowess. The third movement—delineative music of the moods and passions and even the events of the Polish rebellion in the sixties—is necessarily of less clear, songful quality, but the Polish anthem appears in many guises in it; the theme of the chivalric youth is strong and vivid, and the theme that is sooner or later to add a scherzo to the symphony has rhythmic life and promise. Mr. Paderewski is conservative. He places melody above color. He keeps his music, however scholarly on the one hand or delineative on the other, essentially melodious. By so much the symphony has the advantage over the musical ideas, too little touched with emotion to become song, that made the variations and the sonata of last year.

over

[70] Continued next page

Transcript Feb. 13: continued

those pieces Mr. Paderewski showed his intellectual and technical mastery over musical form and development. They were designed with the sense that sees the end from the beginning and that neither obscures nor weakens the musical structure by hesitations or deviations by the way. The sonata and the variations were sinewy, ascetic, close-packed music—music of idea and intellect rather than of emotion and imagination—but at every turn Mr. Paderewski wrought the chosen form to the chosen purpose. The symphony bears like witness to his qualities of intellect applied to music. It is an organic whole, a fully conceived and fully wrought design not merely in the repetition or the association or the continuance of themes, but in well-knit and well-proportioned structure that makes each movement a firm entity and yet keeps that movement a part of a larger and cumulative design. In spite of too frequent repetition of short fragments of themes, the progress of the music is steadily evolutionary, steadily expansive. It does move slowly—the whole performance, with Mr. Fiedler now and then speeding up the music, consumes seventy minutes—but in that slowness Mr. Paderewski wisely gains time to develop his musical ideas, so that in the narrative and the delineative music of the third movement it unfolds both itself and the "programme" behind. Full, significant and adroitly ordered is the harmonic background. Moreover, this scope and surety of design, this firmness of workmanship have not made the symphony precise, prim and angular. Throughout the music is elastic. The spirit of Polish folk-music dwells in the idealized melodies that Mr. Paderewski has invented from his own imagination. Thus they are highly rythmic; the first and the second movements run in incessant undulation; while the third tingles to the march beneath. The music is steadily obedient to melodic curve, sensitive to accent and readily pliant to each detail of the "programme" of the finale. The mere transmutations and disembodiments that the national anthem and other melodies there undergo —and usually comprehensibly and significantly—is proof of Mr. Paderewski's manipulative skill and intellectual grasp of his music. Clearer proof still of this mastery of design and form: though he professes to count the three movements already written a rounded whole, the final and projected scherzo is essential to matter, symmetry and mood. The emphasis of the theme from which it is to spring clearly signals it.

With the instrumentation—and that is to say the tonal coloring—of the symphony, reservations begin. Mr. Paderewski has worked at the music intermittently four years and more. As report runs among his friends, he has spent much of his time and labor, especially for the last two years, upon the instrumental voices. Try as he might—again to trust similar reports—the result has never fully satisfied him. And instrumental coloring is half the battle with a modern symphony scored for modern orchestra and for modern ears. The merest youngster, nowadays, who is writing music thinks in instruments, and plumbs their capacities and their possibilities, their combinations and contrasts, to the utmost. Half the emotional and the nervous thrill of the music of our day is the thrill of tonal coloring. In some respects—if ideas were not still necessary—modern music would become instrumentation. Now it is all very well for Mr. Paderewski to add his three double-bass sarrusophones to the orchestra and to obtain from them veritable "chunks" of deep, heavy, sombre, solid tone. His own "Tonitruone," which in sound is not so very far from a skilfully manipulated thunder machine in a well-equipped theatre, brings a distinct and telling instrumental suggestion. The point is not of additions and innovations, but of the resources that any modern orchestra offers. As it seemed at a single hearing, the instrumental coloring of the symphony lacked variety and saliency. Comparatively seldom did the ear and the imagination receive a distinct sense of any instrument or choir of instruments. Mr. Paderewski seemed content with a relatively narrow range of what is possible to his violins, for example, to his wood-winds or to his horns. Perhaps this was deliberate purpose; but the result, none the less, was monotony and tameness of tonal coloring. On the other hand the frequent thickness of the instrumental web could hardly have been deliberate. Throughout, the listener heard with a curious impression of tonal mass. So stout was it, however, and so closely was it woven that it was hard for the ear to catch the various strands in it and the fancy to answer to them. Individual voices could not cut their way through, except when it was obviously opened for them; interior voices sounded choked and smothered. Sometimes the instrumentation was downright opaque. Often it needed opening, clarifying, individualizing. Mr. Paderewski's melodic and harmonic invention and his manipulative skill are elastic enough. It is his instrumental coloring that lacks suppleness. Frankly, there are moments when the music hardly "sounds."

Remains a final test that, perhaps, best accounts for the measurable disappointment that the symphony brought. Music, as we understand it nowadays, has become an emotional speech. It imparts ideas—it is true—but ideas that have crystallized into emotion and become a possessing, communicable mood to the composer. Music must kindle the imagination and stir the emotions of those that hear. Of course the test is personal and intimate. Where Wagner kindles one imagination Debussy may leave it cold. Some that hear and thrill to Strauss are deaf and inert to d'Indy. The reviewer, however sensitive and catholic-minded and with the best will in the world, can only set down a candid personal impression and have done. And this particular symphony left many that heard cold and unstirred. It was easy to admire its melodic fertility, its songful quality, its justice of design, its firmness of workmanship, and its manipulative skill. It was easy to debate of its tonal coloring. There was mental appreciation of the delineative force, the excited and strenuous voice of the third movement; of the moody and dreamy song of the Andante; of the grave and heroic exaltation of the beginning. The listener surely understood something of what was stirring in Mr. Paderewski's imagination and of what he would express in his music. But with understanding came halt. The symphony, even in the clear beauty of the Andante, did not command, seize, engross, enthrall and make the mood and passion it would compass the mood and passion of those that heard. It was the voice of Mr. Paderewski, but not the common voice of us all. It lacked communicating life. Mr. Paderewski wrote the symphony in passionate tribute to his own Poland. The programme book, rather than the music, affirmed this passion.

H. T. P.

Early Musical Events

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth in the series, will be given in the Lyric, Wednesday evening, February 17, at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest; in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist.

As already announced, Baltimore will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904, and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America 10 days ago.

The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and, as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-'64. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4. This will be positively his only appearance in Baltimore during his present tour.

PADEREWSKI THE MAGNET

Attracts as Soloist and Composer.

New Symphony a Monumental Work of Art.

Mr Max Fiedler Directs Its First Performance.

The early birds going by Symphony hall yesterday morning at little past 7 o'clock saw one or two individuals encamped upon the steps near the entrance on Huntington av waiting, just waiting. Two or three hours later there were many mere people, and by 11 o'clock there probably were a thousand or so, all doing the same thing, waiting; some patiently, some impatiently and nearly all of them armed and equipped with luncheons.

And there the twice five hundred remained until about 2 o'clock, when the doors of the hall were opened to admit to the 25-cent rush seats, not the whole crowd but only about half of the expectant ones, the number permitted by law. Slowly the disappointed half disintegrated, while the more fortunate musical enthusiasts massed themselves in the second balcony well satisfied with the expenditure of time and quarter dollars for the sake of seeing and hearing Paderewski and his symphony.

A Paderewski Afternoon.

'Twas a Paderewski afternoon, all right, for the great composer-pianist was about the whole thing on the program. His brand new symphony in B minor, op. 14, was to be given a first time anywhere public performance, and then along about 4 o'clock there was to be a Saint-Saens concerto played by the wonderful Pole.

P S—And possibly an extra number, perhaps more, could be managed someway, despite the "no encore" tradition of the Symphony concerts.

And all this came about just as wished by the big audience, which was a particularly dressy one, and probably the only ones dissatisfied with the actions of the Oliver Twists of music asking for "more" were the people about the hall who would be obliged to hustle lively to get the stage cleared in time for the commemorative meeting at night in honor of Mr Lincoln's memory.

It is pretty safe to say there were few tardy ones, for the doors closed as per notices, promptly for the first 20 minutes necessary to play the first movement of the symphony. The audience was notably critical in its makeup, for there were an unusual number of prominent musicians and critics from other cities present.

Sembrich Sends Greetings by Wireless

Paderewski was showered with congratulations at his reception in the artists' room on the stage after the performance of the symphony, and cordiality was even more marked at the end of the concert. Among the "best wishes" received was one by wireless from Mme Sembrich, who is taking her ease upon the high seas on her way to Berlin.

This took place, as it were, behind the scenes; but the audience also took a hand, yes, many of them, in paying tribute to the gifted man. He was vigorously called to the stage after the first part of the symphony, and at the finale he was forced to make several return trips to bow his acknowledgments, to shake hands with conductor Fiedler and to indicate to the members of the orchestra his appreciation of their splendid work.

The monumental composition is really not completed, for Paderewski contemplates adding another part to the three movements played yesterday. Graphically has the composer pictured in musical form a tribute to his beloved Poland, and Boston is honored by his decision to have the tone poem produced here and by our own Symphony orchestra.

As soloist in Saint-Saens' concerto he again displayed his masterly skill as interpreter, and the usual scenes of enthusiasm were in order whenever the audience had a chance to applaud.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

THE BOSTON POST

FEBRUARY 13, 1909

TURN 600 AWAY FROM CONCERT

Immense Throng Unable to Buy Seats for Paderewski

Several hundred women and many men were unable to secure rush tickets for the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, the appearance of Paderewski as soloist and composer bringing out a crowd of 1200 people to secure 520 seats.

The double inducement of Paderewski as soloist and the orchestra playing a symphony composed by him was the lure that brought out one of the largest throngs that have been known in the history of the orchestra.

It was 7:20 yesterday morning when the first arrival, a woman, appeared, and she held her place in the line until the sale began. Carrying lunches done up in papers and in boxes, people straggled into line through the early morning hours and at 1 o'clock yesterday afternoon a double line extended from the entrance to the corner of Gainsboro street, the whole length of the Children's Hospital being taken up.

600 Disappointed

When the "No More Seats" sign was hung up at the window where the 25-cent seats were being sold a line of over 600 women and men turned away disappointed. But they had, some of them, come from such a distance and had been so anxious to hear the great pianist that many of them, particularly the women, remained outside the hall to have the consolation of seeing the musician at least when he came out after the concert.

Symphony Hall presented an unusual picture at noon, when one by one the people in the long line who had been far-sighted enough to bring lunch sat down on the broad stone steps and unwrapped lunches. News of the unprecedented throng spread rapidly and hawkers soon appeared with the usual street lunches, which were promptly bought by the waiting hundreds.

Women Struggle for Places

Street cars leading to the hall were crowded, and there were scores who came afoot. There were 520 people in line at 10:30 a. m., so that all who came later remained in line with no chance of securing a seat, but this did not seem to be any barrier, as the line grew longer and longer until there were 1200 waiting when the ticket window was thrown open.

Paderewski Plays at Symphony Concert

By Olin Downes

Musical Boston, all agog, attended the 15th rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in high anticipation of the first performance of Ignace Paderewski's new symphony and to hear that peer of pianists play.

Certainly Mr. Paderewski, in his performance, justified the pots of ink that have been flung at him since his first American tour.

It is not necessary here to recount the history and the purpose of the symphony. It has been told and retold at length to a wondering public. It is of more moment to remark that the composer has evidently labored with the utmost forethought and self-criticism toward the highest goal, that his purpose rings true in every measure.

It is not Mr. Paderewski's fault that his symphony has been so shouted about.

He has evidently perused many modern scores to advantage, notably those of Tschaikowsky. His tonal architecture is on the largest scale.

Consider the orchestra that he has employed to fill his canvas: Three flutes, three oboes (English horn), three clarinets (bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, bass tuba, harp, organ, three kettledrums, side-drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone, the usual strings.

Mr. Paderewski, as everybody knows, invented the tonitruone himself. To some, however, it may be news that at the first rehearsals it was found that at last a composer had "stumped" the Symphony Orchestra. Not a man of them could successfully handle the new instrument. The author of its being was summoned in haste, and soon everything was well.

The first movements of [illegible] symphony follow freely the accepted forms. They prepare the way for the third, which speaks with ample rhetoric of the Polish insurrection of '63-'64, and is less concise than the other sections.

With characteristic splendor and color the composer would commemmorate his native land. There are impressive passages and much interesting material which is not always done justice by the instrumentation.

An opinion of such a work after a single performance would in any case be half-baked, and extended comment may best be deferred until tomorrow.

Then, Mr. Paderewski, a pianist on a height of his own, a genius when in the vein, gave a never-to-be-forgotten performance of the rarely played C minor concerto of Saint-Saens. Words fail to do justice to that masterly exhibition.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD MASS
FEB 7 - 1909

bowing excellent.

After the Boston orchestra has played Paderewski's symphony in Boston, in New York and in other eastern cities, the Chicago orchestra is to play it in the West. Already a small orchestra has tried it over for the ear of Mr. Paderewski himself at Lausanne in Switzerland.

BALTIMORE MD
FEB 7 - 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next Boston Symphony Concert, which will be the fourth in the series, will be given in the Lyric, Wednesday evening, February 17, at 8:15 o'clock. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest; in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced Baltimore will hear Paderewski's Symphony at this concert for the first time. Paderewski will also be the soloist and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C-Minor No. 4. This will be positively his only appearance in Baltimore during his present tour.

[171]

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 16. This concert will present Paderewski. Washington will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was completed only last December, has not yet been published. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday night at 8 o'clock. In many respects this concert promises to be one of the most successful of the whole series of the season of 1903-1909. It will be the most important and most interesting because Ignace Jan Paderewski will be the central figure, and the orchestra will give in Baltimore for the first time the great symphony on which the pianist and composer has been working so long, and which he has finally completed. The work is on monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and, on this account the program will contain only the Symphony and Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, which M. Paderewski will play himself.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
SATURDAY MORNING,
FEBRUARY 13, 1909

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY PRODUCED IN BOSTON

A LONG, EARNEST AND IMPORTANT WORK

New Instruments Heard for the First Time, but No New Points of Orchestration.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Paderewski—Symphony in B minor.
Saint-Saens—Piano concerto in C minor.
Pianist—Ignace Paderewski.

The above reads like a very short programme, but if any reader receives that impression let him get rid of it at once. A modern symphony is a serious matter, in breadth (of scoring) and in length, if not always in depth. There was a time when Beethoven's Ninth symphony was considered a pretty long work and rather heavily scored. But there are many modern composers who drive it into the domain of simplicity and brevity—by comparison with their very prolix works.

Paderewski possibly suffers from the same handicap which once affected the compositions of Liszt. Everyone idolized Liszt as the King of pianists, and his own reputation in this field threw him into the shade as a composer. Only now, when his piano-playing is but a memory, the world is beginning to realize how great he was in musical creation. It may be the same with Paderewski, but we are by no means convinced of this yet. He has the spirit of nationalism in his music, always a great advantage in composition, and he has certainly mastered the routine of orchestration and of figure development.

The symphony of yesterday afternoon took an hour and ten minutes in its performance. It called for instruments galore and some of them of a new type. Richard Strauss has brought in the Heckelphone and revived the Oboe d'Amore; Paderewski brings in the Sarussophone and other novelties, including a "Thunder-machine."

There is no essential need of the Sarussophone as a new tone-color. It is a brass instrument with a contra-bassoon mouthpiece (at least in its deepest pitch), and the contra-bassoon is the more effective of the two instruments. When Massenet introduced the Sarussophone into his "Esclarmonde" he told the present reviewer that he did so because there was sometimes difficulty in obtaining a good contra-bassoonist, and the Sarussophone was the easier to blow and the least liable to be off pitch.

Side-drum, gong, triangle, tambourine, etc., enter into this large score as a matter of course, and there is, as above mentioned, a new instrument to imitate the rolling of distant thunder.

When one remembers, in this connection, Strauss's wind-machine and his more recent device of striking bass-drums with birch rods, it shows that we have entered upon an epoch of tonal experiments. Smashing panes of glass, scraping slate-pencils on a black-board, or the use of locomotive whistles seem to be the only tone-colors yet untried, for Berlioz has used even rifle-shots in a score.

The first movement of Paderewski's Symphony, which has an impressive introduction, is fairly intelligible in its shape. Its themes are recognizable and their chief figures well developed. But the first two movements are almost entirely in a sombre mood and give very little contrast. There is also very little sustained melody, although very much figure development. The monotony is added to by the great use of chromatics. The orchestration is often turgid.

There is a bit of canonic work in the introduction, but little of strict counterpoint in the later portion of the symphony. All through the first movement there seems to be a struggle with great ideas but without mastering them. The work suggests greatness without being great. The military touches near the end of the first movement, the chorale-like phrase on the organ, are mighty fragments that might have been something more.

The slow movement continues in its dark tints the gloomy impression of its predecessor. There are many sequences, and much display of the wind instruments in the deepest register, a la Tschaikowsky, without, we must add, the attractive poetry of Tschaikowsky.

The symphony goes directly from its slow movement to its finale. The Scherzo is absent, as in a concerto-form. We are informed that this finale treats of the Polish Revolution of 1863. It is laudable for a Polish composer to glorify the memories of his country, for never has there been a more splendid kingdom than Poland, never a country in which more heroism has been displayed in a hopeless struggle against despotism. We therefore listened with the greatest respect to the tone-picture which gave one of the lofty chapters of Poland's history. And we found this the most tangible and the most effective part of the whole work. A bugle-call and a roll of side drums led up to what Shakespeare would have called "Alarums and Excursions." The introduction of a Polish national theme made the picture still more tangible. Most striking of all was the dominating, almost irresistible, march rhythm that formed the substratum of the whole Finale. We think that we shall like the last movement best, on repeated hearing.

It must be remembered that the reviewer has heard this work but once and that it has many novel effects. It would therefore be wrong to give an irrevocable judgment. We found some fine points in the symphony, but on the whole it seemed fragmentary in spite of its continuous development. We discovered no new points of orchestration in spite of the new instruments. Paderewski's scoring only restated what Tschaikowsky has given better. We believe also that all that this symphony had to tell could have been recounted in one-half of the time taken. Yet we recognize the earnestness of the work and its importance.

There was considerable applause at the end, and the composer was called out twice.

We intimated in our opening sentence that the concert was not as short as its list might indicate. The law of the Boston Symphony Concerts is prohibitive of encores, but Paderewski is like Necessity—he knows no Law. He is the particular pet of the encore-fiend. It matters not how long the concert may have been, nor what he may have played, nor how he may have played it, the public cry, with Prince Hal—"Well, breathe awhile and then to 't again," and the kindly artist never sets up a refusal. Therefore when the long concert was over the public did not depart, but waited for the inevitable postscript.

After the symphony came the St. Saens C minor Concerto. But between them there came the longest "wait" that has ever taken place at the Symphony Concerts. Twenty-five minutes elapsed between the last notes of the symphony and the beginning of the Concerto.

When it once began, however, it was very brilliantly given. It is not as fine as the G minor concerto, which we heard two weeks ago, but Paderewski played it with a verve that carried it to absolute success. There were some tremendous crashes in the first movement and in the final Coda, but the Allegro Vivace of the second movement was splendidly performed and the manner in which the chief theme of the Finale was rapped out was exciting. It was, as we expected, a greater Paderewski that was revealed (in spite of the thunderbolts) than was evident in his recital of a few days ago. In spite of all the spots that can be discerned upon this sun [illegible] remains the chief star of the present [illegible]. When we left the hall the supplementary concert of encores was beginning.

JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 13. 1909.

MRS. LENOM AND MAQUARRE IN CELLS

Symphony Player and Wife of Friend Arrested in San Francisco.

Chief Inspector Watts received a telegram yesterday from San Francisco, stating that Mrs. Clement Lenom, the wife of the Symphony Orchestra musician, was under arrest there, together with Daniel Maquarre of Roxbury, who was a fellow player in the Symphony with Mrs. Lenom's husband until she vanished.

The disappearance of the two simultaneously led to much affinity talk in Boston last November, and a warrant was issued for the arrest of both of them if found together.

The couple were located in San Francisco through several letters which Mrs. Lenom wrote to a Boston woman, in which she very indiscreetly gave her address. This address was forwarded to Chief Watts by a friend of Mr. Lenom's, and the arrest in San Francisco followed. They are planning to fight extradition and Inspector Armstrong will start for California either today or Monday to endeavor to bring them back.

ress .....

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music February 15. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest, for it will present Ignace Paderewski both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Philadelphia will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and, as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE,
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1909.

MUSIC

Paderewski's Symphony Performance in Boston.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, Feb. 13.—Amid scenes of gladsome excitement Paderewski's symphony was performed at a public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here this afternoon. The occasion was the fifteenth afternoon meeting of the orchestra and its patrons and served eloquently to prove the great popularity of the Polish musician. Long before the concert began there was not a seat to be had in any part of Symphony Hall, and would-be purchasers of places not subscribed for gathered in the corridors of the hall as early as 7 o'clock in the morning. Before long the line extended out of the hall far up the street, and hundreds were unable to gain admittance. In the audience were musicians and music lovers from other places, among them Sigismond Stojowski, Ernest Schelling and Alexander Lambert, of New York. Mme. Sembrich, more than two days out on her voyage to Europe, remembered her countryman by sending a wireless message in Polish expressing her hope that the symphony would meet with success.

The programme contained only two numbers—the symphony, which received its first public performance, and the C minor pianoforte concerto by Saint-Saëns, in which Mr. Paderewski played the solo part. The celebration of Lincoln's birthday had charged the atmosphere with patriotic feeling, and this gave peculiar appropriateness to the patriotism which was the insiration of the symphony. Mr. Paderewski by his own confession paid tribute to his native Poland and a memorial of the revolution of 1863-'64. The uprising and its woful outcome receive musical dedication in the final movement, which is frankly programmatic, but there is also a hymning of Poland's heroic period in the first movement and of the musical nature of the Polish people in the second. There are only three movements in the symphony at present, but a fourth movement, which it is to be supposed will body forth the happy side of the Polish nature, since it is to be a scherzo, will be added when Mr. Paderewski takes the symphony in hand again. The work was promised when the composer was last in America. The fact that it is still unfinished is evidence of the serious manner in which he has devoted himself to his self-imposed, but highly honorable, task.

Nine-tenths of Mr. Paderewski's music is expression after mood. It is freighted with melancholy. It tells of a great corroding longing, vain effort, and hope which never shines resplendent, but appears ever at the end as only a flickering light. In the last movement the voice of the people striving to throw off the yoke of oppression finds expression in the frequent occurrence of a suggestion of the Polish national hymn, "Jszsze Polska nie zgineta" ("Poland is not yet lost"), but the suggestion remains only a suggestion. The device has been used by other composers in treating patriotic or political themes—by Litolff in his "Robespierre" overture, by Tschaikowsky in his "1812"—but generally there is a swelling proclamation of the typical hymn at the end. But Mr. Paderewski has no consummation which he can hymn; his song is only of longing still cherished and pride unbroken. To me at a first hearing the most moving portions of the music were the buoyant proclamation of the second theme in the first movement, which seemed to tell of ancient stories and a heart searching threnody in the last movement after the din of a lost battle and before a dirge for the heroic dead.

Structurally Mr. Paderewski has paid deference to approved symphonic forms in his first two movements, and exercised the utmost freedom in his last, which has the dimensions and the outlines of a symphonic poem. In it he has hewn to the lines of historical incident. It might bear a superscription like Tschaikowsky's overture, already mentioned—"Poland, 1863," might have been its title—it is a delineation of the stirrings of popular unrest, the zeal of youthful patriotism, the unheeded admonitions of wise conservatism, of warfare begun with heedless daring and enthusiasm, of defeat and lamentation, ending with a glimmer of hope.

The impression made by the music is not so easily described. Mr. Paderewski has invented some pregnant themes, but they are not strikingly novel, and his treatment of them makes them sound scant of breath. There is an excessive amount of iteration of short motivi borrowed from the themes in the working out of the climaxes. His fabric is polyphonic, and the singing voices are heard always, but much of the music is monochromatic. This may be because Mr. Paderewski has hitherto been chiefly a composer for the pianoforte, which is an embodied tutti, but except in the modulatory reiterations his music does not sound as if conceived for any other instrument than the orchestra. It is anything but transcribed pianoforte music. Portions of it might be improved by reorchestration, but there is much color in the score, and some of its effects are both brilliant and original. The audience applauded the first movement and the last to the echo, and would not desist until the composer had repeatedly voiced his thanks. The second movement called forth only a ripple of perfunctory handclapping.

H. E. K.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 13. 1909

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY

Paderewski's first symphony had its initial public performance at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. Paderewski also appeared as the piano soloist in the performance of the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor. Some idea of the remarkable popular attractiveness of the event may be gathered from the announcement made at the hall that the first seeker after one of the 500 seats on sale for this weekly rehearsal put in an appearance soon after 7 o'clock in the morning, and that long before noon there were twice as many waiting in line as there were tickets for in the box office.

It was a Paderewski program. The symphony came first. The authorized notice says: "The symphony was written as a patriotic tribute of the composer to his native land, and it was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64." It was begun in the summer of 1904 and the parts were copied only two months ago. In its present form it has three movements, but there is to be a fourth movement, based on the last theme of the third movement. According to the announcement, there is "no absolute program for either the first or second movement." But the third movement is "in effect a symphonic poem," dealing with the revolution. History says of this struggle: "It was a mere guerilla war, and no great or decisive conflicts took place; but the sympathy of Europe was largely enlisted on behalf of the Poles." In 1864 the Russian troops stamped out the last embers of insurrection; and since then "the kingdom of Poland has disappeared from all official documents."

The first movement is full of the "bitter memories of defeat." This is the least effective of the three movements. It is written in the latest style, but it makes no very deep impression. Instead of outspoken speech, it seems more like a mumbled soliloquy. In the second movement the composer undertakes to express "the lyrical nature of his race." The themes are distinctly Polish; they are bitter-sweet; they are interesting but not memorable. The third movement, with its definite program, its description of Polish feelings and Polish deeds, its pictures of prospective victory and of overwhelming defeat, is by far the most impressive one of all. Standing alone it would take its place among the most powerful and most popular symphonic poems produced in recent years. It made a strong impression on the audience yesterday. The applause that followed the first and second movements was rather perfunctory; but after the last movement there was an outburst of hearty applause. Composer and conductor congratulated each other in the presence of the audience, while the audience acclaimed both. Mr. Fiedler and his players deserved a good share of the honors. Their work was full of extraordinary skill and sympathy.

The score of the symphony calls not only for most of the known instruments, including three sarrusophones, but for a tonitruone, "an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski himself invented." The noise it creates is first cousin to stage thunder.

The Saint-Saens concerto, with Paderewski at the piano, brought to an end the most remarkable Symphony concert of the season.

ss .....

The Boston Symphony orchestra and the January Twilight concert both suffered on the 29th from most unfavorable weather, neither Memorial hall, or the university chapel being easily accessible by street cars, both requiring a long enough walk after one leaves the car, to get a perfect drenching if rain prevails on a concert day. The Twilight concert suffered from rain and sleet, the Boston Symphony from sleet, ice and snow. The concerts were both excellent, the evening concert drawing about 2000 people in spite of the inclement weather, though there should have been 3500 there to hear the gorgeous program, and to see the equally interesting new conductor—Max Fiedler. Last year—the Boston Symphony concert was declared the finest concert ever heard in Columbus, and this year the same people pronounced it much more beautiful. Mr. Fiedler is a wonderfully magnetic conductor and it is no marvel that the orchestra excels itself under the inspiration of his personality.

[172]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 14, 1909

Musical Notes and Comment

Edited by Olin Downes

PADEREWSKI

A Composer and Pianist

The performances of I. J. Paderewski's new symphony at the Symphony concerts of last week sold all available seats weeks in advance, assembled an audience which included many of the foremost musicians and press representatives from other cities, come to pass first judgment on the new and eagerly anticipated work in advance of their lingering brethren at home. Other works of great and greater importance have been given for the first time in this city, but where was the public and where were the critics? What's in a name?

But it is not Mr. Paderewski's fault that his symphony has been so shouted about. Doubtless he himself would have been happier to shun the publicity that dogs his footsteps, remain as any other composer who eats today, allow the music to stand or fall by its own merits. But what can one do with a reputation that has been steadily gaining momentum during years of golden virtuosity?

It is a pleasure to say that the atmosphere of the press agent is absent as one listens to the new work. Sincerity and nobility of the purpose shine through every measure. Every page bears evidence to the care and exhaustive labor that have been expended toward an artistic end, but whatever a man has within him he finds true self-expression only by long experience and many failures. In the course of a lifetime the active and reflective individual develops more than his brain and his muscles. The outside life, contact with material things, is as important as what passes within, as potent a factor in development as any mental or spiritual progress. I am delivering this homily not because it is Sunday, but in reference to Mr. Paderewski's intentions as contrasted with his handling of the symphonic, the orchestra and the symphonic form.

Mr. Paderewski as a composer is chiefly known to pianists by much refined music of a salon type, by a concerto that contains some beautiful ideas, by the sonata and the variations with which he recently acquainted his audiences. The two latter works are in many respects important additions to the literature of the piano. They are written by a composer who finds in himself things eminently worthy of expression, and they are written by a pianist.

So is this symphony. It requires an immense amount of experience to write effectively for a large orchestra. The scoring of the work under discussion, thick and too often colorless, often does injustice to good ideas. There is sufficient contrast of color, and when instruments of different families are used together the timbres are not clearly and skilfully mixed. The writing for the strings, which bear the burden of the instrumentation, is only effective here and there. No doubt with the intention of procuring a dark and melancholy effect their brilliant upper register is too often neglected, and the parts are packed too closely together. The theme for instance, which is given to the lower strings at the beginning of the allegro of the first movement, is only perceptible by industrious burrowing through a mass of thick tone. The passages for the brass are too often harsh and muddy. There are some freak experiments with instruments which have no adequate effect. No doubt Mr. Paderewski had other sounds in his mind than those he put upon paper. Some slight alterations were made at the rehearsals. It is very possible that other revisions will come to pass in the near future. Thus far there is more theory than practice in that partition.

The writer on music subjects is famous for changing his opinions with the seasons, and that is as it should be. Making allowances for this, it yet seems that the work under discussion affords an instance of a composer hampered by a self-set task of herculean proportions. Naturally it is in the third movement that this unwieldiness is most to be perceived. It is not hard to imagine that pre-ordained programme staring the composer between the eyes, numbing his hand: Spirit of insurrection, the outbreak of war, the conflict, defeat, Poland's future, etc. Thus do the Britishers at their music festivals. The magnitude of the task and the conscientiousness of an artist have exerted what is upon the whole a pernicious effect. The work has been, one feels, revised and again revised. The painters would call this symphony "fussed."

It is not wrong that such an artist should hitch his wagon to a star, yet it must be confessed that Chopin, by means of a common, ordinary piano, has accomplished more in praise of his native land than his countryman with that enormous, inflated orchestra. The first two movements of this hour and 20 minutes' symphony are more concise than the last. There is little that is new in the initial section. There is circumstantial and undeniable evidence of close acquaintance with the scores of Tschaikowsky. No one, indeed, could easily avoid remarking the Russian's weeping lyric phrases and typical examples of his methods of scoring. The beautiful opening of the introduction for the muted strings might be called bardic by the imaginative. A fine passage occurs later in the movement just before the return of those phrases. A chivalrous theme for the first violins has impulse and ardor, but it savors decidedly of the heroic and is but a phrase that mounts in sequence. There is plausible gallantry and rhythmic excitement toward the end, though the brief entrance of the organ is theatric rather than dramatic. The movement is symphonic, but patchy in development.

The middle section is the best of the three in every respect, in melodic invention, clearness and richness of instrumentation, conciseness and spontaneity of expression. It is, too, more truly racial than the rest, though the voice of the great Russian is not always missing. But sum it all up and what have we? Ideas that are in themselves unimportant and seldom individual, architecture that is anything but finished and symmetrical, devices in writing and instrumentation that are known to every up-to-date composer of the present time. But surely this is not the last word from Mr. Paderewski. He is unceasingly self-critical; he is untiring in the pursuit of his highest ideals. He will be the first to observe the shortcomings of one of his most serious works, and the first to retrieve them. As far as one may judge of a new work, the performance by Mr. Fiedler and his men could not have been excelled.

It is difficult to describe adequately the superb playing of Saint-Saens' concerto in C minor. The work is far too little known, and it was worthy of the attention Mr. Paderewski bestowed upon it. His performance was intoxicating. The work, with which I am not intimately acquainted, was probably presented in a far greater light than its contents merit. That is not, however, especially essential just now. The fact remains that Mr. Paderewski was far more creative in his playing than with his pen, and that he achieved a sensational triumph. It would even have been a pleasure, without listening, to watch the play of those wrists and fingers of tempered steel, so instinct with life and creation. It has been years since the virtuoso has done himself such justice here, so fairly earned the pots of ink that have been flung at him. Of course, the royal exception to the rulings of the Symphony concerts was made, and there were encores.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski.

The next Boston Symphony concert, the fourth of the series, will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 16. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest, for it will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Washington will hear Paderewski's symphony for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published. Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form. The second is a slow movement, and the third is a symphonic poem in itself, and is peculiarly memorial of the Polish revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1909

"The Paderewski Festival"

For Boston, the "Pederewski Festival," as the press agent is announcing the performances of his symphony and his appearances as a pianist this week in New York, ended at half past ten on Saturday evening. By that time Mr. Fiedler and his men had performed Mr. Paderewski's symphony for a second time; while he himself had played Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor with the orchestra and, though he was very tired, added three solo pieces for an audience that was more eager for Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, than for Mr. Paderewski, the composer. If we have a musical or a social diarist nowadays, he must have surely noted the little things that make the spice of such "festival" occasions when later generations read amusedly of them: the shrill-voiced youth who hawked photographs of Mr. Paderewski as the audience were entering and leaving the hall and even up and down the corridors in the intermission—an innovation indeed at the decorous and rather austere Symphony Concerts; the sartorial tribute, especially among the men of the audience, of evening clothes—a homage that they often deny to old masters and to new; the palpitating Polish train in Mr. Paderewski's wake, bright with his reflected glory; the patient endurance of the prolonged intermissions and the occasional delays that his presence required, since Mr. Paderewski has long forgotten the courtesy of promptitude to an audience; the just tribute of the composer to the orchestra that had brought his new music to luminous hearing; and the general air of eager participation in an "occasion." Restless spirits from New York for example—have complained that outside programmes and performance, our Symphony Concerts are routine. Certainly those of Friday and Saturday were not.

Mr. Paderewski, in his justly laudatory and becomingly courteous thanks to orchestra and audience, has told how warmly he appreciates the intelligence and the judgment of those that first heard his symphony. The more to regret then that it was received on Saturday night only a little more heartily than it had been on Friday afternoon. At the end of the first movement—to make the record—came a quick burst of applause that was sustained enough to bring the composer once or twice to the platform. The second movement went, as on Friday, to scanty plaudits. At the close of the whole symphony there was hearty, but not enthusiastic or very prolonged applause, that gained in spirit and volume when the composer shook the conductor warmly by the hand. Unmistakably the stress of sustained attention for seventy minutes, and the monotony of much of the mood of music had their effect even upon so intent and so appreciative a company. The familiar plaudits of the audiences on Saturday evenings—quick, general, sustained, warm and vital with the keen pleasure of what they had heard and the pleasure of answering and rewarding emotion—came in the pauses in the concerto, at the close, and after Mr. Paderewski's encore pieces.

Those who heard him play in his recital a week ago still recall the marshalled magnificence of his matured powers, deployed then as he has not deployed them in years. They were no less rich and splendid, so far as the chosen music gave them room, in his playing at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. The memory of the symphony may endure or may fade, as it impressed each who heard, but the memory of the mingled might and delicacy of tone, the splendors of coloring, the commanding, the persuading, the entrancing eloquence, the vitality of feeling and of expression, the perfect fusion of matter, manner and utterance, the sense of a fine and strenuous spirit making the music its own; the impression of a unique and singularly noble mind and temperament speaking with its true voice—all these will abide. To us at least who hear it is the pianist, rather than the composer, who expresses the masterful Paderewski of our admiration. H. T. P.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE,
FEBRUARY 14, 1909—SIXTY-

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Great is Paderewski's New Symphony.

It Will Insure Piano Virtuoso Fame as a Composer.

Busy Week for Concert-Goers Hereabouts.

Paderewski's tribute to his native Poland, in the form of a symphony inspired by the 40th anniversary of the revolution of 1863, received its first production at the Boston symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and was repeated last evening at the regular concert. The unusual importance of the event brought to Boston critics from otehr prominent cities, and at both performances under Mr Fiedler the big audiences were of a size and disposition indicative of great interest and due appreciation of the composer's decision to have the initial performance made by our orchestra.

The famous pianist also appeared as soloist in Saint-Saen's fourth concerto, which isn't often played now-a-days. So with the composer-pianist represented in both capacities in the two works making up the selections, it was a Paderewski program. And that is just what the eager listeners came to hear.

The symphony is a work of colossal proportions and expresses broadly the patriotism of his countrymen outlined in themes which, though characteristic of musical Poland, contain but few melodies developed to a finale. Pictures and moods, rather than tunes, are wrought in splendid musical colorings, and throughout the work the composer has been able to suggest the atmosphere of unrest and melancholy fitfully varied by more joyous moments brief and flitting.

There is no claim made of special tone pictures in the first two movements. The final movement is a symphonic poem showing the transitions from grave to gay among the discordant elements of the nation, the conflicts, civic and upon the battlefield, the despair at defeat, the dirge for the heroes slain and the reawakening of hope founded upon the chivalric deeds of the past.

The first part opens with wailing phrases on the lower strings, the first violins entering as the orchestration grows bolder, after which the woodwinds are given a new theme, mainly legato. Fuller orchestration, still of a restless character, leads up to the first fortissimo passages which introduces a martial air, followed by a quiet episode—muted strings. After a brief outburst on the organ the termination is very abrupt.

The beginning of the second movement is in the same vein as the first, cellos and double basses being prominent in the figure. Then the fortissimo work develops into heavier passages than those of the first movement, the contrasts are similar in type, yet varied skilfully in newer instrumental combinations, and the finale is about as sudden as the previous one.

The martial trend of the last movement is unmistakably stirring, from the introductory trumpet calls and drum beats, through the rush of weaving measures by all the strings and the crashing and thunder-claps of the instruments of percussion, the tonitruone and sarrusophones and others. The little interruptions by the tremolo on the violins carry out cleverly the idea of uncertainty, despite apparent confidence, and the turmoil of the battle music, perhaps, is made the more impressive by this association.

Midst war's alarums come the supplementary moments of gloom, the dirge, bitter recollections and lamentations made vivid by the background of accompaniments in a minor key. Hope returns, songs of rejoicing are heard, and in vivacious and merry mood the symphony comes to a close.

The work is very long, about one hour and a quarter, and with the fourth movement added will be of sufficient length to make up a whole program. Paderewski has not only used the regular instruments of the orchestra, but he has employed some new ones in producing big effects. The orchestration is, of course, very elaborate and complicated. He is very liberal in using chromatics, the undulations running through most of the three parts in some form or other. It is a work of such magnitude that a single hearing is insufficient for judging of all its beauty in detail, merely a general summing up seems possible now. But the dignified and scholarly nature of the symphony guarantees it an interest even to those who cannot fully appreciate the welcome addition to musical literature.

The interpretation evidently was satisfactory to the composer, who expressed to Mr Fiedler his pleasure at the performance under his direction. The audience was quite enthusiastic and Paderewski was obliged to make his peculiar bowing acknowledgements several times before the applause was stilled.

The C minor concerto by Saint-Saens was played by Paderewski with a dash, velocity and vigor which was fairly dazzling. The big chord passages in the first part were like miniature thunder peals, the brilliant second movement seemed like a shower of musical gems so fleet, accurate and crisp was the fingering. And the finale of the concerto, not the program, was another display of pianistic pyrotechnics that started applauce before the wonderful musician ceased to play. And then came more plaudits and the wished-for addition to the concert number. Mr Fiedler led his men through this whir of notes with becoming enthusiasm.

The orchestra will be away this week. Elgar's first symphony will be given at the next concert.

Pension Fund Concert.

The pension fund of the Boston symphony orchestra will have its second benefit concert of the year Sunday evening, Feb 28. The orchestra has secured as soloist Dr Ludwig Wullner, whose song recitals have been a sensational feature of the present musical season. Before Dr Wullner became a reciter of songs, he was an actor, for 10 years the leading man of the famous Meiningen company of players, and it is said that his recitations are as dramatically impressive as his singing of songs.

At the pension fund concert he will recite the "Hexenlied," to Schilling's orchestral setting. This is a species of "cantillation," which he has given in New York with much success. Mr Fiedler plans also to repeat Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," which was one of the successes of the current season.

Tickets for the concert will go on sale Friday, Feb 19.

At the Symphony Concert.

Infantry Hall was thronged Tuesday night at the last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the gathering were noted Mr. William R. Weeden, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Mr. Howard K. Hoppin, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. William Binney, Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. Erling Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Robert W. Taft, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Crosby, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Anna Ellis Dexter, Boston; Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. John G. Aldrich, Mrs. Albert W. Clafin, Miss Louise Clafin, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Maine, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Barnwell, Miss June Rockwell, Mr. W. F. Dempster, Miss Dempster, Mrs. Frank Simmons, Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mrs. Mrs. E. Lindsey Cummings, Mr. Percy Middleton, Mrs. [illegible] Smith, Master Norman Smith, Fred W. Allen, Master Richmond Allen, Mr. John Foster, Mrs. John B. Billinghast, Miss Bertha Buffinton, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Miss Carolyn Hall, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. Frederic N. Luther, Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] Hunt, Miss Fanny Hunt, Miss [illegible] Dwight, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Albert M. Bibb, Mrs. Henry Hunt Clark, Mrs. Gilbert Johnson, Miss Ada Johnson, Miss Gertrude Swarts, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott Clarke, Mrs. Frederick W. Hartwell, Mrs. Hartwell, Mrs. Albert K. Potter, Mrs. Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Miss Barstow, Mrs. Rathbone Gardner, Mr. Henry B. Gardner, Mrs. Albert W. Bibb, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Miss Edith Nichols, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. James Lister Miss Carolyn L. Peck, Miss Caroline Eddy, Mrs. Stella A. Wheeler, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss M. Helen Perry, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mrs. I. Gilbert Ladd, Mrs. William Hughes, Miss Elizabeth Hughes, Mrs. Joshua M. Ashman, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Weeden, Mr. Edward Aborn Greene, Miss Sarah P. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, the Misses Sherman, the Misses Vaughan,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next Boston symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 16. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest; in fact, it may fairly be called sensational, for it will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced, Washington will hear Paderewski's Symphony at this concert for the first time. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904, and was finished only last December, has not yet been published. Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score, and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form, the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and, as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish revolution of 1868-34.

Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in G minor, No. 4.

[173]

SUNDAY HERALD

ction (24 Pages)—Editorial, Financial, Women's and Society Section and Boys and Girls—Special Pictorial and Magazine Section——54 PAGES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1909.

PADEREWSKI LAUDS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Eminent Pianist Calls the Symphony Organization "Finest in the World."

ALSO PRAISES AUDIENCE OF MUSIC LOVERS HERE

Had Always Purposed to Have His Symphony Produced in This City.

That institution of which Boston people are so proud, the Boston Symphony orchestra, received from Ignace Paderewski yesterday afternoon the finest tribute of them all—"it is without doubt the best orchestra in the world."

The greatest pianist of the present day declared that from the moment he had first begun work on his symphony, he had determined it should have its introduction to the world through the Boston Symphony orchestra. He added simply, "I never considered any other."

Paderewski was good enough to accompany this remark with some pleasant words about the people who attend concerts in this city. "I wanted not only your orchestra," he said, "but that other requisite, an intelligent and appreciative audience, and I knew from past experience that I was sure to find it in Boston. Nowhere in Europe do you find superior audiences."

Perhaps Paderewski was most impressive when he went on to remark that he was quite willing to let his selection of Boston to hear the first production of his symphony stand as the profoundest expression of his attitude on music in America. When it was suggested to him that if it had not been for Russian restrictions possibly Warsaw might have been given that honor, he smiled, shook his head and said again that he had always planned to have his symphony produced by the best orchestra in the world.

"I have long been of the opinion," he continued with emphasis, "that the Boston Symphony orchestra was superior to all others."

Expressed Himself Directly.

It isn't often that Paderewski has anything to say for publication, especially anything which may be used for comparisons. But in his apartments at the Touraine, yesterday afternoon, he expressed himself with such simple directness and dignity as to leave a charming memory of his sincerity. While he talked he sat at his piano and, from time to time, when there came a pause in the search for the precise statement, his fingers sought the piano keys as naturally as another man would make a gesture.

Paderewski had been practising when the interruption occurred, but he minded that circumstance not at all. He shook hands warmly and drew up an extra chair and took his seat at the piano again. He inquired if he should keep on playing. Then he suddenly remembered some later engagements and, with his beard half-raised, he wheeled around to talk—a sturdy figure of a man, broad-shouldered, thick-chested, vigorous in his movements, vigorous in his speech. [illegible] Paderewski now, but he has lost no part of that mass of tawny hair which, with his powerful frame, make him at first glance look more like one of the old Northmen than the foremost pianist of the world. And the delicacy of line in this master's face which serves to make the second impression is, after all, the delicacy of lines in a strong man's face.

"It is not embarrassing in the least to tell you why I have planned to have my symphony performed for the first time here in Boston," he said in English. "It is quite simple, the answer to that question. I never thought of any other city or any other orchestra than yours. Not for one moment have I considered any other. I wanted my symphony introduced to the world by the best orchestra in the world. And the Boston Symphony orchestra is without doubt the best orchestra in the world.

"There you have one reason. Let me give you another." Now, Paderewski leaned forward, smiling most affably. "I wanted your audience of Boston to hear my symphony first. I wanted not only your orchestra, but that other requisite an intelligent and appreciative audience. I made my first visit to this city in 1892 if I remember correctly. I formed then a favorable opinion of your people who come to hear music. That opinion has only been strengthened by my subsequent visits."

"But Never the Violins."

"The other great orchestras and audiences in the world—oh, yes, I know them very well. One must not omit to mention those at Berlin and Vienna. But I do not say their players are as fine in every respect as the Boston Symphony orchestra. Sometimes in the orchestras of this or that city of Europe you will hear some instruments a little better, but never the violins—never the violins! But the European orchestras must not be compared with the remarkable institution which you have here in Boston.

"And you have orchestras in America elsewhere," continued Paderewski. "And you also have audiences. I suppose for Boston I have an especial fondness. But in New York and Pittsburg and Chicago there are great orchestras, and the people who come to hear music are cultured and appreciative and they understand quite as well as the people in Europe who come to hear music. There is no difference. I have played before them all, and I have observed none. Perhaps the audience in Italy is more demonstrative, but you find, when you go there and note observantly, that the enthusiasm is like the flame of a match—it goes out quickly."

(Continued on Page Five, Column 3.)

PADEREWSKI LAUDS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

(Continued from Page One, Column 1.)

"One must understand of America that for the last 30 or 40 years especially, all efforts have been concentrated on the accumulation of the material resources. It is the same in any new country; it is the same everywhere, that devotion to art cannot happen until the material needs have first been satisfied. Afterward comes—well, what is now coming in America.

"Music takes a little longer time than some of the other arts. The development of music must have at least a generation for its basis. Music is at one extreme; architecture, for example, is at another. You may get beautiful buildings easily in one generation. Was it not Mr. White who in a few years gave America many most beautiful buildings, whose influence is everywhere seen as you travel through the country?

Praise for Maj. Higginson.

"Now, thanks to such men as Maj. Higginson, the influence of music is steadily spreading, and as in this locality, its standard matches any standard in Europe. Such a wonderful man is Mr. Higginson. I think of all your munificent givers—and you have so many of them in this rich country—he deserves a little place of his own.

"One may note what Mr. Carnegie has done for the libraries and other institutions for the advancement of the arts, what Mr. Rockefeller has done for the Chicago University—the millions he has given that university for education—what others in America have done generously in promoting the arts. It has no parallel on the other side of the ocean. Perfectly wonderful is the amount of individual benefactions—of the individual initiative, as I may call it. In Europe it is the state which must come to the support of institutions which individuals support here. One must go back to the period of the renaissance to find a parallel to the conditions in America—back to those days when, through the patronage of the rich princes, Italy was enabled to get its marvellous paintings."

And so Paderewski went on saying pleasant things about America, Boston in particular, differing markedly at every step from the tenors and sopranos and impressarios who have lately been giving their impressions. The flow of compliments did not come uninterruptedly, for the pianist was in a thoughtful mood and he wished to be precise. But there was no restraint about his attitude. "It is not embarrassing for me to give you my views," he had said. "But there is so much to say!" Unfortunately the clock hands were moving all the time, and he had other engagements.

Deep in the second reference to his symphony, he looked up and chanced to catch the warning eye of his secretary and he paused, with an apologetic reference to those other engagements. Then there had been another pause, quite different in character, which came in the middle of a little description of his music.

Finale Deals with Revolution.

"The last theme, the finale," he was saying, "deals with the revolution in my country—with the last revolution. That was 40 years ago, and my father and my brother—I can remember it all quite easily. Perhaps some time ago it would never have done to attempt to present my theme, to revive mention in Poland of those circumstances of the revolution. But the constitution has permitted greater liberty, and so there's no objection now."

Instinctively the hands reached for the piano keys again. But before they could strike a note their owner drew them away and passed them over his face, a little heavily. Then he raised his head firmly and smiled. "The symphony will be produced," he said, "10 times by the Boston orchestra, twice in New York, in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago and probably in Minneapolis. Afterwards I shall go to London, Paris, Berlin and then to Warsaw."

Paderewski rose from the piano, deprecating his regret that he could not permit himself to talk longer. "There is always work to do," he murmured. He shook hands warmly. And those fingers which travel along the keys of a piano so delicately gave such a crunching grip as one of its possessor's ancestors, in the days of the Polish conquest, might have given.

A moment later, through the transom, came the ripple of melody such as only this man can make.

* * *

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening of next week. This concert will be of extraordinary interest, for it will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. Philadelphia will for the first time hear Paderewski's Symphony at this concert. This symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C Minor, No. 4. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia during his present tour.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

sonality.

* * *

The next Boston Symphony concert, which will be the fourth of the series, will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 15. This concert will be one of extraordinary interest, for it will present Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist. As already announced Philadelphia will hear Paderewski's Symphony at this concert for the first time. This Symphony, which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published, Mr. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The Symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem in itself, and, as already described in these columns, this last movement is peculiarly a memorial to the Polish Revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will also be the soloist, and his plan is now to play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4. This is announced to be his only appearance in Philadelphia during his present tour.

* * *

PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED

Given for the First Time at Fifteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

THEME IS POLAND'S NATIONAL AMBITION

Work Is Long; First Movement the Strongest and Most Imaginative.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 15th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Paderewski was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B minor, op. 24.....Paderewski
Concerto in C minor, No. 4, op. 44...Saint-Saens

The symphony was played for the first time. Mr. Paderewski made sketches for it in the summer of 1904, and he completed the three movements last December. It is his purpose to add a scherzo. He wrote one, but was not wholly satisfied with it.

The three movements, with the pauses included, consumed an hour and nearly 10 minutes in performance. It is easy to say that the symphony is long, too long. This remark is to be expected; it is inevitable; but the music is not to be dismissed jauntily with this reproach. There are some who do not find it too long. Length is not necessarily fatal to a work of art. The "Odyssey," "Don Quixote," "Tom Jones," might thus be branded and condemned. It all depends on what the man has to say. It is true, as Poe insisted, that an epic poem is not inherently great by reason of its length or because it is an epic. It is also true that a sonnet is not a masterpiece simply because it has only 14 lines.

This symphony consists of a first movement, which, we are told, "seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past"; an andante, which is an expression of the lyrical character of the composer's race; a finale which is a symphonic poem with a program that is based on the Polish revolution of 1863-64. This finale might be played as a work complete in itself. The symphony might bear the title "Poland."

Compositions that are deliberately patriotic often show more patriotism than musical inspiration. The "Finlandia" of Sibelius, for example, is not only inferior to the same composer's first symphony; it does not give to the hearer the same intense expression of the racial and natural characteristics of Finland. Yet this symphony of Sibelius is absolute music, and there is no hint of any program.

Mr. Paderewski's love of Poland is known to all. To him patriotism is a religion. No one would question for a moment the sincerity of his passionate devotion. No one, speaking of it or thinking of it, would call to mind the weak poseur in the bitter novel of Cherbuliez. In his symphony the first movement, which is rigidly symphonic and without a table of contents, is the strongest of the three, and to any hearer of imagination, who has been told that the music portrays the heroic past of the composer's country, this movement is the most imaginative and the one charged with suggestion. In the finale, or the symphonic poem, the hearer is told expressly what he should expect to hear: The unrest of those longing for independence, older heads counselling patience, the summons to war, battle music, a dirge for the fallen, the anticipation of happier years to come, for Poland is not dead. Yet this movement as a whole does not rivet the attention; nor is it so impressive in descriptive detail as is the first movement for which the hearer has no guide book.

The symphony begins with a long introduction, a dangerously long introduction, for the sad and sombre mood is maintained at so great length that the character of the main body of the movement seems not to be firmly established for some time. A second hearing of the symphony shows that this apparent lack of proportion is only apparent. It is as though a narrator mourning the loss of national liberty and lamenting with reiterated lamentations the past glories, harping on sorrow the more poignant by reason of the contrast, at last warms with the thought of the glorious years, and tells as a rhapsodist a tale of chivalry and splendor. This tale is interrupted by the thought of present woes, but again the narrator finds comfort in the recollection of the proud past.

The introduction, which is of a singularly original nature, establishes a mood which is not equalled in the finale. The themes of the first movement do not have, perhaps, a striking profile, but the motive that may be reasonably characterized as the theme of chivalry is finely exposed and admirably used in development. In his thematic treatment as in his conception of form and general structure, Mr. Paderewski may be described as academic, but I do not use this word in its obnoxious sense. While his musical expression is modern, it is not ultra-modern. As far as he is concerned, there has been no harmonic advance since Wagner.

Observe, too, how scrupulous Mr. Paderewski is in the matter of development. There are pages where his anxiety to develop in every way a theme, to exhaust its possibilities, leads him to repetitions that have little or no significance. Fragments of themes are used until they annoy or weary. In one or two instances a fine effect is thus frittered away. But this first movement as a whole impresses by its solid structure, the nobility of the general design, the high purpose that animates and vitalizes. The ornamentation is solid rather than designedly brilliant. The instrumentation is not always fortunate. There is a passage at the beginning of the main body of the movement for double basses and 'cello that does not come out, and this is true of a few other passages later in the work, as in a curious use of muted violins, where what should be a faint but dismal cry is almost inaudible.

This movement was played with great spirit and marked effect, but the second movement suffered somewhat from a lack of poetic sentiment in the interpretation. The performance was not sufficiently elastic. The melodic thought was not sung with the requisite freedom. The music itself has lyric charm. It should be played with the spontaneity of an improvisation. The music is romantic. It should be interpreted as Mr. Paderewski himself plays Chopin.

The finale is descriptive in its nature. It begins with a restlessness that is full of bodement; music of agitation and revolt. This section is more successfully imagined than that which portrays the actual conflict. The battle music is conventional; but after the heroes have fallen and their cause is lost the composer rises to a tragic height in mourning their lot. Here he is simple and eloquent. The funeral march that follows has not the same intensity. The close is in the manner of an apotheosis with the reappearance of the chivalric motive. The interest of the finale is not always maintained. The movement is laid out on a great scale, and the detail is at times verbose and uninteresting. These disturbing passages could easily cut out. There would then be impression of more logical continui and the many fine passages would sta out in bolder relief.

It may be added for the sake of the record that in the finale Mr. Paderewski uses, or rather hints at, a national song the burden of which is "Poland is not dead." He employs in his orchestra three sarrusophones and an instrument of his own invention, the "tonitruone," which is modelled after the thunder machine of the theatre.

The audience called out the composer and the conductor many times.

The Symphony, whatever may be said of its fine qualities and its imperfections, is a work that is characteristic of the composer. His own nature is in the nobler pages, which reveal breadth of view, lofty aspirations, virility that includes tenderness, enthusiasm for the highest ideals.

It was a pleasure to hear Saint-Saens concerto, which had not been performe at a Symphony concert since 189 played as Mr. Paderewski plays it.

[174]

PADEREWSKI AT PIANO, SKETCHED BY BOSTON HERALD ARTIST

This Shows Great Pianist While Being Interviewed at His Hotel Yesterday by a Boston Herald Reporter.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK

An Excellent Performance, a Cordial Reception and Diversely-Minded Reviewers —The Concerts of Yesterday—Miss Goodson, the Pianist, Reappears and Miss Tufts Plays for the First Time Publicly —Mme. Kalich's New Play of Western Politics—A Striking Little Piece for Keith's—A Play by Henry James in London—Mr. Thomas Writes a New Comedy —The Perseverence of Miss Cavalieri— Other Musical News

Mr. Paderewski's symphony was played for the first time in New York last night —for the fifth repetition of it in almost as many days by the Boston Orchestra. "The audience was very cordial," says the Sun, "and called out the composer after each movement." With one accord, too, the reviewers praise the performance. "The symphony was superbly played," to quote the Sun again, "and Mr. Fiedler conducted with splendid authority." For the music itself, as the reviewers heard and judged it, there are many men of many minds. The reviewer of the Sun, for example, "is inclined to feel that the external descriptive power of music is utilized rather than its emotional expressiveness to create the desired mood in the listener. Once acquainted with the programme of the work we can sit back and watch its incidents pass before us in a wonderful procession.

"But we are spectators rather than participators in the thought and feeling of the action. The sketch is easily followed. We can see the old shaking their doubtful heads. We can see the young waving their athletic arms. We can hear the mournful Poles singing their melancholy songs, and we wonder that they do not in sheer despair break into the mad dance of their oppressors which we have so often heard in the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Perhaps this will come in the yet unwritten fourth movement. The story of the long third movement is read without doubt. But it is all delineative and descriptive. It is pictorial, brilliant, intellectual, magnificent in instrumental technic and dazzling in mass effects. But nevertheless the hearer after this first performance wonders if less parade of combinations, less complexity of style, a simpler and more direct melodic idiom and a more compact design would not have accomplished something more in the direction of bringing the heart into throbbing sympathy with down-trodden Poland."

The reviewer in the Sun is likewise disposed to find the symphony a "tone-poem" in symphonic form rather than a symphony in the classic sense: "One thing stood forth quite clearly, and that was that the so-called symphony was not to be accepted as a symphony in the old sense of that term. . . . What Mr. Paderewski has written is an orchestral delineation in three sections. It is a tone-poem in cantos. Its themes are melodically vague, for the plain reason that they are bare outlines of melodic forms planned to admit of the broadest freedom of color within their liberal limits. The composer has aimed at the evolution of his ideas through the media of the contemporaneous orchestral pallette, not by means of the classic processes of thematic development. He asks much of his hearer. The auditor who sets out to grasp the scheme of this work must be ready to seize upon a few elusive melodic fragments which are woven into an iridescent web of instrumentation. Shape is indicated rather by color contrast than by line and curve. It is all intensely modern and sometimes exasperatingly intangible."

Mr. Krehbiel in the Tribune refers his readers to the despatch that he sent from Boston where he heard the symphony last Friday. In the course of it he said: "Nine-tenths of Mr. Paderewski's music is expression after mood. It is freighted with melancholy. It tells of a great corroding longing, vain effort, and hope which never shines resplendent, but appears ever at the end as only a flickering light. . . . Structurally Mr. Paderewski has paid deference to approved symphonic forms in his first two movements, and exercised the utmost freedom in his last, which has the dimensions and the outlines of a symphonic poem. In it he has hewn to the lines of historical incident. . . . The impression made by the music is not so easily described. Mr. Paderewski has invented some pregnant themes, but they are not strikingly novel, and his treatment of them makes them sound scant of breath. There is an excessive amount of iteration of short motivi borrowed from the themes in the working out of the climaxes. His fabric is polyphonic, and the singing voices are heard always, but much of the music is monochromatic. Portions of it might be improved by reorchestration, but there is much color in the score, and some of its effects are both brilliant and original. For the sake of its general effectiveness as a symphonic composition it might be wished that Mr. Paderewski had been less filled with patriotic emotion and a little less sincere. A strange wish this, perhaps, and one that the composer is too honest to sympathize with, but had he been willing to sacrifice truthfulness of delineation to musical effectiveness there would have been less gloom and more pride and consciousness of national strength in the mood of the symphony, and consequently more variety of expression."

As yet Mr. Fiedler has not arranged the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week beyond Elgar's new symphony, which will begin it, and which is fifty minutes long. In all probability a piece for violoncello and orchestra with Mr. Warnke as the 'cellist, will be one of the other numbers.

Some of those that in these days are saying much of Dr. Muck and blaming this one and that one for inability to bring him back to the Symphony Orchestra, might wisely bear in mind that he has long-standing and explicit engagements in Berlin, which he is bound to place before all other obligations, desires or hopes.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SPE

FEB 7 - 1909

on.

The Paderewski Symphony.

When Paderewski arrived from England, says the New York Evening Post, he brought with him the long-expected and eagerly-awaited symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it impossible to devote time to it until last summer, and the final copies of the parts were only made last month. "The symphony is a work of monumental character," writes W. E. Walter of Boston. "It was inspired by the 40th anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64 and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about 1¼ hours in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself and for this the composer has made a definite program treating of the revolution which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred. A full modern orchestra is used and in addition to the instruments found in such a band, Mr Paderewski has added three sarrusophones—an instrument which is a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitrone and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder." The first performance of this symphony will be by the Boston symphony orchestra under Mr Fiedler in Symphony hall, Boston, at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, February 12. The first performance in New York will be given by the Boston symphony orchestra in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, February 18.

PADEREWSKI COMING WITH THE SYMPHONY

Pianist Will Present His Composition at Concert This Week.

The next Boston Symphony concert which will be the fourth of the series will be given in the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 16. This concert will be one of great interest as it will bring to Washington Ignace Paderewski, both as a composer and as a pianist.

Washington will hear Paderewski's symphony at this concert for the first time. The symphony which was begun in the summer of 1904 and was finished only last December, has not yet been published. Paderewski having brought the manuscript score and parts when he came to America ten days ago. The symphony is in three movements, the first of which follows generally the traditional classical form; the second is a slow movement, and the third a symphonic poem, a memorial to the Polish revolution of 1863-64.

Paderewski will also be the soloist and will play the Saint-Saens concerto in C-Minor, No. 4.

[175]

BOSTON PO

FEBRUARY 20,

BLAMES IT UPON WOM

Symphony Player quarre Tells W He Fled

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 19— was I to do? She came to pleaded. What else could I do

Daniel Maquarre, who eloped Boston with Mrs. Clement Le of a friend who was a fellow the Boston Symphony Orchestr told why they had fled from B gether, putting the blame for th on the shoulders of the woman left her husband to go West

LEFT GOOD POSITI

Maquarre said today that he h up a position paying him $2400 a flee with Mrs. Lenom. He wa player in the Symphony Orches a teacher of flute playing at the Conservatory of Music.

But he gave it all up, he says cause Mrs. Lenom begged him to away from her husband.

When Maquarre and Mrs. Lenom here seven weeks ago they rent flat at 943 Fillmore avenue, usi front part as a millinery store and in the rear.

Maquarre began to look about the musical world to get engagements Mrs. Lenom bought 40 hat fra quantity of silk and satin and and began to display French that was so chic and Frenchy soon attracted a numerous

They were seemingly the couple in the city when the bl upon them. They are now in cells at the City Prison and flat is darkened, while their stock has been sold.

"She could not live with her said Maquarre when interviewed "He was cruel to her and I but our relations were honorable she came to me and pleaded, could I do? I have given up I possessed for her and I am that we were ever found."

Mrs. Lenom was less comm She shrugged her shoulders Parisian style when asked to tal had left her husband, and said nothing to say.

"My husband is in Boston here, but if all were known, I be censured," was her only reply tions.

Maquarre, although 28, wh Lenom is 10 years his senior, seemingly madly in love with h attractive, dark and vivacious, no English. She comes from th France, while Maquarre is a

ON POST
RY 20, 1909

MES
UPON WOMAN

ony Player Mae Tells Why
He Fled

NCISCO, Feb. 19.—"What
She came to me and at else could I do?"
quarre, who eloped from Mrs. Clement Lenom, wife who was a fellow-player in ymphony Orchestra, today had fled from Boston to-the blame for their flight ers of the woman who had nd to go West with him.

GOOD POSITION

id today that he had given paying him $2400 a year to Lenom. He was a flute Symphony Orchestra and lute playing at the Boston of Music.
it all up, he says, beom begged him to take her husband.
rre and Mrs. Lenom came eeks ago they rented a lmore avenue, using the millinery store and living an to look about the local to get engagements, while ought 40 hat frames a and satin and 100 plumes display French millinery ic and Frenchy that she a numerous clintele.

seemingly the happiest
ity when the law pounced ey are now in adjoining ty Prison and the little ed, while the millinery sold.
t live with her husband,"
when interviewed today.
to her and I loved her, s were honorable. Then e and pleaded, so what have given up everything her and I am only sorry ver found."
was less communicative.
her shoulders in true hen asked to tell why she sband, and said she had

is in Boston and I am were known, I should as as her only reply to qui-though 28, while Mr.

ars his senior, has been in love with her. She is and vivacious, but speaks comes from the north of Jaquarre is a Belgian.

OMING MPHONY

s Composi-
This

hony concert of the series nal Theater ry 16. This reat interest gton Ignace poser and pa

Paderewski's for the first n was begun was finished ot yet been ing brought parts when rs ago, the ements, the nerally the the second the third a l to the Po-

the soloist
ns concerto

THE SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN:

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24,

The third and last of the series of concerts at Court Square theater by the Boston symphony orchestra took place last evening, and like the others was heard by a large and intensely interested audience. If there was a slight falling off in numbers, it is perhaps to be ascribed partly to the circumstance that Springfield had already had its Mendelssohn centennial exercises; the commemorative program last evening may have seemed to a good many people like a needless repetition. But while Mr Fiedler, who is so far from being an unbending autocrat that he actually likes to give people, if possible, exactly what they want, would doubtless have put on a different program here if he had understood the circumstances,—it was a beautiful concert and could well stand on its own merits quite apart from any question of observing a centenary. The only change that would have occurred to most of those present as desirable is the substitution of some other symphony for the "Scotch," which happens to have had already its full share of performances.

The first half of the program was given to Mendelssohn, and the representation of his genius could hardly have been bettered in the space allotted. First came the suave and lovely "Hebrides" overture, with its soft gurgle of lapping waves and its picturesque romance. There followed, for a swift brilliant interlude, that magical scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, in which Mendelssohn fairly emulates Shakespeare in vividness of fancy and lightness of touch. And to conclude, there was the ever-popular Scotch symphony, a work so charming in its details and so agreeable to the ear that one regrets even to mention its faults. The cardinal fault, of course, is thinness; it is in the symphonic form that one most feels Mendelssohn's lack of weight, his too easy contentment with the agreeable second-best, his facility in clever filling out, and his failure to find the inevitable concentrated phrase. There is genius in the work, and at its best it is lovely. The lamentful Mendelssohnian minor, illustrated in certain phrases of the first movement, has lost its romantic charm to ears that have learned more poignant and mournful strains. The suave andante leaves some hearers impatient, and the finale has its weak moments. Yet how well it all sounds; how resonant and brilliant are the instruments, how piquant and sparkling the Scotch dance of the scherzo, how refined in taste and elegant in execution every detail of the work! It is a merit that Mendelssohn carried over from the classical age, that was already passing when he appeared upon the scene. Something of the poetry of the dawning renascence of romanticism he caught, but its excesses were abhorrent to his lucid spirit, and he never entertained the romantic predilection for the obscure, the mysterious, the unutterable. As a symphonist it was his misfortune to come a little too late to vie with Mozart in terms of absolute formal beauty, and a little too early for the passionate symphonic poem. He followed Beethoven, and perhaps he felt that after Beethoven there was room only for a slighter sort of symphony, more pictorial in character, enriched with local color, yet retaining the old formula. The result is not so successful as in the case of the overture; the substance is not weighty enough for the pattern. And yet with all their lacks, this symphony and the "Italian" are lovely works, and assured of a long life. There are few symphonies more agreeable in spirit and coloring, and they bring out beautifully the tone of the orchestra.

The performance last night was of admirable quality. Lovely indeed was the rich, warm tone of the strings in the andante, and the contrasting color of the wood choir. Mr Fiedler conducted the movement beautifully, and the performance was notable for smoothness, purity of intonation and perfection of taste. The orchestra sounded uncommonly brilliant in the jigging scherzo, and in the sumptuous "Midsummer Night's Dream" scherzo, in which the violins and the flutes were rivals in virtuosity. Sumptuous, too, was the performance of the "Fingal's Cave" overture, the allegro of which Dr Fiedler took more rapidly than Mr Gericke. The second part of the program included, to close, the tremendous prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and before that an extremely clever and original new work by Paul Scheinpflug, a young German composer, whose name has hardly been heard in this country. This work, his opus 15, was lately produced in Boston by Mr Fiedler, and was given a cordial reception. It is called "An Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," and makes use of a 16th century English melody. He has not named the play; "The Merry Wives of Windsor" has been suggested, but no annotator has yet labeled the themes. It is a gay, ingenious and taking work, and it may well find a permanent place in the orchestral repertory. It was brilliantly played, and Mr Fiedler gave a large and noble rendering of the "Tristan" music. To many, this is the supreme art-work of the 19th century, the highest esthetic achievement of the modern world. It is certainly a concentrated summing up of the modern spirit—it throws the cheerful grace of Mendelssohn back into a remote past. The climax in Mr Fiedler's hands was thrilling—it is remarkable that he has never been an operatic conductor; there are certain qualities in his style that suggest the theater rather than the concert hall.

The soloist last evening was Mme Caroline Gardner Clarke-Bartlett, the well-known dramatic soprano of Boston, who made on this occasion her eighth appearance with the orchestra. It may be noted incidentally that she was one of the principal soloists at the Chapman-Alexander meetings in Boston, singing at the services held in the Park-street church, where she is soloist. She is a pupil of Mme Joachim and of other eminent teachers, and has long enjoyed a reputation as a concert and oratorio singer. She is well known in Springfield, but this was her first appearance here with orchestra, and she was given a cordial welcome. She sang the famous cavatina from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." "Plus grand dans son obscurite," with ease, breadth and dignity, and the audience was reluctant to let her off without an encore number. Throughout the concert there was the same enthusiasm which has characterized previous concerts this season, and there is reason to hope om .....

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

dress .....
te .....

MUSICAL NOTES.

Paderewski's New Symphony and Local News.

Paderewski, who arrived in New York Tuesday, Jan. 26th, brought with him the score of his symphony which has been looked forward to with eager interest for the last two years. It is his first work in this form. The themes of the first movement were sketched out in the summer of 1904 and the three movements were sketched out in the summer of 1904 and the three movements which now compose the work were finally finished and the parts copied in 1908. The symphony is in B-minor and it is Opus No. 24. The first movement is marked "Adagio Masstoso: Allegro con fuoco;" the second, "Andante con moto," and the third "Allegro vivace."

The first performances of the symphony anywhere are to be given in Boston on Friday afternoon, Feb. 12, and Saturday evening, Feb. 13. The following week it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Later in the season it is to be played in Chicago by the Chicago Orchestra, and in St. Paul by the St. Paul Orchestra, and in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra.

The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country, directly inspired by the 40th anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although radical in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Paderewski has followed a sharply-defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is peculiarly a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64.

In the opening of the movement one feels the spirit of social and political unrest which fill the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hotheads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counsel patience and caution, urge the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national anthem, from which all buoyancy and joyousnss have been taken, which is treated not unlike a dirge, appearing in a subdued and sad mood.

The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint distant trumpet calls—the summons to war.

Light-hearted, gay and confident the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which with their dark, heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet as the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet as the conflict progresses it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are as shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher, the laments for the Fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written.

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement which will be a scherzo.

The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tondtruone and the usual strings.

The sarrusophone which Paderewski uses in all three movements of his symphony is a comparatively new instrument, which is now used in an orchestra for the first time. It is a brass reed instrument, distantly related to the saxophone, and its quality of tone lies between that of the bassoon and the trombone. The tondtruone is an instrument of percussion which Paderewski himself invented. It gives the feeling of far distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the great drum.

PUBLICAN.

ess SPRIN

FEB 7 1909

The third and last Boston symphony concert of the season will be given in the Court Square theater on Tuesday evening, the 23d. For this concert the orchestra will make a special journey to Springfield from Boston returning the same night. The success of the two other concerts this year has been most gratifying to all interested in the welfare of the orchestra and there seems to be every reason to believe that another splendid audience will greet Mr Fiedler on his last appearance here. In fact, the success has been such that G. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is making quite elaborate plans for the concerts next year and it may be taken for granted that the orchestra in the future will give three concerts in Springfield every season. Full details regarding the concert and soloist will be announced in a few days.

FEB 6 - 1909

Paderewski Says The Boston Orchestra Is Leader

MR. IGNACE JAN PADEREWSKI, Polish pianist and composer, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, of the North German Lloyd line, to make a short American tour under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis. He will make his first appearance in this country this season in Boston, Feb. 12, coming to New York on Feb. 18.

"It is more as a composer than as a pianist that I come to America this time," said Mr. Paderewski yesterday. "I have just finished the symphony which is going to be produced by the Boston Symphony orchestra—it is a sort of symphonic poem— and that is mainly what has brought me over here I shall not play in many concerts, not more than 30 or 35, at most, and those mostly with the Boston Symphony orcestra or other similar organizations.

"Since I was here last year I have played at a few concerts in England, but the last five months I have passed at hard work at my place near Lausanne, where, I am delighted to say, many of my American friends visited me last summer.

"I have devoted all my attention of late to the symphony. It is extremely long, and will take more than an hour and a quarter to perform. It took five months to compose it, and I am satisfied.

"It was my ambition to have the symphony produced first over here, and by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Its excellence has been attained by uniformity or direction and conducting, and also by continuous playing together.

"The orchestra in the Conservatoire in Paris is a fine one, but it lacks spirit. Its members, impelled by ultra-republican ideas, resent authority and don't like to work hard. Now that M. Messager is conductor, however, we shall expect great things. The Imperial orchestra in Dresden and the London Symphony orchestra are fine, but the Boston Symphony is the orchestra par excellence."

Mr Paderewski is accompanied by Mme Paderewski, a secretary and a Polish friend, Mr Jentys, who has come over to pay his first visit to the United States.—New York Herald.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N.
FEB 10 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Will Play New Symphony by Paderewski in Brooklyn, February 19.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the new symphony by M. Paderewski at its next concert in Brooklyn on February 19. M. Paderewski will be present and after the symphony is played he will himself play with the orchestra Beethoven's "Fifth Piano Concerto," called "The Emperor."

This will be the first opportunity that Brooklyn will have to hear the new symphony played by an orchestra.

On Thursday afternoon, February 18, Daniel Gregory Mason will give a lecture recital upon the symphony and the concerto. Mr. Mason has been in conference with M. Paderewski in New York, and has learned from him the purposes that he had in writing the symphony and has explained to him the way in which he has expressed the purpose in each of the movements. Mr. Mason will be present in Boston on the 11th and 12th of February, when the symphony will be first played. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, will give it its first production. While in Boston, Mr. Mason will have an opportunity to study the score during the rehearsals. Subscribers to the Philharmonic Concerts will, therefore, be able on Thursday afternoon preceding the concert, to learn in advance the nature of the composition.

Those who attend the concert on February 19 should be present in their seats at a quarter past 8 promptly. The first movement of the symphony requires twenty-five minutes. Persons who are not in their seats at the opening of the concert will not be able to enter the Opera House until after the first movement is played.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 10 190

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the new symphony by M. Paderewski at its next concert in Brooklyn on Feb, 19. M. Paderewski will be present and after the symphony is played he will himself play with the orchestra Beethoven's "Fifth Piano Concerto," called "The Emperor." This will be the first opportunity that Brooklyn will have to hear the new syhphony played by an orchestra. On Thursday afternon, Feb. 18, Daniel Gregory Mason will give a lecture recital upon the symphony and the concerto. Mr. Mason has been in conference with M. Paderewski in New York, and has learned from him the purposes that he had in writing the symphony and has explained to him the way in which he has expressed the purpose in each of the movements. Mr. Mason will be present in Boston on Feb. 11 and 12 when the symphony will be first played. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, will give it its first production. While in Boston Mr. Mason will have an opportunity to study the scores during the rehearsals. Subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts will, therefore, be able on Thursday afternoon preceding the concert, to learn in advance the nature of the composition. Those who attend the concert on Feb. 19 should be present in their seats at 8:15 o'clock promptly. The first movement of the symphony requires twenty-five minutes. Persons who are not in their seats at the opening of the concert will not be able to enter the Opera House until after the first movement is played.

s .....

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 13 1909

PADEREWSKI AT LYRIC

Will Be Star at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, will be the most interesting and most important musical event that Baltimore has had in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as a pianist and as composer, for Baltimore will hear for the first time the great symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month, and its first performances anywhere were in Boston at the Boston symphony concert last Saturday evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the symphony and Saint Saens' concerto in C minor, No. 4, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

Paderewski Symphony.

The Boston Symphony concerts, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, may be considered in a sense a Paderewski festival, for at both of these concerts the new symphony on which the composer-pianist has been working for the last two or three years will be played, and at both concerts Paderewski will be the soloist. On Thursday evening he will play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto in E flat, No. 5. The tonality of the symphony is B minor and the opus number is 24. It is in three movements. The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904, but the three movements were completed and the parts copied in 1908. The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to Poland, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863.

[176]

TO BE SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

PADEREWSKI

Paderewski, the famous pianist, will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city on February 17.

The appearance of Paderewski here will be made notable by the fact that the Orchestra will play his own symphony in B minor. It will be the first time this symphony has ever been heard here.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 13 1909

PADEREWSKI TO PLAY NEW SYMPHONY AT LYRIC CONCERT ON WEDNESDAY EVENING

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, will be the most interesting and most important musical event that Baltimore has had in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as a pianist and as composer, for Baltimore will hear for the first time the symphony on which he has been at work for the last several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month, and its first performances anywhere were in Boston at the Boston Symphony concert last Saturday evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the symphony and Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, which Mr. Paderewski will play. This has long been one of his favorites, and his performances of it have always been exceedingly brilliant.

The symphony is first on the program, and as the first movement plays for 25 minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

ADELPHIA

Paderewski's New Symphony Played

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 12.—Ignace Paderewski's new symphony in B minor received its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Mr. Paderewski was present. The symphony, which requires the services of the entire orchestra and several extra pieces, was favorably received by a large audience. Max Fiedler conducted.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The personality of Mr. Paderewski will dominate the fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday night. His new symphony will be heard here, and he will be the soloist at this concert. The symphony is of extraordinary length, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the programme will include only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto in E flat, which Mr. Paderewski will play. From information furnished by the composer it appears that the tonality of the symphony is B minor, and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements, as follows: First, Adagio Maestoso: Allegro con fuoco; second, Andante con moto; third, Allegro vivace. The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed and the parts copied in December, 1908. The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form, and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem, and is peculiarly a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64. The symphony is complete in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement, which will be a scherzo. Unusual in its instrumentation the work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarionets (one interchangeable with bass clarionet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tamtam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings. The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion, which Mr. Paderewski invented. It gives the feeling of far-distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the bass great drum. Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, which will make the second part of the programme, like Beethoven's violin concerto, stands as a master work of its kind. The symphony is to be first on the programme, and those of the audience not seated when it begins will have a long wait, as the first movement plays for twenty-five minutes, and no one will be admitted during its performance.

om EVENING POST,

ldress New York City.

ite

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20, may be considered in a sense a Paderewski festival, for at both of these concerts the new symphony on which the composer-pianist has been at work for the last two or three years will be played (on Thursday evening for the first time in New York), and at both concerts Paderewski will be the soloist. On Thursday evening he will play the Saint-Saëns concerto in G-Minor No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play the Beethoven concerto in E-Flat No. 5—the "Emperor." Owing to the length of the symphony there will be nothing on the programme except the symphony and the concerto. The symphony is first on the programme and as the first movement plays for twenty-five minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Ignace Paderewski's new symphony in B minor received its first performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, Friday afternoon. Mr. Paderewski was present.

FEB 1

"DIE MEISTERSINGER" AND PADEREWSKI

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, will be the most interesting and most important musical event that Brooklyn has had in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and as composer, for Brooklyn will hear for the first time the symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month, and its first performance anywhere was in Boston, yesterday afternoon, at the public rehearsal for the Boston Symphony concert to-night. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the programme will contain only the Symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor," concerto in E Flat, No. 5, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

Unusual interest attaches to the lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony concert of Friday evening, as Paderewski's new symphony will then be a special object of study. As the concert house was sold out some days ago the lecture recital will allow music lovers who were not fortunate enough to get seats to gain a very good idea of the composition—as far as the piano can show orchestral effects. The lecturer, Daniel Gregory Mason of Manhattan, has conferred with the composer and is now in Boston studying the music first hand at the Boston concerts of the orchestra. The entire programme of Friday's concert will be taken up. This lecture recital, like the others in the series, is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, Mr. Mason being a frequent lecturer before the latter. It will be given on Thursday, at 4 P.M., in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music.

rom NEW YORK HERALD,

ddress New York City.

FEB

NEW PADEREWSKI SYMPHONY.

Boston Goes Hungry Waiting in Line to Buy Tickets for Concert.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Mr. Paderewski, as soloist, and the Symphony Orchestra, playing a new symphony in B minor composed by him, attracted an enormous crowd to Symphony Hall this afternoon. Applicants for tickets arrived as early as half-past seven o'clock in the morning and stood in line for hours. When the tickets were all sold more than six hundred women and men were still in line. To supply the weary waiters caterers appeared with large stocks of sandwiches.

The new composition was so generously applauded as to verify all that has been written of its meaning and the composer's intentions.

Mr. Paderewski himself invented a new instrument used with this score. At the first rehearsal it was found that at last a composer had "stumped" the symphony orchestra. Not a man of them could successfully handle the new instrument. The inventor was summoned in haste and soon everything was well.

The first movements of the symphony follow freely the accepted forms. They prepare the way for the third, which speaks with ample rhetoric of the Polish insurrection of 1863-64, and is less concise than the other sections.

There are impressive passages and much interesting material which is not always done justice by the instrumentation.

Mr. Paderewski played the C minor concerto of Saint-Saëns.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date FEB 1 1909

MUSIC

Paderewski's Symphony Performance in Boston.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, Feb. 12.—Amid scenes of gladsome excitement Paderewski's symphony was performed at a public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here this afternoon. The occasion was the fifteenth afternoon meeting of the orchestra and its patrons and served eloquently to prove the great popularity of the Polish musician. Long before the concert began there was not a seat to be had in any part of Symphony Hall, and would-be purchasers of places not subscribed for gathered in the corridors of the hall as early as 7 o'clock in the morning. Before long the line extended out of the hall far up the street, and hundreds were unable to gain admittance. In the audience were musicians and music lovers from other places, among them Sigismond Stojowski, Ernest Schelling and Alexander Lambert, of New York. Mme. Sembrich, more than two days out on her voyage to Europe, remembered her countryman by sending a wireless message in Polish expressing her hope that the symphony would meet with success.

The programme contained only two numbers—the symphony, which received its first public performance, and the C minor pianoforte concerto by Saint-Saëns, in which Mr. Paderewski played the solo part. The celebration of Lincoln's birthday had charged the atmosphere with patriotic feeling, and this gave peculiar appropriateness to the patriotism which was the insiration of the symphony. Mr. Paderewski by his own confession paid tribute to his native Poland and a memorial of the revolution of 1863-'64. The uprising and its woful outcome receive musical dedication in the final movement, which is frankly programmatic, but there is also a hymning of Poland's heroic period in the first movement and of the musical nature of the Polish people in the second. There are only three movements in the symphony at present, but a fourth movement, which it is to be supposed will body forth the happy side of the Polish nature, since it is to be a scherzo, will be added when Mr. Paderewski takes the symphony in hand again. The work was promised when the composer was last in America. The fact that it is still unfinished is evidence of the serious manner in which he has devoted himself to his self-imposed, but highly honorable, task.

Nine-tenths of Mr. Paderewski's music is expression after mood. It is freighted with melancholy. It tells of a great corroding longing, vain effort, and hope which never shines resplendent, but appears ever at the end as only a flickering light. In the last movement the voice of the people striving to throw off the yoke of oppression finds expression in the frequent occurrence of a suggestion of the Polish national hymn, "Jeszze Polska nie zgineta" ("Poland is not yet lost"), but the suggestion remains only a suggestion. The device has been used by other composers in treating patriotic or political themes—by Litolff in his "Robespierre" overture, by Tschaikowsky in his "1812"—but generally there is a swelling proclamation of the typical hymn at the end. But Mr. Paderewski has no consummation which he can hymn; his song is only of longing still cherished and pride unbroken. To me at a first hearing the most moving portions of the music were the buoyant proclamation of the second theme in the first movement, which seemed to tell of ancient stories and a heart searching threnody in the last movement after the din of a lost battle and before a dirge for the heroic dead.

Structurally Mr. Paderewski has paid deference to approved symphonic forms in his first two movements, and exercised the utmost freedom in his last, which has the dimensions and the outlines of a symphonic poem. In it he has hewn to the lines of historical incident. It might bear a superscription like Tschaikowsky's overture, already mentioned—"Poland, 1863," might have been its title—it is a delineation of the stirrings of popular unrest, the zeal of youthful patriotism, the unheeded admonitions of wise conservatism, of warfare begun with heedless daring and enthusiasm, of defeat and lamentation, ending with a glimmer of hope.

The impression made by the music is not so easily described. Mr. Paderewski has invented some pregnant themes, but they are not strikingly novel, and his treatment of them makes them sound scant of breath. There is an excessive amount of iteration of short motivi borrowed from the themes in the working out of the climaxes. His fabric is polyphonic, and the singing voices are heard always, but much of the music is monochromatic. This may be because Mr. Paderewski has hitherto been chiefly a composer for the pianoforte, which is an embodied tutti, but except in the modulatory reiterations his music does not sound as if conceived for any other instrument than the orchestra. It is anything but transcribed pianoforte music. Portions of it might be improved by reorchestration, but there is much color in the score, and some of its effects are both brilliant and original. The audience applauded the first movement and the last to the echo, and would not desist until the composer had repeatedly voiced his thanks. The second movement called forth only a ripple of perfunctory handclapping.

H. E. K.

om

dress

te

Paderewski's Symphony Rendered.

Boston, Feb. 12.—Ignace Paderewski's new symphony in B minor received its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. Mr. Paderewski was present. The symphony, which requires the services of the entire orchestra and several extra pieces, was favorably received by a large audience. Max Fiedler conducted.

[177]

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

FEB 1

The fourth concert of the season in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Monday evening at the Academy of Music, and will be one of the most important musical events of the season. Paderewski will be the soloist and it will be practically a Paderewski programme. The famous pianist and composer has recovered from the slight accident that caused the cancellation of his recently announced recital, and will play Saint-Saens' Concerto in C minor, No. 4.

But one other number will be played, and that is Paderewski's own symphony in B minor, in three movements—adagio maestoso, (I) allegro con fucco, (II) andante con moto and (III) allegro vivace. It will be the first time that it has been played in Philadelphia, as the first movement is twenty-five minutes long, all patrons are urged to be in their seats early, as none will be admitted after the concert begins until the end of the movement.

The entire Ring series will be given as a wind-up to a notable season, on March 4, 11, 18 and 25. Gadski will be the Brunhilde, and it is probable that Anthes will again be heard. The other tenors will be Burgstaller, Martin, Burrian and Jorn, and among the artists who will be heard will be Walter Soomer, a newcomer as "Wotan," Goritz, Reiss, Muhlmann, Blass, Hinckley, Mmes. Homer, Kaschowska, Mattfeld, Ranzenburg, L'Huilliere, Fornia and Von Niessen-Stone.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, will be one of the most interesting and most important ever given by that organization in this city, as the program will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and composer. His symphony, on which he has been at work for several years, will be played for the first time here, and, as soloist, he will play Saint-Saens's concerto in C-minor, for piano and orchestra. The symphony was written as a patriotic tribute to the composer's native country, and was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64. The tonality of the work is in B-minor and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements, as follows; I. Adagio Maestoso; Allegro con fuoco; II. Andante con moto; III. Allegro vivace. The three movements which now compose the work were completed and the parts copied last December. After being announced many times and repeatedly deferred, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America, and its first performance anywhere was in Boston last week. As the composition is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, the program will contain only the symphony and the Saint-Saens concerto which Paderewski will play.

NOTED PIANIST A COMPOSER

Paderewski Will Play Symphony Based on Story of Poland.

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, will be the most interesting and most important musical event that Washington has had in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and as composer, for Washington will hear for the first time the great symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month, and its first performances were in Boston at the Boston symphony concert last Saturday evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat, No. 5, which Mr. Paderewski will play. Max Fiedler will conduct.

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement, which will be a scherzo.

Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, which will make the second part of the program, like Beethoven's violin concerto, stands as a master work of its kind, and in no concerto does the genius of the great pianist shine so brilliantly.

The symphony is first on the program and as the first movement plays for 25 minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

H. E. K.

BRINGS NEW SYMPHONY

PADEREWSKI WORK GIVEN

COMPOSITION IS IN B MINOR, WRITTEN AS PATRIOTIC TRIBUTE TO NATIVE COUNTRY, POLAND, INSPIRED BY REVOLUTION.

Paderewski, who recently arrived in New York, brought with him the score of his symphony, which has been looked forward to with eager interest for the last two years. It is his first work in this form. The themes of the first movement were sketched out in the summer of 1904 and the three movements which now compose the work were finally finished and the parts copied in December, 1908. The symphony is in B minor and it is Opus No. 24. The first movement is marked "Adagio Masstoso; Allegro con fuoco"; the second, "Andante con moto" and the third "Allegro vivace." The first performances of the symphony anywhere were given in Boston on Friday afternoon, Feb. 12, and Saturday evening, Feb. 13. The following week it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Later in the season it is to be played in Chicago by the Chicago Orchestra and in St. Paul by the St. Paul Orchestra and in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra.

The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute program for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined program. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is peculiarly a memorial to the revolution of 1863-64.

Spirit of Unrest.

In the opening of the movement one feels the spirit of social and political unrest which filled the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hotheads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counsel patience and caution, urged the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national anthem, from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken, which is treated not unlike a dirge, appearing in a subdued and sad mood.

The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint distant trumpet calls—the summons to war.

Light hearted, gay and confident, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which, with their dark, heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet, as the conflict progresses, it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are as shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher—the laments for the fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns, and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme, on which will be built the fourth movement, yet to be written.

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement which will be a scherzo.

The Orchestration.

The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings. The sarrusophone which Mr. Paderewski uses in all three movements of his symphony is a comparatively new instrument, which is now used in an orchestra for the first time. It is a brass reed instrument, distantly related to the saxophone, and its quality of tone lies between that of the bassoon and the trombone. The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion, which Mr. Paderewski himself invented. It gives the feeling of far distant thunder in a way which can not be accomplished with the great drum.

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 13 1909

Paderewski's New Symphony Played.

BOSTON, Feb. 12.—Ignace Paderewski's new symphony in B minor received its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Mr. Paderewski was present. The symphony, which requires the services of the entire orchestra and several extra pieces, was favorably received by a large audience. Max Fiedler conducted.

[178]

* * *

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) night, will be one of the most interesting and important musical events in Philadelphia in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski, both as pianist and as composer, for Philadelphia will hear for the first time the great Symphony on which he has been at work for several years past. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month and its first performances anywhere were in Boston at the Boston Symphony concert last (Saturday) evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter and on this account the programme will contain only the Symphony and the Saint-Saens concerto in C Minor, No. 4, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

The following sketch of the Symphony is based on information furnished by the composer:

The tonality of the Symphony is B Minor and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements as follows: 1. "Adagio Maestoso: Allegro con fuoco; 2. Andante con moto; 3. Allegro vivace." The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed and the parts copied in December, 1908.

The Symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tried to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is peculiarly a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64.

* * *

In the opening of the movement one feels the spirit of social and political unrest which fill the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is unrest of the young hot heads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counsel patience and caution, urged the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national emblem, from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken, which is treated not unlike a dirge, appearing in a subdued and sad mood.

The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdued the remonstrances of the elders and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint distant trumpet calls—the summons to war.

Light-hearted, gay and confident, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which with their dark, heavy colorings, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet as the conflict progresses it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upwards they soar, higher and higher—the laments for the fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns, and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement and a third theme on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written.

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement which will be a scherzo.

The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings. The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski himself invented. It gives the feeling of far distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the bass great drum.

The Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, which Mr. Paderewski will play has long been one of his favorites and his performances of it have always been exceedingly brilliant. The symphony is first on the programme, and as the first movement plays for 25 minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

* * *

Paderewski's New Symphony Scores

Boston, Feb. 12.—Ignace Paderewski's new symphony in B minor had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. Paderewski was present. The symphony, which requires the services of the entire orchestra and several extra pieces, was favorably received by a large audience. Max Fiedler conducted.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

FEB 1 1909

NEW SYMPHONY BY PADEREWSKI

Boston Orchestra's Concert Will Be Devoted to New Work and to Solo by Him.

MISCHA ELMAN RETURNS

Choral Society to Give Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"—Recital by Dorothy Goldsmith.

The Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow night, will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and as composer. Philadelphia will hear for the first time Paderewski's symphony on which he has been at work for the past few years. Its first performance anywhere was in Boston at the Boston Symphony concert last Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the Symphony and Saint-Saens concerto in C Minor, No. 4, which Paderewski will play.

The tonality of the Symphony is B Minor, and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements as follows: I, Adagio maestoso; Allegro con fuoco; II, Andante con moto; III, Allegro vivace." The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed and the parts copied in December, 1908.

The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to Paderewski's native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute program for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Paderewski has followed a sharply defined program. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is peculiarly a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64.

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement, which will be a scherzo. The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeble with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeble with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings. The toni-—Copyright by Purdy.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

truone is an instrument of percussion which Paderewski invented. It gives the feeling of far-distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the bass great drum.

Saint-Saens concerto in C Minor No. 4, which Paderewski will play, has long been one of his favorites, and his performances of it have always been exceedingly brilliant.

The Symphony is first on the program, and as the first movement plays for 25 minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

* * *

The next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie hall, on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, will be devoted in a sense to Paderewski, for the great Polish artist will appear at each of these concerts both as composer and pianist. His new symphony, of which so much has been said in the last two years, according to present plans will be played both on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in order that both sets of subscribers to the Boston concerts may have an opportunity to hear it. This is in response to a decided demand from these subscribers, because those of the Saturday matinee concerts are as eager to hear it as those of the Thursday night. Paderewski will also be soloist at both concerts.

At the first concert, on Thursday evening, Feb. 18, he will play Saint-Saens's concerto in C minor No. 4. At the concert on Saturday afternoon he plans to play Schumann's concerto in A minor. Unless the rehearsals of the symphony which begin in Boston next week demonstrate that it can be played in a shorter time than Mr. Paderewski thinks—which is one hour and a quarter—nothing will appear on the programme except the symphony and the concerto, the symphony coming first and the concerto closing the concert. The first performances of the symphony will be in Boston on next Friday afternoon, Feb. 12, and Saturday evening, Feb. 13.

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Paderewski To Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WILL GIVE PATRIOTIC WORKS

Miss Florence Jubb And Mme. Jeanne Jomelli Will Make Up The Week's Musical Events.

Ignace Jan Paderewski, the celebrated pianist and composer, will appear at the Lyric Wednesday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor. The feature of the program will be a symphony by Paderewski of monumental dimensions on which he has been at work several years. The performance of the symphony will take an hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the symphony and Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, ... 4, which the great pianist will play.

The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to Paderewski's native country—Poland—and was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. The first movement is free, but classical in form, and seeks to celebrate Poland's heroic past. The themes, however, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movements, in which the composer has tried to express the lyric nature of his people. In the third movement Paderewski has produced a symphonic poem that is a memorial to the revolution.

IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI

No one will be admitted to the auditorium after the symphony has begun, and the patrons are urged by the management to come early.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

Paderewski Symphony Is Produced.

BOSTON, Feb. 12.—Paderewski's new symphony, which New Yorkers will hear next week, had its first performance anywhere this evening in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work is long and requires the services of a large orchestra, including several special instruments. The orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave a superb performance, and the audience received the symphony with favor.

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow night, will be a notable one. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and as composer, for Philadelphia will hear for the first time the great symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month and its first performances anywhere were in Boston at the Boston Symphony concert last Saturday evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the symphony and Saint-Saens' concerto in C minor No. 4, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

The following sketch of the symphony is based on information furnished by the composer:—

The tonality of the symphony is B minor and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements as follows: I, Adagio Maestoso Allegro con fuoco II, Andante con moto; III, Allegro vivace. The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. The first movement is free, but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Mr. Pederewski has followed a sharply defined program.

In the opening of the movement one feels the spirit of social and political unrest which fill the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hotheads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Other heads, conservative age, counsel patience and caution, urging the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national emblem, from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken, which is treated not unlike a dirge, appearing in a subdued and sad mood. The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders, and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint distant trumpet calls—the summons to war.

Light-hearted, gay and confident the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones which with their dark, heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet as the conflict progresses, it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upwards they soar, higher and higher—the laments for the fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme, on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written.

Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, which Mr. Paderewski will play, has long been one of his favorites and ... performances of it have always been exceedingly brilliant.

* * *

... Paul" will be given

ess

Mendelssohn and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At a recent concert in Boston the Boston symphony orchestra gave some of the same music that is to be played at its concert at Court Square in this city the 23d. Of the treat in store for concert-goers some notion can be formed from the impressions of the Boston Transcript's reviewer:—

Mr Fiedler is dutiful to anniversaries, and he began the Symphony concert with due commemoration of Mendelssohn. The pieces he chose were the overture, "Fingal's Cave," the scherzo written to fill the interval between the first and second acts of "A Midsummer Night's Dream;" and the "Scotch" symphony—the symphony to which the woful tale of Rizzio, murdered at Mary Stuart's feet, and the shrill and merry piping of competing Highlanders are said equally to have stirred the composer—the latter certainly to the more musical profit. The overture and the scherzo are of the enduring and the living Mendelssohn; and if one of his symphonies must be played—shall we say for dignity's sake?—the "Scotch" is oftener interesting nowadays than the "Italian," while the "Reformation" is altogether moribund. The pipers were surely Mendelssohn's friends if they prompted him to a scherzo that still keeps its snap as of native Scottish music and of the good Scottish air. The tale of Rizzio, the atmosphere of the chambers of Holyrood served him less well. Mendelssohn, pressed by many concerns, deferred long the writing of the symphony, and he found the impulses and the memories of Scotland hard to quicken again. When they came at his call he wrote in the brightness of the scherzo or the melancholy of the opening andante. When they would not come he could only take refuge in such music-making as the linked sweetness long-drawn-out, and without a drop of acid to it, of the adagio or as the empty finale. The glory of the overture, "Fingal's Cave," is the enduring freshness of suggestion in it. The Mendelssohn who wrote it had seen the land and the waters of the Hebrides, the dripping rocks, the vivid fields, heard the swish of the currents of the cave and felt the beat of sea and wind. The impression did not dwindle; the impulse did not flag; and the overture remains a tone-picture that the vividest and most suggestive of the moderns might envy. Mr Fiedler was abundantly dutiful, and in the symphony in particular he seemed resolved that Mendelssohn should "sound," and "sound" where he was weakest. The conductor had no need of anxieties or obligations with the other two pieces. The scherzo once more exemplified the beautiful iridescence, the gossamer lightness of tone, that the orchestra can compass. The strings wrought in cobwebs; the wood-winds sent fairy lights twinkling through the web; the conductor had barely to keep a guiding hand.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SET FOR TUESDAY

Paderewski Will Be Soloist. New Composition Is Feature.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday afternon in the National Theater under the direction of Max Fiedler. Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist, will be the soloist of the afternoon and additional interest is given by the fact that the orchestra will play Paderewski's recently completed symphony. The reading comprises one hour and fifteen minutes. Because of this the program will consist of only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, No. 5, which Paderewski will play.

Pederewski has ben at work on this symphony several years, having designed it as a patriotic tribute to his country, directly inspired by the anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. The work is in three movements. Paderewski bgan this writing in 1904, and completed it in 1908.

Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto will form the second part of the program. This work, like Beethoven's violin concerto, stands as a masterpiece of its kind.

The symphony is first on the program, and patrons of the Boston Symphony series are reminded that the first movement requires twenty-five minutes to be read.

In the engagement of Paderewski, the local music public will enjoy a pleasure which had been promised a little more than a week ago, but had to be denied because of an accident to the pianist's finger.

s

I J PADEREWSKI COPYRIGHT G. NITSC
WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
LYRIC

Spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS GUS BATTLES

After Three Years With Philadelphia Orchestra, Musician Changes Contract.

MANCHESTER, N. H., Feb. 14.—After three years with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Gus Battles, son of General Battles, has been engaged as one of the flutes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He will not take up his work with the Boston orchestra until next season, finishing this year with the Philadelphia organization.

[179]

PADEREWSKI AND ELMAN TO BE HERE

Pianist Will be Soloist at Boston Orchestra Concert Tomorrow.

HAS A NEW SYMPHONY

Popular Russian Violinist Will Play With the Philadelphia Orchestra.

By William R. Lester

Micha Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, will make his second public appearance here with the Philadelphia Orchestra, playing in the Friday and Saturday concerts of this week. Elman made a popular hit in his initial performance with the Boston Orchestra. He is to play Brahms' concerto in D major—a brilliant work, highly beloved of concertgoers. Instrumental numbers for orchestra in these concerts are Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture; Schubert's unfinished symphony—two movements—and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

Paderewski is to be much the whole thing at the Boston Orchestra's concert tomorrow night. He will be the soloist, playing the solo instrument in Saint-... C minor concerto for piano and orchestra, and the symphony will be his latest orchestral composition—heard here on this occasion for the first time.

The tonality of the symphony is B minor, and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements: Adagio maestoso and allegro con fuoco, andante con moto and allegro vivace. The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed and the parts copied in December, 1908.

This number is first on the orchestral program. The first movement consumes twenty-five minutes, therefore punctuality in arriving is desirable in the audience.

The symphony was performed for the first time on any stage at Boston February 5 last.

Some new instruments are to be used—three sarrusophones (a sort of enlarged saxhorn) and a tonitruone—one of Paderewski's inventions, designed to imitate the sound of distant thunder.

NEW YORK HERALD,

ss New York City.

...son."

Mr. Paderewski will be the important figure at the two concerts of the Boston Orchestra this week, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, for he appears both as composer and as pianist. At both concerts the famous pianist's new symphony in B minor, op. 24, upon which he has been at work for the last three years, will be played under Mr. Max Fiedler's direction. On Thursday evening Mr. Paderewski will play Saint-Saens C minor concerto, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Owing to the length of the symphony, no other compositions will be offered.

Mr. Paderewski's symphony, which had its first public hearing in Boston last Friday, was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64 and is regarded by the composer as a tribute to his native land. It comprises in its present form three movements, but Mr. Paderewski has already sketched a fourth, a scherzo. It is, however, complete as it now stands and consists of an adagio maestoso, an andante con moto, and an allegro vivace. If the composer adds a scherzo the symphony, which now lasts an hour and a quarter, will be one of the longest known.

Broadly speaking, the first movement is designed to commemorate the heroic past of Poland; in the second part the lyric nature of the race finds expression, and in the last, which is so called programme music, Mr. Paderewski sketches his reminiscences of the revolution. No use is made of Polish melodies, but the whole is characteristically Polish in feeling.

A full orchestra is used, to which Mr. Paderewski adds three sarrusphones (a new instrument, distantly related to the saxophone), and an invention of his own called a tonitruone, designed to give the effect of distant thunder.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20, may be considered in a sense a Paderewski festival, for at both the new symphony on which the composer-pianist has been at work for the last two or three years will be played (on Thursday evening for the first time in New York) and at both concerts Paderewski will be the soloist. On Thursday evening he will play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, known as the "Emperor." Owing to the length of the symphony, there will be nothing on the programme except that work and the concerto.

According to Paderewski himself his symphony is in three movements: 1. Adagio Maestoso; Allegro con fuoco; 2. Andante con moto; 3. Allegro vivace. The themes of the first movement were sketched in the Summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed and the parts copied in December, 1908. The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to the composer's native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is peculiarly a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64.

e First Established and most Complete
wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, will be the most interesting and most important musical event that Washington has had in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski, both as pianist and as composer, for Washington will hear for the first time the great symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month, and its first performances anywhere were in Boston, at the Boston Symphony concert last Saturday evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the programme will contain only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat, No. 5, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, which will make the second part of the programme, like Beethoven's violin concerto, stands as a master work of its kind, and in no concerto does the genius of the great pianist shine so brilliantly.

The symphony is first on the programme, and as the first movement plays for twenty-five minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

Die Musikwelt.

Paderewski's Erste Symphonie. — „Die verkaufte Braut". — Neue Sänger für das „Metropolitan". — Frl. Destinn's „Butterfly". — Frau Sembrich's Abschied. — Verdi's „Requiem". — Tschaikowsky-Cyklus. — Preßstimmen über „Elektra". — Erich Schmedes' New Yorker Eindrücke. — Konzerte.

Die Leitung der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte bezeichnet die nächsten New Yorker Konzerte der berühmten Vereinigung am Abend des 18. und am Nachmittag des 20. Februar als „Paderewski"-Festival, da in diesen Konzerten dieser Pianist nicht nur als Solist auftreten wird, und zwar am 18. mit Saint-Saëns' 4. Piano-Konzert und am 20. mit Beethoven's „Kaiser"-Konzert, sondern weil bei diesen Gelegenheiten auch die Erste Symphonie Paderewski's zum erstenmal in New York zur Aufführung gelangen soll. Ueber dieses interessante Werk verdanken wir dem Komponisten folgende Mittheilungen.

Diese Symphonie ist in H-Moll geschrieben und die Opuszahl des Werks ist 24. Es zerfällt in drei Sätze, und zwar 1. Adagio Maestoso; Allegro con Fuoco. 2. Andante con Moto und 3. Allegro Vivace. Die Themen des ersten Satzes wurden im Sommer 1904 niedergeworfen, die drei Sätze, aus denen die Symphonie gegenwärtig besteht, wurden im Dezember des Vorjahres vollendet.

Das Werk ist als eine patriotische Huldigung für das Vaterland des großen Künstlers aufzufassen und wurde unmittelbar durch die 40jährige Gedenkfeier der polnischen Revolution 1863—64 inspirirt. Weder der erste, noch der zweite Satz haben ein bestimmtes Programm. Der erste Satz ist frei in der Form, aber trotzdem nach klassischen Mustern gearbeitet und soll Polen's glorreiche historische Vergangenheit malen. Die Themen, wenn auch typisch national, sind nicht auf Volksmelodien basirt. Dasselbe gilt von dem zweiten, langsamen Satz, in dem der Tondichter die lyrische Natur seines Volkes zu schildern versucht. Dem dritten Satz hat Paderewski ein bestimmtes Programm unterlegt. Es stellt sich thatsächlich als Tonpoem dar und ist eine Erinnerung an die Revolution, in der das polnische Volk seine politische Freiheit wieder zu gewinnen versuchte.

Zu Beginn dieses Satzes fühlt man den damals herrschenden Geist politischer und sozialer Unrast ausgedrückt, welcher das Land vor Ausbruch der Erhebung erfüllte. Es sind die begeisterten, aber etwas unklaren Freiheitsideale, welche die jungen Köpfe der Nation erfüllten. Dagegen weist die ruhigere Ueberlegung der älteren, konservativen Elemente auf die geringen Aussichten einer erfolgreichen Bewegung hin. Diese resignirte, gedrückte Stimmung wird durch die musikalische Behandlung der polnischen Nationalhymne ausgedrückt, welche aller fortreißenden Wirkung und Flottheit entkleidet ist und fast wie eine Trauermelodie ertönt.

Aber die Feuerköpfe wollen nichts von Unterwerfung und kluger Unterordnung wissen. Die ruhelose Stimmung zerstreut die Bedenken der Aelteren und mit dem folgenden Thema flammt der Funke der Revolution auf. Von fernem Trompetengeschmetter angekündigt, braust das brillante, ritterliche Thema einher — das Signal des Kampfes!

Vertrauensvoll, leichtblütig und wohlgemuth stürzt sich die junge Blüthe der Nation in die Feindseligkeiten. Der erste Zusammenstoß der feindlichen Kräfte ist durch den Gebrauch der Sarrusophons charakterisirt, dessen dunkle, schwerfällige Färbung die überwältigende Macht des Feindes bezeichnet. Wieder erschallt das Nationallied, doch diesmal kraftvoll, erhebend, begeisternd, kampflustig; je weiter der Konflikt jedoch fortschreitet, desto mehr wird es von den schaurigen Tönen der Niederlage überwältigt, bis sich das Heldenlied schließlich in Tönen äußerster Verzweiflung verliert. Dann hört man einen Trauermarsch, der die gefallenen polnischen Freiheitshelden beweint und preist. Die Themen der Unrast, die wir aus dem ersten Beginn dieses Satzes kennen, erscheinen wieder, diesmal jedoch bis zur Unkenntlichkeit verwischt. Sie sind schattenhaft skizzirt und „ebenso unsubstanziell als die Helden, welche dahingegangen sind". Es sind schmerzliche, nagende Erinnerungen von Niederlage und Verzweiflung. Immer höher und höher steigen sie, die gegen Himmel gesandten Lamentationen um das geschlagene Vaterland.

Aus tiefster Trauer schlägt die Stimmung plötzlich zur Hoffnungsfreudigkeit und Helle über. In der nun folgenden hoffnungsvollen Steigerung ertönt wieder das ritterliche Thema von früher, das Thema der Heldenvergangenheit der Polen und ein drittes Thema, auf welches der Komponist einen noch zu schreibenden vierten Satz aufbauen will. Dieser vierte Satz wird die Form eines Scherzo's haben und durchaus zuversichtlich und glänzend gehalten sein.

Das Werk ist für folgende Besetzung geschrieben: drei Flöten, drei Oboen (eines davon mit Englisch-Horn zu vertauschen), drei Klarinetten (eventuell eines gegen Baßklarinett), zwei Fagotte, ein Kontrafagott, drei Sarrusophone, vier Trompeten, vier Hörner, drei Trombone, eine Baßtuba, Harfe, Orgel, drei Pauken, kleine Trommel, Cymbal, Triangel, Tam-Tam, baskische Trommel, und Tonitruon nebst dem üblichen Streichquartett.

Die Symphonie bildet den ersten Programmpunkt, und da der erste Satz 25 Minuten dauert, empfiehlt es sich, pünktlich zur Stelle zu sein, da nach Beginn eines Satzes Niemand zugelassen werden wird.

* * *

Das „Tonitruon" genannte Schlaginstrument, von dem oben die Rede war, wurde von Herrn Paderewski eigens für dieses Werk erfunden; es soll das ferne Rollen des Donners ausmalen, einen Ton, der mit den üblichen Instrumenten nicht zu erzielen ist.

Das erwähnte „Sarrusophon" wird in Frankreich seit 1863 nach Angaben des Militärkapellmeisters Sarrus gebaut; es ist, obgleich aus Messingblech gefertigt, im übrigen ganz der Oboenfamilie nachgebildet, nur von stärkerem Klang.

* * *

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall may be considered in a sense a Paderewski festival, for at both concerts the new symphony by the composer-pianist will be played and at both concerts he will be the soloist. On Thursday evening he will play the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat No. 5 the "Emperor." Owing to the length of the symphony there will be nothing on the programme except it and the concerto. The following sketch of the symphony is based on information furnished by the composer:

The tonality of the symphony is B minor and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements; I., adagio maestoso, allegro con fucco; II., andante con moto; III., allegro vivace. The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were finished in December, 1908. The symphony is written as "a patriotic tribute" to Paderewski's native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for the first and second movements. The first is free but classical in form, and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, though racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is intended to be in the nature of a memorial to the revolution of 1863-64.

In the opening of the third movement one may notice the spirit of social and political unrest which fills the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hot-heads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Older heads counsel patience and caution, urge the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in the treatment of the national anthem, robbed of all buoyancy and joyousness and sounding like a dirge. But youth is heedless. The atmosphere of restlessness overcomes remonstrances and the fire of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant, chivalric character, heralded by distant trumpet calls, the summons to war.

Light hearted, gay and confident, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sazzaphone dark and heavy in coloring, which expresses the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and martial; but as the conflict progresses, it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair. A funeral dirge then tells of the heroes gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are as shadowy and unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher, the laments for the Fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood, from gloom to brightness, follows. Hope returns, and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from the third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme, on which will be built the fourth movement, yet to be written.

Paderewski's symphony will open the programme, and as the first movement lasts 25 minutes, all persons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

FEB 7- 1909

The Boston symphony orchestra has returned from a week of concerts that stretched from Buffalo and Rochester in the East to Cleveland, Columbus, Detroit and Indianapolis in the West, and the Transcript says:—

The orchestra and Mr Fiedler were well received everywhere and the conductor's programs, for the most part of familiar music, seemed to give particular pleasure. It has been Mr Fiedler's fortune in America to stir the enthusiasm of the smaller cities where orchestral concerts are infrequent oftener than he has that of the larger musical capitals.

That is easily explained; in the larger cities the orchestra is expected to conform to the established Bostonian tradition: the smaller cities are not troubled about the Boston tradition so long as the music has vital interest. Mr Fiedler's ideals are quite at variance with Mr Gericke's, and Dr Muck's, but they are good of their kind and as a popularizer of the best music he far surpasses either of them.

The New York Tribune is not disposed to show special enthusiasm over the Mendelssohn anniversary:—

Springfield Republican

Springfield, Mass.

FEB 23 1909

For the third and last Boston symphony concert in Springfield, which will be given in the Court Square theater on Tuesday evening, February 23, Mr Fiedler has decided to devote half of the program to a commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Felix Mendelssohn. This part of the program will comprise the "Fingal's Cave" overture; the scherzo to the incidental music of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and the "Scotch" symphony. The second part of the program —that is to say, the orchestral numbers— will be Scheinpflug's brilliant overture "To a Comedy by Shakespeare," which was played in Boston recently with such success, and the prelude and "Love's death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." The soloist will be Mme Clarke-Bartlett, the eminent dramatic soprano of Boston.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, will present Ignace Jan Paderewski, both as pianist and as composer, for Washington will hear for the first time a symphony on which he has been at work for several years. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the program will contain only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat, No. 5, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 18, and Saturday afternoon, February 20, may be considered in a sense a Paderewski festival, for at both of these concerts the new symphony on which the composer-pianist has been at work for the last two or three years will be played (on Thursday evening for the first time in New York), and at both concerts Paderewski will be the soloist. On Thursday evening he will play the Saint Saëns concerto in C minor No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat No. 5, the "Emperor." Owing to the length of the symphony there will be nothing on the programme except the symphony and the concerto.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Exceptional interest attaches to the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening as not only will Paderewski be the soloist, but a symphony of his composition which has not yet been played here and which is described as a monumental work, will be the chief feature of the program. Its only other number will be Saint-Saens' pianoforte concerto in C minor, No. 4, of which Mr. Paderewski will be the interpreter.

[190]

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 14 1909

In many respects the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening next, will be the most interesting and most important musical event that Brooklyn has had in many years. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and as composer, for Brooklyn will hear for the first time the great symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. Announced many times, Mr. Paderewski finally brought it to America last month and its first performances anywhere were in Boston at the Boston Symphony concert last evening and the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the programme will contain only the Symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat, No. 5, which Mr. Paderewski will play. The following sketch of the Symphony is based on information furnished by the composer:

The tonality of the Symphony is B minor and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements as follows: First, adagio maestoso, allegro con fuoco; second, andante con moto; third, allegro vivace. The three movements, which now compose the work, were completed and the parts copied in December, 1908. The Symphony is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country, directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free but classical in form and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem and is peculiarly a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64.

In the opening of the movement one feels the spirit of social and political unrest which fill the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hot-heads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counsel patience and caution, urged the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national emblem from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken, which is treated not unlike a dirge, appearing in a subdued and sad mood. The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders, and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint trumpet calls, the summons to war. Light-hearted, gay and confident the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones which with their dark, heavy colorings, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling, yet as the conflict progresses, it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair. Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upwards they soar, higher and higher, the laments for the Fatherland ascending to Heaven. A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme, on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written. The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement, which will be a scherzo. The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabasson, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings. The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski invented. It gives the feeling of far distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the bass great drum. Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, which will make the second part of the programme, like Beethoven's violin concerto, stands as a master work of its kind, and in no concerto does the genius of the great pianist shine so brilliantly. The symphony is first on the programme, and as the first movement plays for twenty-five minutes, all patrons are urged to be in their seats promptly, for none will be admitted to the auditorium while the orchestra is playing.

Unusual interest attaches to the lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony concert of next Friday evening, as Paderewski's new symphony will then be a special object of study. As the concert house was sold out some days ago, the lecture recital will allow music lovers who were not fortunate enough to get seats, to gain a very good idea of the composition, as far as the piano can show orchestral effects. The lecturer, Daniel Gregory Mason, of Manhattan, has conferred with the composer, and is now in Boston studying the music first hand at the Boston concerts of the orchestra. The entire programme of Friday's concert will be taken up. This lecture recital, like the others in the series, is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, Mr. Mason being a frequent lecturer before the latter. It will be given on Thursday next at 4 P. M. in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music.

...ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The first performance of Paderewski's new symphony will take place Feb. 12, in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler. The work was to have been performed two years ago, but the composer had not time to give the final revision until last summer, and the copies were only made a month ago.

"The symphony is a work of monumental character," writes Mr. W. E. Walter of Boston. "It was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1863-64 and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land. In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance. The first movement seeks to give expression to the heroic past of Poland and in the second the composer tries to express the lyric of his race. The last movement is a symphonic poem in itself and for this the composer has made a definite program treating of the revolution which he remembers distinctly, although but a small child when it occurred.

"A full modern orchestra is used and in addition to the instrumentts found in such a band, Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones—an instrument which is a distant relative of the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion which he invented himself. He calls it a tonitruone and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Heard at the Academy of Music Last Night in a Paderewski Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening and erewski about the program than was nec it must be recorded that the occasion was more notable than interesting. If one may say so without being thought unappreciative or unkind, it may be remarked that there was rather more Padessary or desirable. It included only two numbers, of which the most important was a symphony, in which the distinguished pianist had embodied an impassioned tribute to his naive land.

This contains some interesting material and there need be no disputing the skillfulness of its construction, but it is projected on a scale of such excessive magnitude that it imposes an inordinate strain upon the attention and it may be suspected that its composition afforded more pleasure to its author than its performance did to last night's audience. It is not possible to grasp the significance or to estimate the value of so large a work at a single hearing and for the present it must be enough to say that the symphony upon the whole produced an agreeable impression and was received with many signs of pleasure and approval.

The other number presented was Saint-Saens' concerto in C minor for orchestra and pianoforte, which was played by Mr. Paderewski with an ability which has ceased to call for recognition and on which the vocabulary of eulogy was long ago exhausted. The next and last of these concerts will occur on Monday evening, March 15.

MRS. REMINGTON STILL

The great musical event of last week in this country was the performance of Paderewski's symphony in Boston on Friday and Saturday. The great Polish pianist brought the symphony with him when he came to New York on January 26, so the work may truthfully be called very new in America, and he listened to the playing of his work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, February 12. Mr. Fiedler and his artists didn't have a very long time to rehearse the symphony, but the performance received hearty praise, nevertheless.

The symphony is in B-minor and is complete in three movements though it is possible that the composer may add a fourth, in scherzo form. It was begun in 1904 and was completed in December, 1908. The Boston orchestra had the honor of a first performance of the work and this week will repeat it in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. The Chicago Orchestra will play it later, as will the orchestras in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Mr. Paderewski offers the symphony as a patriotic tribute to Poland, and the work is intended to celebrate that unhappy country's great heroism in the past. It is not program music, but especially in the third movement it suggests the bravery of the noble youth of Poland who went out to fight for the Fatherland in the Revolution of 1863-64, who suffered bitter defeat and met death bravely. There is a dirge in honor of the heroes—lamentation for those who can fight no more—and then a transition of mood to buoyant hope for the future brings the work, in its present form, to an end.

As befits a modern composer, a contemporary of Strauss and Mahler, Mr. Paderewski has not spared himself in writing his symphony. He has scored it for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, bass tuba, harp, organ, three tympani, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone and the usual strings; and that is certainly an array! It would seem that the symphony could hardly have a performance according to the composer's scoring save in the large cities where an organ is a part of the concert hall equipment, and a large stage would be needed to accommodate all the players Mr. Paderewski desires to have employed in his work.

Of the instruments named above the sarrusophone is one that has not been used much in orchestras, according to Professor Pratt's "History of Music," but has been of use in increasing the resources of the military band. The instrument is of brass with an oboe mouthpiece, and its quality of tone lies between that of a bassoon and a trombone. The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion, designed to give the feeling of distant thunder in a way that cannot be accomplished with the great drum. Mr. Paderewski himself is responsible for its invention.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard here March 22, and other musical treats that are promised are Katherine Goodson's recital, the concert by the vocal quartet headed by Bonci, the tenor, the great dramatic singer, Wullner, in recital, the French baritone, Gillibert, in an evening of French song that is sure to be delightful, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch is to come again. The New York Symphony Orchestra and Olive Fremstadt tried to make a date to come here, but the matter has not been carried through.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 18 1909

At the Boston Symphony concert tomorow evening at the Academy of Music, when Paderewski is to appear as composer and as pianist, Mme. Paderewski will be present as guest of honor in Mrs. Camden C. Dike's box party. Mrs. Max Fiedler, wife of the conductor of the orchestra, is coming from Boston for the occasion and will be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer.

Paderewski at Lyric.

Beyond the regular features of its attractive program, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric this evening will be marked by the appearance of Paderewski, who will be the soloist. This will be the only appearance of the celebrated pianist in Baltimore this year. Interest in the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year is even greater than usual, and the success of the concert is already considered assured.

[181]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
n
ress

NEW SYMPHONY BY PADEREWSKI

A Truly Great Work in Which There is the Soul of the Polish People.

EVENT OF IMPORTANCE

Composition Received With Enthusiasm—Composer Appears With Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night was one of the most important musical events of a season, unsurpassed, in Philadelphia for the introduction of musical novelties. Ignace Jan Paderewski appeared not only as a soloist, but as the composer of a most remarkable symphonic work. In fact, it was a Paderewski night, not only in sentiment, but in brevity of program, which contained only two numbers—the great Polish pianist's new symphony and the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, in which he appeared as solist with the orchestra.

Paderewski wrote his B minor Symphony as a patriotic tribute to his native country. He has accomplished more than the conferring of an honor upon his country—he has contributed to musical literature one of the greatest if not the greatest, symphonic works of the age. The work is colossal. Even at a first hearing the impression made is so stupendous as almost to defy description.

The work is in three movements. Although not founded on the folk music of Poland, the composition is sufficiently Slavonic in character to be recognized as emanating from a genius of that unhappy country. The first two movements are conventional in form, but distinctly original in the masterly and musical manner in which the themes are treated. It is the third movement, however, which makes the deepest and most thrilling impression. Into this comes the national anthem of Poland, a piece of writing which is almost appalling in its sadness and sense of hopelessness. Later the anthem is repeated in strong, triumphant measures, finally dying away in gloom. Then follows the most masterly bit of all the symphony, a funeral dirge, which for beauty of theme, originality of expression and effectiveness deserves to, and no doubt will, rank with the immortal "Marche Funebre" of Beethoven.

The music of the Polish people is always a music with sorrow predominant, notwithstanding governmental oppression. The Poles are still a distinct people, with an individual language, and songs and dances peculiar to themselves. Bearing these facts in mind it is but natural that the genius of Paderewski should find expression in a masterpiece that has a profoundly melancholy undertone.

The work produced a profound impression on an audience in which the leading musicians of Philadelphia were conspicuous. Again and again the great Pole was recalled to receive the love and adulation he so well deserves.

His playing of the Saint Saens concerto proved anew that he is the greatest pianist of the day, not the greatest technician, but undoubtedly the most poetic and masterly interpreter. His playing is a rare combination of the best of heart and brain. Like the great artist and courteous gentleman he is, he responded to the frantic applause which greeted the close of the concert by seating himself at the piano and playing not one encore, but two, ending, of course, with the Butterfly Etude his celebrated countryman, Chopin, whise idealization of the Polish dance music has made it familiar the world over.

There is only one Paderewski. No one has yet arisen who can approach this virtuoso's art.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PADEREWSKI AGAIN SCORES A TRIUMPH

Is Heard with Boston Orchestra Both as Composer and Pianist.

PADEREWSKI

IGNAZ PADEREWSKI, a little thinner, a little faded, a little aged, made his reappearance in Philadelphia last night at the Academy of Music with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing in the programme both as composer of the symphony and pianist in the concerto. As the latter he showed all of the old-time mastery of every phase of his instrument. In this field he is supreme. Others there are who may make a stronger appeal through sme one special field of emotion or interpretation, but there is only one Paderewski, supreme in everything, perfect in poise and nonchalant through the whole wide gamut of piano literature. The Saint-Saens concerto, which he chose as his vehicle, is one bristling with difficulties, but they are as nothing to him. He is so amazing in his ease as to be uncanny, and when, as encores, he dashed off a Chopin etude and the C sharp minor waltz—just to show the assembled amateurs how really trifling are the things that they struggle desperately over for years, one obtained a clearer and more comprehensive idea of the inhuman possibilities of his lean fingers.

As a composer, Mr. Paderewski is not the giant he is an an executant. The knowledge is there, the technique is there, he knows exactly the effect he wants to get and he gets it, but his whole, long-drawn-out-one-hour-and-nine-minute symphony, while a perfectly masterly piece of writing, has only one or two moments of what might be called inspiration, and does not impress one as a work that will ever be much in demand on orchestral programmes.

Society at Concert.

Mrs. Roosevelt, with Representative and Mrs. Longworth, entertained a box party at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. Others present were the British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the German ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador; Mme. de Lagercrantz, wife of the Swedish minister, and the Misses de Lagercrantz; the Belgian minister and Baroness Moncheur, Baroness Marguerite Moncheur, Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Bacon, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Charles A. Williams, Miss Williams, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Gardner Williams, Mrs. Amy Talbot and Miss Talbot, Mrs. Frederick Keep, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Robert Mason, Mrs. Kean and the Misses Kean, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle, Miss Carlisle, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. Gheen, Mrs. Lee Phillips, Mrs. Arthur Lee, Mrs. Charles S. Bromwell, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend and Miss Townsend, Mrs. Worthington, the counselor of the Austrian embassy, Baron Ambrozy; Prince Koudacheff, of the Russian embassy; Mrs. Charles Parker Stone, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and the Misses Perkins, the Misses Leupp, Mrs. Joseph Cranford, Mrs. A. C. Barney, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, the Misses Harlan, Miss Grace Jarvis, Mrs. Simon Guggenheim, the Misses Gatewood, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Lowndes, Mrs. Nicoll Ludlow, Mrs. I. T. Mann, Miss Hickey, Miss Wheeler, Mrs. Audenreid, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mme. de Blanpre, of the French embassy; Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Leiter, Miss Dorothy Williams, Mrs. William Manning Irwin, Miss Irwin, Mrs. McCartney, and Mr. and Mrs. Victor G. Fischer.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 15 1909

In many respects, the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, will be one of the most interesting musical events that Brooklyn has had in many days. It will present Ignace Jan Paderewski both as pianist and as composer, for Brooklyn will hear for the first time the great symphony on which he has been at work for the past several years. The work is of monumental dimensions, its performance consuming one hour and a quarter, and on this account the programme will contain only the symphony and Beethoven's Emperor concerto in E flat, No. 5, which Mr. Paderewski will play.

The following sketch of the symphony is based on information furnished by the composer: The tonality of the symphony is B minor and its opus number is 24. It is in three movements, as follows: 1, Adagio Maestoso; Allegro con fuoco; 2, Andante con moto; 3, Allegro vivace. It is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country, inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. The first movement seeks to celebrate Poland's heroic past. The themes are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race. In the third movement, Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme, being a memorial to the Revolution of 1863-64. In the opening, one feels the spirit of unrest which fills the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hot heads, while older heads counsel patience and caution. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national emblem from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken, which is treated not unlike a dirge. The youth refuse to listen, the atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders and the spark of revolution seiguites with the appearance of the second theme, of chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint trumpet calls. Light hearted, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which, with their dark, heavy colorings, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling—yet as the conflict progresses it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are shadowy and bitter memories of defeat. A change of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement. The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement, which will be a scherzo.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

LIKE AN AGED MAN PADEREWSKI SEEMS

Physically He Appeared Unable To Play Saint-Saens' Concerto.

Ignace Jan Paderewski came out in response to the applause following the Boston Orchestra's performance of his symphony—came out like an old man, with grayed hair and pallid face, with the sort of smile that goes with age, with the bearing that made the fellow in J box feel that he was looking back at earlier days—perhaps thinking about the minuet.

Just why Paderewski should look old is not apparent. He is not yet 50, and still there was something indefinably old about him. He was the shadow of a man. Some people call it ethereal. To the vulgar eye it appeared only age—years and labor impressed on the physical body. In that vast audience there was a feeling akin to pity that such an old, such a very old man, should have the task of playing Saint-Saens' concerto, with its exhausting passages. And yet, Paderewski is not old—not even un-young. He is neither old nor young.

Bowed Many Times.

He bowed many times for the symphony—bowed with a jerky movement, both arms hanging at his side—bowed and smiled that smile that goes with age. The symphony? The work of a musicianly man—the creature of a great feeling—the child of a wonderful inspiration, but ——. The first two movements inexpressibly bored the layman, who could not read tone poems; the third awoke him with a rude jar to the varied treatment of a melody he didn't understand. Here Wagner crashed through—there Tschaikowsky dominated—yonder the shades of past masters touched the poem with their influences, but Paderewski was not in the poem. He was only on the stage afterward, bowing—bowing and smiling that smile that goes with age, the pallid face deathly under the shaded lights.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY

Received With Much Favor by Large Audience at The Academy.

Ignace Jan Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra held the stage of the Academy of Music last night, and Poland, the land of Chopin, possessed the atmosphere.

It was a Paderewski night in the full sense, with the brilliant pianist in the role of both composer and virtuoso, the orchestra interpreting his new symphony, of which the world has heard much during the past five years, but for the rendition of which it has been obliged to wait for hearing until now.

While not as great in magnitude as those of Tschaikowsky and Beethoven, Mr. Paderewski's work will undoubtedly rank righ for all time to come. It not only contains much that is pleasing to the ear, insuring popularity, but its construction shows clearly the great care which the pianist has lavished upon it.

The symphony—depicting as it does the centuries of struggle for independence put forth by Poland and the overthrows of its hopes, in battle—is marked by most powerful contrasts. It ranges from a funeral dirge, of beautiful movement, and of the most delicate pianissimo effects, to the loud, strident, blaring and tumultuous alarum portraying the din of steel clashing against steel in mighty conflict. Woodwind is pitted furiously against brass, while the strings lend weird and strange harmony. The buoyant spirit of a nation as yet uncrushed in spirit, if in arms, is portrayed by a stirring, martial theme while running through the whole work, and appearing at intervals, in varied forms now sad, now gay, is the Polish national anthem.

The symphony is as yet incomplete, Mr. Paderewski having announced that he has a fourth movement in mind. It would seem, however, that he has already acnieved his aim in what he has written, this, more particularly as the symphony now consumes one hour and a quarter in time.

This is the third time that the symphony has been played in America, and the first in Philadelphia, and the audience here, as in Boston, received it most favorably, so favorably, indeed, as to indicate a desire to hear it repeated, which, after all, is the true test of music.

In addition to the symphony Mr. Paderewski himself played the Saint-Saens concert in C minor, No. 4, assisted by the orchestra. He displayed a broader musicianship than when here before. He does not make such pronounced points of pedal shifts and tones carried over from one chord to another as he did, giving his work more purely sensuous allurement and less of the nature of a digital display of dexterity. His tones are deeper rather than of more volume and his coloring as equally brilliant as of yore.

His execution of the staccato movement in the allegro vivace of the concerto was especially fine, and at the conclusion of the work, the audience evinced its approval in a volume of handclapping and mild cheering.

In response Mr. Paderewski gave three encores; a nocturne, the Chopin etude, Op. 25 No. 2, in G flat, major, which proved so captivating during his last American tour, and the Chopin valse Op. 64, No. 2, in C sharp minor.

The First Published and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PADEREWSKI NIGHT

Symphony of the Great Pianis Is Played for Second Time—Composer a Soloist.

The programme of last night's concert of the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music contained only two numbers. The first of these was the long-awaited symphony in B minor, opus 24, composed by M. Paderewski; the second was the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, in which the composer transformed himself into the player, so that the evening belonged entirely to Ignace Jan Paderewski.

The symphony has been aptly described as of "monumental dimensions." It requires and hour and a quarter in the performance, the first movement alone taking 25 minutes. It is in three movements—the first an adagio, followed by an allegro; the second an andante; the third an allegro. The motivation of the work is patriotic. It is a musical epic of the heroic past of Poland in the temper, if not the form, of a symphonic poem, and its immediate inspiration was the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. Paderewski has been at work on the symphony for several years, and it had its first public performance anywhere at Boston last Friday and Saturday.

The first movement seems to voice the ebullient unrest of the ardent young patriots of the country, who thirst and take counsel together for the liberation of their fatherland and finally depart high-hearted for the field of battle. The suggestion of the national hymn, "Poland Is Not Yet Lost," is continually recurrent, sung not jubilantly but dispiritedly, as though by the elders, deprecating futile resistance in strains that resemble a dirge rather than a paen. Sarrusophones, instruments of the bassoon family, impart a sombre tone-coloring to the movement. The second movement is virtually a lament over the fallen heroes and the flower of the nation. In the third movement there are prophecies of faith and hope; and it is understood that it is the composer's intention to add eventually a fourth movement, a scherzo, which shall express the other side, the irreflective and spontaneous gaiety possible to the Polish temperament. Besides the three sarrusophones, Paderewski has introduced into the orchestral forces the tam-tam, the tambour, and an instrument of percussion of his own invention which he styles the "tonitruone," to convey the effect of distant thunder more effectively than the gruff voice of the bass or the kettledrum can do.

Throughout the first movement the auditor felt like a derelict upon the sea of harmony—not "rocked in the cradle of the deep," for there was nothing restful about the chaotic and promiscuous welter of short, almost choppy wave-lengths—which was absolutely true to what it was intended to represent, the turbulent emotions of a crowd aroused to a frenzy followed by a subsidence into the sullenness of baffled fury—anything but the mood of acquiescence and resignation. By the time the climactic coda was reached, one could not have endured much more, despite the undeniable beauty. The ear required rest like an overtaxed muscle. M. Paderewski was compelled to come from the wings twice to acknowledge with grave and dignified mien the tribute of the audience at the close of this first movement.

The second movement is profoundly mournful, and in the long-drawn cantabile passages afford the needed contrast to the hyphenated, interjectional character of the first movement. The "tonitruone" had a good deal to say here, and still more in the last movement, though the snare drum claimed its share of the honors as expenent of the storm, aided by the helter-skelter and huriy-burly of the strings.

This last movement was a polyphonic riot worthy of Strauss in his most unlicensed and unbridled moods. Partly because of the marvelous playing of the orchestra, the fine fury of it all never went beyond the bounds of sanity and reason, and just after stentorian shouts, from the brasses came a thrilling interval of silence followed by flowing melody. The end of it all was entirely reasonable and reassuring, somewhat in the temper of the older classics, rational without being conventional, with a strong tincture of the "Meistersinger" in the latter part. The little reed organ employed in the first movement was ridiculously inadequate.

The impression the work in its entirely produced upon one discriminating connoisseur who was present was that the symphony was "a large association of noises." It is certain that in the hands of unskilful instrumentalists the work would not have meant very much more. But played as Mr. Fiedler and his men performed it, the genuine inspiration of the score was saliently disclosed.

As for M. Paderewski's own playing, it need only be said that he was at his best. The orchestra discreetly deported their instruments when the audience started the long furore of applause, so that Conductor Fiedler's "no encore" rule might run no risk of violation. After a few crashing chords to command silence, M. Paderewski graciously conceded three unaccompanied encores—all of Chopin—a waltz, the "Etude for Black Notes" and a nocturne. Before the third encore the applause became enthusiastic shouting. It was a great night for Paderewski and a great night for absolute music.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 17 1905

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY TO BE PLAYED TO-MORROW

New Work of the Pianist Commemorates the Polish Revolution—Last Performance of "Parsifal" on Monday—"I Puritani" to Be Revived at the Manhattan.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The most important musical event of this week is the first performance tomorrow night of the Paderewski symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The following sketch is based on notes furnished by the composer:

The symphony op. 24 is in three movements, and was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. The first movement is classical and seeks to celebrate Poland's heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement in which the composer endeavors to express the lyric nature of his race.

In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem, and is especially in memory of the revolution of 1863-64.

In the opening of the movement is felt the spirit of social and political unrest which filled the country prior to the outbreak of the war—the unrest of the young hotheads, the youth of the nation, who long for independence. Older heads counsel patience and caution, urge the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national anthem, from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken.

The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders, and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint trumpet calls—the summons to war.

The youth of Poland depart confidently for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which, with their heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous and battling; yet, as the conflict progresses, it is gradually lost in the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher—lamentations for the fatherland ascending to heaven.

A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns, and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the theme of chivalry from the third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written.

From NEW YORK HERALD,
Address New York City.
Date

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Presents It for the First Time in New York in Composer's Presence.

It was Paderewski night in Carnegie Hall last night. The occasion was really the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, but Mr. Paderewski figured twice on the programme, namely, as composer and soloist. The audience was huge.

It was the first performance in this city of Mr. Paderewski's symphony in B minor, and expectation was rife about the merits of this work. In its present form there are three movements and they take something more than an hour to perform, but the programme advised the audience of the fact that the composer is contemplating a fourth movement.

According to the composer's idea this work was written as a patriotic tribute to Poland, his native land, and it was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-1864. It seeks also to celebrate Poland's heroic past.

What Mr. Paderewski seems to have achieved is the writing of a work that has moments of promise, some of interest and many of attractive orchestra coloring, but what seems to be lacking is the big sweep of inspiration. The themes are not very distinctive and there are moments that, frankly, are tedious. The audience was only lukewarm in its applause, although it called the composer out after each movement. But it was nothing as compared with the applause which greeted his work as a pianist, when later he played the solo part of the Saint-Saëns C minor concerto. Of this he gave a spirited and brilliant performance, and for it he was called out numberless times and was made to play a number of encores.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Ignaz Paderewski, At The Lyric.

Few artists succeed in lifting themselves out of the ranks of good musicians into honorable and universally recognized supremacy. Ignaz Paderewski did this some years since, and through no chicanery. He is, both musically and intellectually, richly endowed; but his reproductive work has so completely overshadowed his creative results that one seldom thinks of him as a composer. Some of Paderewski's smaller piano pieces were quite the vogue 10 years ago, but his Concerto, Polish Fantasie, "Manru," the Sonata and the Variations, which he introduced last season, all failed to awaken deep sympathy, although skillfully constructed and containing more or less individual and effective ideas or episodes. There is in Paderewski's writing a lack of that inevitableness which is the fruit of impulse, so strong that it demands expression in direct, convincing diction. In other words, his more ambitious compositions are more constructions than growths, and his themes are not always suggestive or characteristic. Then one feels that Paderewski thinks for piano and afterward translates his devices into orchestral language. This mode of procedure at times produces turgid heaviness, then again thinness, but never clear, consequent and adequately varied instrumentation. Composers possessing true orchestral instinct think for the instruments, and color becomes an important element in their schemes, going hand in hand with thematic development. Such men lay on their colors with camel's-hair brushes, and they are often led, by the delicacy and subtlety of their treatment, to evolve new combinations of startling effectiveness without the aid of especially devised instruments.

This symphony in B minor, Opus 24, displays all Paderewski's virtues and shortcomings as a composer. It is melodic, but its melodies are not important; the harmonic structure is good, but not virile or characteristic; the instrumentation is tiresomely redundant, in spite of the array of melodramatic accessories which Paderewski has enlisted for its performance. There are some charming episodes in the first movement—its first big climax is full and convincing. The fact is, the symphony is not bad music, but it is not great, and its length is absolutely forbidding.

The program was:

Symphony in B minor, Opus 24 (first time in Baltimore).....Paderewski
(1) Adagio mæstoso. Allegro con fuoco.
(2) Andante con moto.
(3) Allegro vivace.
Concerto, C minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Opus 44.....Saint-Saëns
(1) Allegro moderato. Andante.
(2) Allegro vivace. Andante.
(3) Finale. Allegro.

Mr. Fiedler did not spare himself or the orchestra in his attempt to render the symphony according to the composer's conception of it as expressed in the program book. He is usually overdemonstrative, but in following Paderewski's moods—unrest, patriotic enthusiasm, strife and succeeding depression—he displayed unparalleled exuberance. One noticeable feature of the instrumentation of the symphony is the business allotted to the contrabassi. Their parts are so persistently exacting that it is safe to say there are not eight men in any other existing orchestra who could have played them cleanly.

After the 75 minutes of symphony there was a 10-minute pause, which was very welcome. Then Paderewski crossed the boundary of the field which he would like to annex—into his established realm. As was said at the beginning of this review, he attained supremacy years ago and has maintained his sovereignty, although lapses in earnestness have sometimes in late years endangered his tenure. Why he selected Saint-Saëns' C minor concerto, which is less interesting musically and less effective pianistically than many other modern works, is not obvious. He played it in a most masterful manner, and was obliged to ignore the manager's rule prohibiting encores before the audience would leave the hall.

O. B. B.

AUDIENCE GOES WILD OVER PADEREWSKI

Remarkable Demonstration at Lyric Last Night Broke Boston Symphony's Rule.

GREAT PIANIST RESPONDED TO TWO ENCORES

His Symphony Failed to Enthuse, But His Playing Thrilled Thousands.

Paderewski is the wizard. He proved it last night at the Lyric. "Philosophy becomes poetry, and science imagination, in the enthusiasm of genius," said Disraeli. And musical technique and all the difficult things that the lay mind could not follow became pure beauty and thrill under the magical touch of this great pianist, until the magnificent audience arose in a demonstration unequaled since the Boston Symphony has been giving concerts in this city.

It was wonderfully fine. The first part of the evening had dragged. The orchestra worked hard and splendidly upon Paderewski's symphony, but except in the first half of the second movement, which was lyrical and lovely, over 2,000 of the 2,500 persons in the house sat patiently and without emotion. In fact, many yawned. At the end there were recalls in compliment to the composer, who appeared and bowed to all—to the orchestra and to the audience. But it was without much enthusiasm. Paderewski, the writer and the composer, even with the aid of a matchless orchestra, had failed to arouse.

But then came Paderewski, the player, the interpreter, the genius striking fire from the keys. What a transformation! The number was the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 44. And he played it marvelously. Musicians, old-time concert-goers, staid business men, who didn't know one note from another, and who leave home when the piano is opened, all sorts and ages, fell under the spell. The inspiration got into their minds, souls and bodies, and the little man with the bushy hair who looked as though a whisp of wind might blow him away, held them under his thrall—held that glorious crowd of over 2,000 until every man, woman and child sat in absolute quiet, so as not to miss a single shade of a single note.

Then when it was over what an outburst there was! The professionals began to go. The morning critics hastened away, so that they missed the best part of the evening. All the members of the orchestra, except a dozen, left the stage. But that audience was still applauding and Paderewski was kept coming out again and again to receive its homage.

The Boston Symphony allows no encores. But what were rules to that audience and Paderewski? And so, amid a storm of approval, he ran back to the piano and played something so indescribably beautiful that the demonstrations were renewed and redoubled. Again and again he responded to more recalls (remember, please, the Boston Symphony permits no encores) with the result that Paderewski a second time ran to the piano and played the superlative note—a masterpiece of loveliness that made the thousands drop their wraps and coats and hats and applaud until their hands were sore. And the dozen members of the orchestra on the stage and the others in the wings were clapping as hard as the audience in front. It was a rare climax, and it is a pity that the morning papers missed it.

The other facts the morning papers told. At increased prices the Lyric was filled with one of the finest audiences ever assembled in Baltimore.

The full program was as follows:

Paderewski—
Symphony in B minor, Op. 24 (First time in Baltimore).
I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro con fuoco.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro vivace.
Saint-Saens—
Concerto in C minor, No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 44.
I. Allegro moderato; Andante.
II. Allegro vivace; Andante.
III. Finale, Allegro.

Paderewski wrote his B Minor Symphony as a patriotic tribute to his native country.

The work is in three movements. Although not founded on the folk music of Poland, the composition is sufficiently Slavonic in character to be recognized as emanating from a genius of that unhappy country. The first two movements are conventional in form, but distinctly original in the masterly and musical manner in which the themes are treated. The third movement makes the deepest impression. Into this comes the national anthem of Poland, a piece of writing which is almost appalling in its sadness and sense of hopelessness. Later the anthem is repeated in strong, triumphant measures, finally dying away in gloom. Then follows the most masterly bit of all the symphony, a funeral dirge.

The music of the Polish people is always a music with sorrow predominant. Notwithstanding governmental oppression the Poles are still a distinct people, with an individual language, and songs and dances peculiar to themselves. Bearing these facts in mind it is but natural that the genius of Paderewski should find expression in a symphony that has a profoundly melancholy undertone.

His playing of the Saint-Saens concerto proved anew that he is the greatest pianist of the day, not the greatest technician perhaps, but undoubtedly the most

BRILLIANT CROWD HEARS PADEREWSKI

Appearance at New National Greatest Event of Musical Season.

Ignace Jan Paderewski, the greatest pianist of the age, and Ignace Jan Paderewski, the composer, are two separate and distinct figures in the world's history of music. To the first must be given the unqualified homage of a public which long ago recognized his genius. To the latter must be offered the lasting regard of that same public which must recognize his influence in another and broader field, and—if it might be said—one that will endure as long as there is music.

Paderewski came to Washington yesterday afternoon as the star of the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His appearance as soloist of the program was the greatest event of the current musical season, but his position as composer of the only composition of the afternoon—aside from his own number—added unusual interest to the occasion.

The Paderewski symphony in B minor—which, by the way is Op. 24—was the work selected by Max Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, for the Washington concert. Those who had expected to be reminded in any way of the pianist's delightful minuet, with which his name has been more popularly linked as a composer, were gravely disappointed. Those who had come, as it was expected they should come, to hear a great and very deep work, were duly satisfied.

Tribute to Poland.

Paderewski's symphony is a tremendous bit of constructive work, and overflowing with the products of a master musician's mind. It was intended by Paderewski as a patriotic tribute to his native country, Poland, and, according to information furnished by him, the work was inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64.

When one sees an audience like that of yesterday which literally packed the National Theater, sit through the reading of a symphonic work which required one hour and eight minutes, and note the character of applause which followed, the question arises as to whether the great majority of such an audience is giving tribute to the composer or to the product of his brain. This question seemed very near settlement when Paderewski appeared, following the playing of the symphony, to bow his acknowledgments.

Frankly speaking, the theme of the symphony was almost universally one of sorrow, speaking through the wailing tones of the reeds and strings. The first movement, and, one might venture to say, the second also, was loaded down with pathos, and one could not help but be impressed with this over the great drawing the composer had made.

Invaded Every Field.

Paderewski seems to have invaded every field from which he could draw an added inspiration for his work. The symphony, without doubt, is one of the greatest achievments of its kind the music world has known. Whether it will be popular remains for the future to determine. The consensus of opinion yesterday did not tend to this belief, but to students of music and scholars of the field the Paderewski writing is one of its greatest wonders. The work is now in three movements and it is understood the composer intends to add a fourth.

The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Fiedler gave one of the most notable performances in its Washington career. The splendid work of the players and the magnetic direction of Mr. Fiedler aroused the greatest pleasure.

Paderewski has been the most noted pianist of the age for so many generations and is so absolutely flawless in his work that comment, more than to mention his numbers, seems superfluous. It was a veritable joy yesterday to hear him play the Beethoven concerto in E flat major, and the great audience sat spellbound during his performance.

Paderewski's greatness and his genius have not robbed him of his gracious manner and in answer to the insistent demands of the audience at the close of the program he returned to the stage and played Schumann's charming "Nachstuck," a composition which always reveals new beauties under his magic touch.

[183]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN

GREAT PIANIST'S SYMPHONY FAILS

PADEREWESKI'S COMPOSITION A DISAPPOINTMENT.

He Attempts to Convey to the Listener an Idea of the Woes of Poland, but This Is Not Accomplished. Orchestra Performs a Poor Selection Well—His Playing Atones for Symphony.

Last night was Paderewski's greatest performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was, from start to finish, a Paderewski venture, and its result his great triumph at the piano. The program had but two numbers, of which the first was Paderewski's own symphony, its first performance in Baltimore, and the second Paderewski as the soloist, in the Saint-Saens piano concerto in C minor.

The full program was as follows:

Paderewski—
Symphony in B minor, Op. 24 (First time in Baltimore).
I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro con fuoco.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro vivace.

Saint Saens—
Concerto in C minor, No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 44.
I. Allegro moderato; Andante.
II. Allegro vivace; Andante.
III. Finale, Allegro.
Soloist,
MR. PADEREWSKI.

Paderewski has written much and well for the piano, and several years ago he tried his hand on opera composition, producing a romantic work which he called "Manru," and which was performed in several cities in America, including Baltimore. It was good music, in a way, and had a strong plot, but was not an overwhelming success.

Paderewski has had a strong desire to write for orchestra, but his great reputation as a pianist has led the listeners to expect too much from his orchestral work, and the result is a disappointment. For Paderewski the pianist has Paderewski the orchestral composer distanced.

Ultra Musical Audience.

The audience last evening was ultra musical and fashionable, but was not at all enthusiastic until Paderewski touched the piano keys. It waited patiently through an hour and a quarter of not brilliant symphonic music in order to hear 20 minutes of Paderewski's wonderwork at the piano.

The trouble with the symphony is not merely incidental. It is radical. It had the best orchestra in the world, under its able conductor, Fiedler, to play it. But the work was not enjoyed. Its subjects are short and oft-repeated, but are not attractive and are not rendered by any original treatment.

Paderewski has always desired to give musical expression to his deep patriotic feeling for his native Poland, whose political woes have always afflicted and tormented him. No patriotic opera plot would ever satisfy him, or express his inmost desire for the national liberty. Therefore, he took to the symphony, whose means of expression in tones of violins, oboes, horns, trombones and tympani cannot be arrested nor indicted for treason or oppression.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

This symphony is Paderewski's own expression of himself, of his national suffering in the presence of a prolonged physical defeat. No short work could accomplish his purpose. He required time in which to tell his woeful story musically. The symphony is an hour and a quarter long, and another movement is yet to be added, which will make it take up the entire time of a single concert.

Symphony's Theme.

The defeat of the Poles in their last attempt at revolution, in 1863-64, was the provocation for Paderewski's musical retaliation. The present third movement was composed during the fortieth anniversary year of that lost cause, and he intended it to be the musical earthquake that was to result from the long pent-up patriotism pictured in the first and second movements. But it was not effective.

The first movement, beginning with the strings "consordini," is a future of suffering and defeat. The second makes futile efforts to change the mood of the first one but fails, and the third does not succeed in bringing about any favorable catastrophe. The symphony is a failure like the cause which it represents.

The contrast between Paderewski, the composer, and Paderewski, the pianist, was shown as soon as he touched the piano keys. They began to be awake with life, poetry and fire.

Each phrase and note conveyed its own distin tomessage. There were no vain repetitions, and no two phrases were played in the same way. H etook his musical brush and threw the colors out in every direction, but handling them exactly as he wished. He played the concerto not exactly as it was written, but as he recomposed it on the instant, showing each moment his wonderful mental conception and versaility. The public applauded at each opportunity, and he ended his concert in a blaz of glory. The character of his audience was shown by the crush of carriages and automobiles that filled the Lyric Plaza.

Some Handsome Gowns.

The audience last evening was not as large as on the previous visit of the orchestra. The persons were late in coming, and in consequence, a number had to sit on the steps and wait outside until after the first number. Some very handsome gowns were noticed, the majority of them being made in the prevailing empire and directoire style, embroidered in silver and gold, and many costly jewels were worn. Among the gowns noticed were:

PADEREWSKI

The Great Pianist Heard as a Composer and Interpreter.

It was Paderewski night at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, and with a vengeance. The celebrated piano virtuoso, who has been seeking the bubble fame not on the strings of concert grands, but as a creative composer with the aid of an enlarged orchestra, darkened with sarussophones—let Strauss' heckelphone look to its laurels!—and made sulphurous with a toniturone (thunder-box) was exploited by Conductor Max Fiedler and the superb orchestra to the top of his latest bent, but rather monotonously

Naturally his appearance as a soloist in the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor, which was the second and concluding number of the program, was along familiar lines in a familiar work and was splendidly read. Insofar it saved the night, though it was an anti-climax albeit a pleasant one, since the new symphony can hardly be called an overwhelming success.

Schubert's C major symphony is usually described as of "heavenly length," Beethoven's great C minor, the fifth, lasts about thirty-five minutes with four movements. Paderewski's B minor lasted last night one hour and eleven and a half minutes, minus its Scherzo which is still to be written! That is from 8.25 to 9.36½ the new symphony celebrating Poland's woes and struggles, its storms—thunder-box ever busy—and stresses—sarussophone hoarsely croaking—was muddily unrolled by Fiedler and the orchestra.

The orchestra did its best, but clarity is not a virtue of the new work, nor, despite the swollen orchestra and new instruments, is its tone-color a marked feature. The first movement is ill-balanced in relation to its own sections and to the andante which follows, since it is almost twice its length. In other words the traditional slow movement is the briefest movement, while the finale, a tone-poem in itself, lasts half an hour. Reger, Mahler, Bruckner, and even Paderewski evidently believe that ability to orchestrate in the silence of one's studio permits endless compositions. But the result is fatigue and the destruction of any true sense of proportion.

Inevitably a composition lasting an hour and five and a half minutes of actual music, six minutes being taken up in waits, has much to say, and Paderewski has a master hand, but its pathetic patriotism is perhaps its chief feature and it certainly will never be a popular work, nor one to add to his creative fame. The concert began late, but the great audience was indulgent and applauded the first movement vigorously, calling out the composer several times. The second movement received scant applause and the third was received with correct appreciation, but that was all, the real enthusiasm being reserved for his solo work in the Saint-Saens concerto.

After this number, which was superbly and brilliantly read, revealing the old Paderewski at his best, the enthusiasm was tremendous and three encores were given in response to the applause. These bonbons put the audience in ecstacy and sent it home with a delicious Chopin waltz in its ears as a finale, as only Paderewski could do it. Here was the master work.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven—Paderewski—Fiedler.

The longest, and at the same time the shortest, programme of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon—the longest because it was close to 7 o'clock before the great audience was dismissed, and the shortest because one can never get too much of such music as was played yesterday.

A trio of masters contributed to the splendor of the concert—Beethoven, already immortal, represented by the sublime Concerto No. 5 in E flat major; Paderewski, destined to become immortal, and Fiedler, the tireless, brilliant interpreter of the works of both.

M. Paderewski had distinctly the best of it yesterday afternoon. First of all, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first hearing in Washington that wonderful symphony of his in B minor, a composition which beyond all manner of doubt puts Paderewski among the greatest composers of the day, if, indeed, it does not put him at the head of them. The composition attracts manifold interest, and while, at first hearing, no symphony can be adequately judged, it at once impresses with the grandeur and at the same time the simplicity of its character. While touches which betray an adherence to the conventional school of symphonic compositions are plainly evident, and also while there is no radical departure into the modern school, there is just a sufficient blending to make it attractive to the musical student from either standpoint, and yet it is thoroughly original. The amazing part of it all is that it is the product of the brain of a man who has already established himself as the greatest performer on the pianoforte of his time, one who has not been content with the laurels that fame has already given him, but who reaches out after others of a greater and even more lasting quality.

The composer also owes much to the interpretation given his work by the orchestra. Although the playing time is considerably more than an hour, both M. Fiedler and the musicians were as conscientious in their work at the last as they were at the beginning. Every meaning which Paderewski put into his score was brought out fully. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its best, and that is saying a great deal.

Even more interest was manifested in the playing of Paderewski, when, after considerable delay, he sat down at the piano. It was then that the audience was swayed at will by this great musical personality. The Concerto No. 5 (called "The Emperor"), is a composition very clear cut in theme and highly colored, and affords the performer many opportunities for showy work. Paderewski's touch has lost none of that quality which makes him the greatest living pianist, and all through the concerto his playing was stamped with genius. At the end the applause was so great that, though part of the audience had left the house, the artist returned to his instrument and performed with exquisite depth of feeling, the "Nachstuck" of Schumann. It was a recognition by M. Paderewski of the rapt admiration which the audience had given both his composition and his playing, and was an attention the performance of which brought tears to more than one.

The programme:

Paderewski.....Symphony in B minor, Op. 24
First time in Washington.
(a) Adagio maestoso; Allegro con fuoco.
(b) Andante con moto.
(c) Allegro vivace.

Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
(a) Allegro.
(b) Adagio un poco moto.
(c) Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m COMMERCIAL,
lress New York City.
te FEB 19 190

MUSIC and DRAMA

Paderewski's Symphony Produced.

The important part of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was the first performance in this city of Ignace Jan Paderewski's symphony in B minor, opus 24, this composer's first essay in the symphonic field. The work was played for the first time anywhere at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concert of Feb. 12. Paderewski has therefore paid the United States the compliment of submitting to it first criticism his most ambitious composition.

The composer himself has furnished the general plan of the work, printed in the Boston programme book. There are three movements, an opening and a final allegro, and between them an andante. The work is a patriotic tribute to Poland, occasioned by the 40th anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64.

The first movement, according to the composer, is free, but classic in form, and aims to commemorate Poland's historical past. The themes are radical in character, but are not popular melodies. The second movement, thematically simiar in nature, endeavors to embody the lyric traits of the Polish spirit.

The third movement is a sort of symphonic poem it itself. The antithetic elements necessary to musical structure are found in the eagerness of youthful hot heads on the one hand and the despondency of old hearts on the other. The latter is expressed in a melancholy and angelic treatment of the national anthem

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ss
NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.
FEB 20 19

NATION'S WOE TOLD AT PADEREWSKI CONCERT

Great Pianist's New Symphony Reveals Spirit of Poland.

IN A DOUBLE PROGRAM

By William R. Lester

Pianist Paderewski "doubled up" last evening in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Academy of Music—as composer, the orchestra playing his new symphony, and as soloist, in Saint-Saens' C minor concerto.

The symphony—evidently designed as a "magnum opus"—is a series of tone poems of strongly impressionistic type, rather than a work of classical structure and formal thematic development. There are but three movements—a scherzo is still to be written—and these are suffused and saturated in the Polish national spirit, flouted and tortured, crushed into dust, yet proud in lamentation, grand in patient endurance and undismayed amid the buffetings of circumstance.

Very few gifts of the gods have been withheld from this great artist, who would have been foremost in any walk in life. Rarely has the world-outcry of subject Poland been more piercingly and pathetically intoned in symphonic measures.

Great Threnodic Work.

If nature's rarest dower to musicians—the power of original melodic invention—have been denied him, Paderewski's art is none the less assured, engaging and effective. He has composed a threnodic work that celebrates a heroic past and mourns for grandeur long since gone, voicing national dreams, regrets and aspirations as no other genius of music has done in time gone by.

This overmastering national characteristic dominates his symphony. It is not so much a succession of sweet sounds as a poetic outcry of the downtrodden and desolate in heart.

No symphonic composition of this character could appeal successfully or for long to the world-mass of concertgoers. The great masters drew their themes and inspiration from universal human experience; Paderewski is here disclosed as special pleader in harmonic accents for the most forlorn and pathetic of nations under the sun.

Work is Impressive.

The composer's work has been done with dignity, authority, originality and abounding technical skill. His treatment of the various orchestral choirs is broad, consistent and suggestive; his development of his slender thematic material, free, interesting and psychically impressive.

His new symphony is a notable and worthy contribution to the all-too-scanty list of present-day orchestral works which the world of music will not let die.

The symphony required seventy minutes for performance, and Conductor Fiedler's reading seemed weak and perfunctory. Paderewski played the Saint-Saens concerto with all his wonted power, precision and delicacy of interpretation. He has taken on an impress and aspect of maturity. The artist is there; but the cirrigerous matinee idol has vanished.

MR. PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

With Ignace Jan Paderewski as the assisting soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening its concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Opera House proved the red letter concert of the season in this borough. While the great pianist has developed his art in unique ways, which the public does not question, it wondered at and admired simultaneously the rendering of his chosen composition for the evening, Beethoven's Concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat major, opus 73. The only other number for this programme was Paderewski's Symphony, in B minor, op. 24, given for the first time in Brooklyn. Max Fiedler conducted and brought from the orchestra a masterful interpretation of the new composition. The Beethoven Concerto with the orchestra had a most finished rendering, and made the solo artist, from the standpoint of composer in the first instance and performer in the second, altogether the lion of the evening.

[184]

rom ..... Daily Times, ddress ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate ..... FEB 20 1909

PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY HEARD

INTRODUCED TO BROOKLYN BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Composer Also Appears as a Soloist, Playing the Beethoven Concerto in E Flat, and Is Made to Feel He Is Among Friends—Fine Performances by Orchestra and Pianist.

It was Paderewski night for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. The pianist's new Symphony in B minor (Op. 24) was introduced to Brooklyn, and he himself appeared as a soloist, playing with the orchestra the Beethoven Concerto No 5 in E flat. The concert had extraordinary interest for an audience that crowded the opera house, and made it plain that Brooklyn likes to pay its respects to a great artist.

The symphony is out of the ordinary manner of symphonic writing, and it would be a great pleasure to record in truth that it is as great a work as the many friends of the composer (and they are legion) wish it might be. In such matters critical judgment in the interest of artistic standards must avoid the temptation to permit the knowledge of a musician's ability in one direction to influence the estimate of his work in another. The symphony is disappointing although in some respects undoubtedly a work of great merit.

It is programme music—music which not only seeks to suggest a scene or occurrence, but to tell a story, and to tell it with such particularity as to carry the function of music into a sphere of uncertain accomplishment. The symphony is supposed to picture the Polish uprising and fight for independence in 1863-64. In a patriotic attempt to set forth in music an important episode in the history of his native land the composer brings up the old question of what may or may not be properly expressed in music. One may choose to follow closely the composer's programme and believe the music pictures and expresses all that he desires. But even with this programme in mind the music seems to be rather indefinitely soaring.

The symphony is largely an introspective expression of the composer's personal feeling, and as such is not of a character to be readily appreciable for a positive quality. The inference from a first hearing of the symphony is that the composer has fallen into the way of many writers who, in working out a conception put stress upon the means of expression with the result of minimizing the carrying power of their ideas. Mr. Paderewski seems to have been so insistently discursive in an exposition of the varied and unusual in instrumentation that he has, in a measure, overreached the mark of convincing achievement.

The three movements of the work do not follow the prescribed course in exploiting themes of leading significance, but are in the more or less free fashion of tone poems or pictures in which depicting detail is enlarged upon to the exclusion of a dominant symbolism in musical motive. One gets the impression that the realization of the composer's purpose is obscured by a too apparent striving for effect, and that the symphony is an overwrought masterpiece, for masterpiece it is in technical construction. There can be no doubt that in structural development it is a splendid piece of work, and that it is the product of a most sensitive and discriminating feeling—maybe too sensitive to make its thought as clear as should be for the apprehension of other minds. It is unquestionably a work of finished art in the careful subtlety of its orchestral voicing, yet is curiously uncertain in the fulfilment of its purpose. The great deal there is to admire in its technique can not atone for the satisfying want of pronounced vitality in the music itself.

Whatever the listeners actually thought of the symphony they were too polite (Brooklyn is always polite) to be otherwise than cordial in showing a friendly endorsement of the composer's effort. After the performance of the first movement Mr. Paderewski was called out to acknowledge the applause, and at the close of the performance he was recalled, and insisted that the orchestra should rise and share the approbation for the superb rendering under Mr. Fiedler's direction—a rendering that was one of the finest recent achievements of this splendid organization. It was during the intermission between the performance of the symphony and the concerto that the Brooklyn Institute management again illustrated its aggressive persistence in presuming upon the provincial good nature of its audiences.

Prof. Franklin W. Hooper took the initiative in making it appear that Brooklyn was going wildly enthusiastic over the new symphony. He stood up in the centre isle near the stage and after getting the attention of the audience deliv-it was reported that Boston had last week received Mr. Paderewski's symphony coldly, Brooklyn had shown itself capable of appreciating a good thing by receiving it warmly, and the occasion seemed to warrant that as a tribute of admiration for the pianist-composer the audience should rise in greeting as he came upon the platform to play the concerto. Of course the audience complied with the suggestion, nevertheless, such dictation as to the attitude of an audience is in very bad taste at a concert that was in no way a private or exclusive function. It is occurrences like these that help to maintain in the estimate of outsiders Brooklyn's distinctive reputation for the possession of village manners.

There is no reason to qualify praise for the performance of the Beethoven concerto. The pianist appeared to be in a mood to give his best and his interpretation had the grace, poise and authority that has made his renderings the highest standard of pianist art. All honor to the orchestra, too, for an exhibition of the most sympathetic co-operation. For an encore the pianist gave with exquisite executive taste and discretion a Chopin nocturn.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
3

AUDIENCE GOES WILD OVER PADEREWSKI

First Rendition of His Symphony Here a Notable Event to Music Lovers.

Ignace Paderewski as a pianist is no new thing, yet Paderewski's playing always means a full house and more or less hysterical applause from the audience; it was Paderewski as a composer over whom the crowded audience at Carnegie Hall was vehemently enthusiastic last night.

The occasion was the first performance here of the Polish musician's long-expected symphony, whose interpretation, according to promise, he intrusted to the Boston Orchestra. Long ago, it seems, Paderewski had the idea of writing a great orchestral work that should be a memorial of Poland. It was not until 1904 that the idea took sufficient form to be grouped into movements, and it was not until November, 1908, that the symphony was so nearly completed that the score could be handed to the Boston people.

"Nearly completed," because as it stands there are but three movements to the symphony, while the composer plans to bring it up to the standard arrangement of four.

No audience would, however, suspect any incompleteness in the work, for as it stands it is a coherent, well conceived, well knit, well developed, well rounded whole. It is doubtful, too whether very many audiences would think the symphony an abbreviated composition, for it lasts even now an hour and a quarter.

But it is an hour and a quarter of enjoyment, for Mr. Paderewski—with but few lapses into vagueness and a straining after noise—gives in this symphony a clear impression and a lovely musical form to his poetic ideas.

The first movement, for instance, an adagio, is full of essentially Polish themes, treated in classic form, and is a delightful musical embodiment of the idea of "Poland's great heroic past."

In the second movement, an andante, Paderewski tries to give his impression of the lyric nature of his people, and he does so most happily.

It is in the third movement, however, the allegro, that Paderewski comes boldly to the front as a maker of "programme music." Here he tries to put not only poetic ideals into musical form, but historical facts also—the call to arms, the last struggle for freedom, the overwhelming reverse, the death of heroes, and so on.

He does this in a very grand, very captivating and very tremendous style, with the full power of the orchestra and the added effects of new instruments—the sarrusophone, a sort of giant saxophone, and a tonitruone, a modification of the stage thunder sheet—and in this latter-day descriptive music he is more than usually successful. The clash of battle is given with an actuality that is almost overwhelming; one hears the march of men and the cries of the wounded—and yet with clearness of musical expression. This is largely due to a most original and most daring instrumentation. This movement concludes with a prestissimo passage, all the instruments playing their very highest notes, that is a climax of audacious yet legitimate effect.

The symphony not only merited the persistent applause which brought Paderewski to the stage over and over again, but places the composer securely in the ranks of great writers of symphonic music.

Then Paderewski played on the piano part of the Saint-Saens Concerto in C minor—these two numbers made up the programme—so that altogether it was a Paderewski night, and a very notable event in the musical history of New York.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 19 1909

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY WORK OF A PIANIST

Its Themes and Their Development Suggest Often the Instrument of Which the Composer Is a Master—A Long Work with Many Beautiful Passages.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The huge audience which filled Carnegie hall last night paid tribute to Paderewski, the symphonist, first, and Paderewski, the pianist, later. Notwithstanding the outbursts of applause between the movements of the virtuoso's new work the genuine ovation came after his beautiful performance of Saint Saens's C minor concerto.

As has happened already Boston Symphony encore rules were broken for Paderewski, and the pianist gave three supplementary numbers for piano alone. These were a Mendelssohn song without words, a composition by Stojowski and the Chopin "black key" etude.

Paderewski is not new as a composer in America. He has played his sonata, his concerto and many of his charming piano works, and we have heard his "Manru" at the Metropolitan. Indeed, many remember one occasion when he was playing to the capacity of Carnegie hall, while his opera was given to "standing room" at the Metropolitan. That was a great Paderewski epoch in the musical history of this country, and it is safe to say that the Polish pianist has lost none of his powers of pleasing, and, in many respects, he has gained enormously. Paderewski canot be displaced in the hearts of the American people. Some may prefer him in one mood and some in another, but all acknowledge the wonderful power of his personality and the depth of his musicianship.

But Paderewski is essentially a pianist, and his symphony is that of a pianist. It rings of the keyboard. Its themes and even some of the development of these themes suggest the piano or the transferring of them from the piano to the large body of strings, woods, brass and several additional instruments of which one is his own invention. It has become a fashion to invent new instruments nowadays. Richard Strauss created one to represent the howl of the wind, and Paderewski's invention counterfeits the rolling away of distant thunder. These should have value as theatrical accessories, but they are not of vital importance to symphonic utterance.

Paderewski has been working on this symphony for a number of years, which as already told represents a patriotic utterance of the Pole, whose country heavy with suffering has aroused many of her sons to dramatic and poetic expressions of sympathy.

Much of it is in a dark mood, with atmosphere and suggestions of unmistakable beauty, and the climaxes are in this period of brutal effects, musical and not devoid of beauty, although there are in the first movement many ear-splitting harmonies, if one may use such an anomalous expression.

With other modern symphonists, he has wrought his work out to undue length. One hour and ten minutes are required for its performance, during which it has many fragmentary and incoherent moments. The same nervous energy which makes Paderewski tear the piano to tatters at one moment and win from it the most exquisite tone at another, is distinct throughout the symphony. Some of the startling contrasts are effective, but others are disturbing. The Boston band under Max Fiedler gave it a masterful performance, and one it is not likely to enjoy elsewhere.

ting Bureau in the World

CHEERS FOR PADEREWSKI

Seldom has there been a larger audience; never has there been a more appreciative and enthusiastic one than crowded the Lyric last night, when the Boston Symphony appeared, with Paderewski in the dual role of composer and soloist.

Smashing all "rules and regulations" of this great orchestra, the noted pianist was moved to generosity by the great ovation and rendered an encore. The crowd could hardly believe it was awake, and the applause that followed was so deafening that Paderewski was practically forced to give a second number. This was even better than the wildest dreams of the most hopeful. So unexpected was it that a goodly portion of the audience had arisen preparatory to leaving, and when they saw the artist step to the chair mere hand clapping was inadequate, and a rousing cheer actually was given.

Imagine cheers at a symphony concert and you can get an idea of the pitch of enthusiasm to which the crowd had been worked.

To attempt to criticize the solo work of the greatest living pianist would be nothing less than the veriest folly, even worse than the proverbial "carrying of coals to New Castle." When hearing such a master one can only assume the role of the humblest follower, listening and trying to learn; knowing that as he does a thing so it should be done, and blaming only one's own ignorance if there is aught that sounds wrong.

His compositions, however, come under a somewhat different classification. He is not the greatest composer, and so we can compare his works to the works of the most eminent masters, and thereby get a line drawn for analyzation and criticism.

Yet even this is extremely hard to do, justify, in connection with such a composition as his Symphony, which was given for the first time in Baltimore last night. On the very start one is all in a tangle.

If the thing is really a masterpiece it stands to reason that it is too great to be understood or half way appreciated at one hearing.

Supposing it should stand in music as "Hamlet" does in drama. After centuries of sutdy, by thousands of the brightest minds of the world, "Hamlet" is yet not fully understood. It is yet a cause for ceaseless wranglings. It is further acknowledged that the truths, or messages, of music are less easily read and translated than those of words. How, then, is it possible to attempt a real criticism of any masterpiece on one hearing? Nothing is more pertinent in art than that the things that seem most incongruous at first often later become the most beautiful when we are able to get at them in their proper sequence and in conjunction with their adjoining phases.

Further than this the symphony is purely Polish in its emotions and viewpoint, while most of the audience was not Polish and not even particularly sympathetic with the Polish sufferings and ambitions.

However the wandering, disconnected, repeated and often obscure phases, especially in the first and second movements, seemed quite typical of those same faltering, spasmotic, wavering and unconcerted attempts of Poland to throw off the oppressors' yoke.

The program was as follows:

Symphony in B minor, Op. 24....
.....Paderewski
First time in Baltimore.
I. Adagio maestoso; allegro con fuoco.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro vivace.

Concerto, C minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 44
.....Saint-Saens
1. Allegro moderato; andante.
II. Allegro vivace; andante.
III. Finale, allegro.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY IS APPLAUDED ARDENTLY

Composer, However, Apparently Has Attempted Too Big a Task.

PATRIOTISM IS THE INSPIRATION

Pianist, with Aid of Max Fiedler's Boston Orchestra, Tries New Work in Carnegie Hall.

Paderewski, backed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, came to Manhattan last night with his new symphony under his arm, eager to try it on his New York admirers. In Carnegie Hall, before a packed house, his desire was achieved, and the crowd gave him a rousing reception as he came out after each movement to bow. It was a Paderewski evening and no mistake. The first part of the programme was devoted to Paderewski the composer, the second to Paderewski the pianist. The symphony, which is in B minor and has the opus number 24, came first, and occupied about an hour and ten minutes. The concerto, Saint-Saens's in C minor, No. 4, with Paderewski as the pianist, came next, and that brought the evening to a close.

It is not safe to argue from the quantity of applause bestowed just what an audience thinks of a new work, particularly when the composer has so many personal admirers as Ignaz Paderewski, and when he himself is near by, ready to receive the plaudits of his friends. How much of last night's demonstration sprang from spontaneous enthusiasm, how much was the tribute of an admiring throng offered to an idol? That, indeed, is a question.

But whatever the feelings of the average listener, it must be confessed there was a goodly number of critical auditors on hand that had looked forward to a somewhat more convincing and interesting musical message than was contained in Paderewski's symphony, even if expectations had not been keyed up to the point of bursting. Patriotism, which gave the creative impulse to the composer, is a strong element in Paderewski's emotional make-up, as it is in that of most Poles. It is a beautiful feeling to inspire musical or poetic production. But a noble motive hardly can make up for lack of original musical ideas.

One thing cannot be questioned: the composer's sincerity of effort to reproduce the strong and noble feelings that stirred him. There is no posturing in this music, no striving for mere effect. But Paderewski, apparently, had set himself too big a task, had drawn too broad and comprehensive a scheme. His musical mastery was not great enough, his originality of invention not striking enough, his sense of dramatic contrast not strong enough to depict successfully the symphonic story of Poland's weal and woe.

The symphony comprises three movements. The first, adagio maestoso, leading into an allegro con fuoco, is supposed to celebrate Poland's heroic past. The second, an andante, is intended to voice the lyric nature of the Polish race. The last, a symphonic poem in itself, seeks to depict in music the Polish Revolution of 1863-4.

In the first movement, which the composer himself has characterized as "free, but classical in form," Paderewski has given out the best that was in him. It may be the themes in themselves are not salient and strong; it may be the development of the material is wanting in contrast; it may be the orchestration shows at times a certain awkwardness. But the fact remains that here Paderewski has written music that carries a message, even if dissociated from the programme, and that expresses to the listener something more than the delineation of historical events.

The mood of the introductory adagio is plaintive, suggesting mournful reflections over a heroic past. This mood, which springs from the strong admixture of melancholy in the character of the composer, is dwelt on at length before it gives way to a feeling of pride and gladness that at last springs from the prolonged contemplation of past glories. Unquestionably, this movement has a literary key in the mind of the composer. It bears strong evidence of a programme throughout. Nevertheless, it has a musical foundation that needs no verbal explanation, and there lies its strength. The themes in themselves, even if they do not represent big and original ideas, have independent merit; the instrumental coloring at times is poignantly effective; the harmonies, though not approaching ultra-modern cacophonies, are appropriate and not without piquancy. In short, the first movement of Paderewski's symphony is well worth hearing. It marks Paderewski's highest achievement thus far in the field of composition.

It seems hard to believe that the same man who put forth the first movement of the symphony perpetrated the tiresome and absolutely uninspired tonal drooling of the second movement. If this describes the lyric nature of the Polish race, all preconceived notions of that extraordinarily musical nation will have to be altered. At any rate, there is nothing in this movement to deserve more than passing notice. Paderewski ought to relegate the andante of his symphony to the waste paper basket and write a brand new one.

Much of the last movement is superficially descriptive and conventional. It follows the programme closely enough to be readily intelligible, even to the unsophisticated mind on first hearing. The auditor cannot miss the spirit of unrest before the outbreak of war; the counseling of conservative heads to patience and caution; the outbreak of hostilities, inaugurated by fanfare and roll of drums; the grief and despair of defeat; the funeral dirge, and finally the dawn of hope. There is a passage of poignant expressiveness in which the composer laments the fallen Polish heroes. But the introductory struggle between hotheaded youth and conservative age, the battle itself and the funeral march are superficially descriptive music of a conventional sort.

The chief fault of this symphony, as far as the listener is concerned, is its monotony of mood, its insistent melancholy. Paderewski has a scherzo in mind. That will lift somewhat the pall of gloom. But it would be well also to blue-pencil the last movement and to discard entirely the second one.

Under Fiedler's enthusiastic guidance Paderewski's symphony was heard to excellent advantage. It hardly need be said the Boston orchestra responded in virtuoso style to every demand. After making his appearance three or four times at the end of his work in response to tumultuous applause, Paderewski brought the conductor with him to share the approval of the crowd. He shook hands with Fiedler. Once more the composer pianist came forward, and this time he shook hands with the concert master, Willy Hess, and asked the whole orchestra to rise.

Enthusiasm broke forth in full flame, however, after Paderewski played Saint-Saens's concerto. It seemed the throng liked him best, after all, at the piano. Two encores did not satisfy. There were cries for a speech. Paderewski can make an excellent speech. For a moment it looked as if he would accept the invitation. He changed his mind, however, and sat down to the piano for another encore.

ss

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY HEARD AT THE ACADEMY.

The fourth philharmonic concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler at the Academy of Music last night was especially memorable in that it was the occasion of the Brooklyn debut of the greatest of the great pianists as a creator of symphonic music. In the dual role of virtuoso and composer, the noted musician, as accomplished, and even more wonderful than in years past, won the heartfelt appreciation of a vast audience even to the extent of bringing the people to their feet in an impressive demonstration of enthusiasm.

Whatever may be Paderewski's status as a composer in the future, he will owe not a little of his fame to his Symphoney in B minor, the feature of last night's programme. The composition, only recently completed, represents his initial effort in the field of symphonic art. Its history is brief. Inspired by the celebration four years ago of the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Revolution, it assumes the form of touching tribute to the composer's native land. The three movements which comprise the work as it stands at present were first performed in Boston in the earlier part of this month. Paderewski promises a fourth before bringing the symphony to completion.

While never meeting the exactitudes of strict symphonic form, the composition without doubt is a marvelous bit of impressionism. It is a tone painting rather than an exposition of polyphony. The coloring, sombre and heavy, is occasionally pierced by brilliant shafts of envanescent light so as to render the whole an air of enthralling mystery. Enshrouded in low voiced chords the panorama reveals scenes of startling realism, strife of battle, despair in defeat, exultation in victory, hope in the future are the themes which loom over the orchestral canvas in the depiction of the tragedy of human souls.

From a technical viewpoint, there is much to be accounted for in Paderewski's first symphony. It lacks distinct individuality in form, for the composer adhered to no specific school of writing. The first movement, although classic in general outline, is full of modern mannerisms. Throughout there are constant digressions from classicism to romanticism and even the modernism of Strauss is represented. The polyphony developed along broad and delineative lines is often out of accord with the connected and close knit construction, as is always required in the texture of really excellent symphony. With years, however, Paderewski will no doubt grow more resourceful in the use of symphonic material, but whatever be the extent of his technical advancement, his Symphony in B Minor will always remain a wonderful imaginative creation.

In Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat major Paderewski again displayed his mastery of the keyboard. Written in Beethoven's best style, the concerto has all of the characteristic qualities which never fail to appeal to the ear of the listener. The themes are beautifully interchanged between orchestra and piano, the transsition being always accomplished with superdelicacy. The second movement, opening with a theme for muted strings, is full of liquid melody. The finale is exceptionally brilliant, closing with a series of full chords for the piano forte, which gradually diminish in strength until the very last note in the coda passes off into silence.

Paderewski played throughout with marked distinction. There was that usual clarity in tones and nuance in phrasing and the audience could want nothing more. In forte passages, the pianist was inclined towards exaggeration, a characteristic fault, but on the whole his performance possessed less of the accustomed tendency towards sensationalism. But Paderewski's sensationalism cannot offend. It is not affected. It is the animation, the red blood of life which an artist will always infuse into the work that he loves. As an encore Paderewski played a Chopin nocturne.

EVENING TELEGRAM,

New York City.

PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY IS BUOYANT AND ENTHUSIAST

Great Pianist's First Symphonic Effort Is Thoroughly Understandable at First Hearing.

NEW BARYTONE APPEARS IN "TANNHAUSER"

Love Comedy in German from the French Proves Enjoyable at New German Theatre.

MR. PADEREWSKI'S first symphony—Opus 24—presented last night by the Boston Symphony, at Carnegie Hall, caused no one to knit his brows with perplexity. To the Heroes of the Augmented Fifth, and the Knights of the Sharped Sixth and Fourth, who glory in the now popular slaughter of the Innocent Major Triads, generated by Strauss and Debussy, Mr. Paderewski's maiden symphonic effort may have seemed to be without zest and pale. Perhaps, but on the other hand it seemed to be recognizable as music—pure flowing music that did not require a grade XXXII of musical intelligence to come near understanding what it was about.

It may be prophesied that Mr. Paderwiski's first symphony will be popular. To the person of average musical attainments it is likely to be thoroughly understandable at the first hearing. The genuine enthusiasm with which it was received on its first New York performance seemed to prove that it was found instantly enjoyable.

It is refreshingly, spontaneously and far from tritely melodic. It has occasional rhythms that stir. Above all it is full of a buoyant and unflagging enthusiasm. It was written with joy—it bears no marks of labor. It flows. It is all highly excellent and there are points of absolute inspiration, notably at the close of the coda of the first movement where, at the height of a rushing climax of strings and blaring brass, a soft organ theme breaks in—for a moment only—to be followed by a crashing cadence.

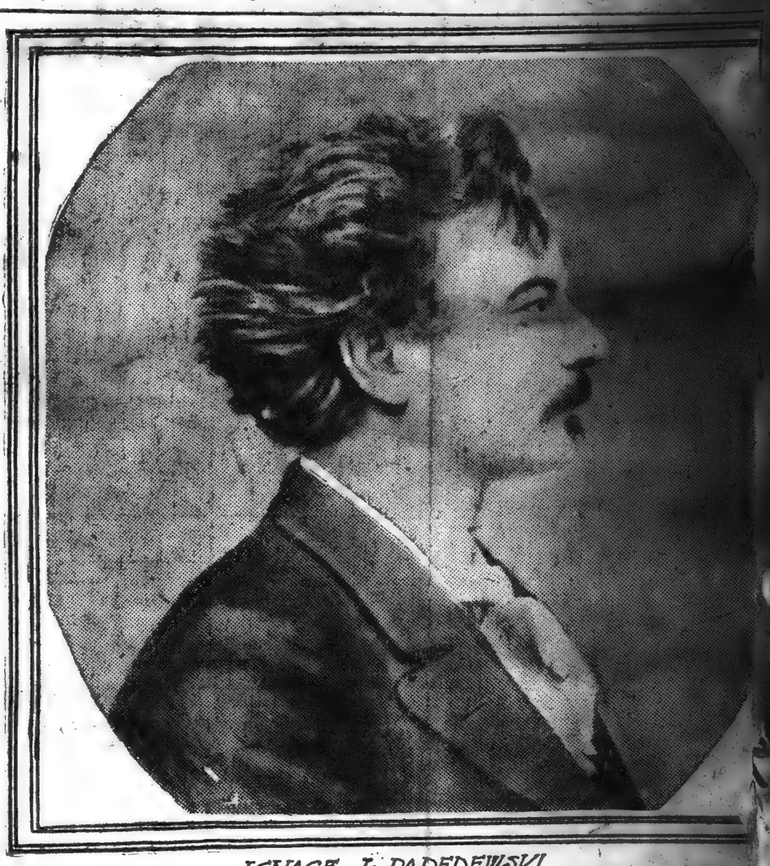
In general character it is a symphony of half lights—shot with flickers of stirring martial brass. The sordino is used frequently. The gentle wood-wind instruments are largely called upon. It is dreamy, yet with occasional and sufficient true climaxes. It is Polish.

Mr. Paderewski wrote it in a mood of patriotism as a tribute to his native country. The first movement celebrates Poland's heroic past. The second expresses the lyric nature of the race, and, following a sharply defined programme, the third movement memorializes the revolution of 1863-64.

The last movement seems to be the most successful. The first, especially in the main theme, leans a little too imitatively upon the modern school, glimpses frequently the influence of Wagner and exhibits occasionally merely clever trickery in polyphonic writing. In the second movement the composer is more himself, and in the last, with its lucious melodies, its new but not strained harmonies and its forceful military passages, he is right at the height of his inspiration.

As a whole it is music for the musical masses and a production well worthy of Mr. Paderewski. Those who have realized him as a composer as well as a performer know the charm and individuality of his work, to take as examples easily within the reach of the average performer his "Chanson de Mai" and his "Polonaise." It is as a composer that he will increasingly become appreciated, and it is an open secret among his intimates that he wishes to devote a much larger part of his time in the future to creative work. The symphony was ably presented, spiritually and sympathetically. Mr. Paderewski was called out to bow—serenely— his acknowledgments after each movement.

The programme contained only one other number—the Saint Seans piano concerto in C—Mr. Paderewski being the soloist. He was in fine form and complaisant to the admiring multitude who crowded down to the front at the end, responding with Rubinstein, a Chopin study and Stojowski's "Chant d'Amour."



IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI

rom TRIBUNE

ddress New York City.

ate

MUSIC

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY.

Mr. Paderewski's symphony, of which some critical and descriptive observations were telegraphed to this journal from Boston after its first public performance, last Friday afternoon, had a local performance in Carnegie Hall last night at the fourth concert this season of the Boston Orchestra. Since it was first heard it has been played four times by the Boston organization—in Boston, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. The composition is of a kind which benefits from study on the part of the performers as well as the hearers. Those who found themselves attracted, but also somewhat mystified, by the work ought, therefore, to hail the circumstance that it is to be repeated to-morrow afternoon with pleasure. They will discover, no matter how favorably and profoundly they were impressed last night, that it grows upon acquaintance. Its beauties will be heightened, its weaknesses will fall less significantly into the ear. From this intelligent music lovers will correctly argue that it is a serious composition, a work undertaken in a spirit of honest, unaffected devotion to lofty ideals, and which for this reason if no other must be approached in the same spirit. For the sake of its general effectiveness as a symphonic composition it might be wished that Mr. Paderewski had been less filled with patriotic emotion and a little less sincere. A strange wish this, perhaps, and one that the composer is too honest to sympathize with, but had he been willing to sacrifice truthfulness of delineation to musical effectiveness there would have been less gloom and more pride and consciousness of national strength in the mood of the symphony, and consequently more variety of expression. But in the obviously delineative portion of the work there was no opportunity to hymn a triumph; only to sing of struggle, defeat, the glory of the dead and the hope of the living. Had the revolution of 1863 had a different outcome he would have been the man to hymn it with the fervor of a Miriam. That was obvious when the orchestra lifted up its voice with superb and thrilling power in a proclamation of the ancient chivalry and glory of Poland in the first movement. That was one of the beautiful and impressive moments in last night's concert; another was the culmination of the mood of sorrow and gloom after the description of battle in the last movement. The features were commented on in The Tribune's dispatch from Boston last week; last night they came upon the reviewer with increased forcefulness—an evidence of their genuine strength and loveliness.

Another observation worthy of notice (this review being but a sequel to the first) was that the Finale, while obviously sufficient unto itself as a symphonic poem delineative of the Polish revolution of 1863, disclosed more plainly than at the first unprepared hearing its association with the first movement, and therefore the essential unity of the work. Its reminiscent phrases appear with beautiful appositeness in the Finale. On the whole, the symphony is a work of real dignity and much beauty, worthy of its subject and its composer. Its first movement was enthusiastically received, and the composer was called to the stage several times after each movement. A fine performance, one in the best Paderewski vein, of Saint-Saëns's pianoforte concerto in C minor closed an evening which was unique in the musical annals of New York.

H. E. K.

[186]

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 19 1909

PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY HEARD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays It for the First Time in New York.

A PATRIOTIC TRIBUTE

The Great Pianist's Music a Memorial of His Country's Uprising—He Plays Saint-Saens's Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra devotes the two concerts of its fourth trip to New York to Mr. Paderewski. Last evening it played his new symphony for the first time in New York, and on Saturday afternoon it will be repeated. He also appeared last evening as a solo performer, as he will at the afternoon concert.

The symphony has been occupying Mr. Paderewski's attention for several years. He has put much labor and much anxious thought into it; he has plainly endeavored to make it the expression of his ripest experience as a musician, and as well of the patriotic ardor that burns in the breast of every Pole, and there is no more convinced and passionate patriot than Mr. Paderewski.

The symphony is peculiar in its form. As it stands it is in three movements; it is said that Mr. Paderewski wrote a fourth, as cherzo, and being dissatisfied with it, discarded it, intending later to write another. The first two movements have the outlines of the sonata form, and are without a programme. The third is free from form, and is a symphonic poem on a definite subject—the uprising in Poland of forty-five years ago that was unsuccessful in throwing off the yoke of oppression.

The work is long; it partakes in this, as well as in other respects, of the character of so much modern music to express and explain everything and to accumulate all the resources of the modern orchestra and more to build up and intensify effects of sound. The composer has employed an unusual instrument called the sarrusophone, (of which he calls for three in his score,) like a double bassoon, but of brass; he has invented an instrument which he has called the tonitruone, intended to suggest the sound of distant thunder.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

FEB 21 1909

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Paderewski's Symphony Again.

Once more yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, played Paderewski's symphony for New Yorkers; once more the famous Pole walked out to bow his thanks as a composer and made his appearance after that as a pianist, much to the relief of many admirers, and once more a crowd that packed Carnegie Hall to the walls gave tumultuous applause. But with all due respect to those who assert that the symphony grows in effectiveness on repetition, it may be said that is not the impression a second hearing makes upon every one. Certainly Paderewski cannot complain of the interpretative instrument he had at his disposal, nor of the conductor. The Boston men fulfilled their task with virtuosic perfection and an abundance of spirit. On the composer himself rests the responsibility. He has failed to proclaim a message of genius. The first movement of Paderewski's symphony has decided charm. That, alone, is music well worth hearing; it would win praise even if the composer were not personally so popular. But the two following movements are, to speak plainly, of meagre musical significance and tiresome. Paderewski would do well to revise his work thoroughly or write an entirely new symphony.

The concerto Paderewski played yesterday was Beethoven's Fifth. This made one change in the Boston Orchestra's programme of the earlier concert, for he performed a concerto by Saint-Saens on Thursday evening. His tone yesterday was clangorous rather than euphonious when he applied muscular energy, but there were moments of real beauty. The audience at the close went into paroxysms of applause and crowded down to the front for encores. The etiquette of symphony concerts is not supposed to permit contributions outside the regular programme, and the Boston Orchestra has been strict in its observance of this custom. But exceptions of course must be made with a man like Paderewski. As usual, the pianist was exceedingly generous. His encores included the Hunting Song from Mendelssohn's songs without words, which he can play so inimitably; one of Debussy's exquisite sketches, "Jeu D'Eau," and a Liszt rhapsody.

[illegible] Seyler.

[illegible] instrumental outfit of instruments of percussion hitherto known. There are such uncommon effects as are gained by the stopped tuba. Yet it should not be inferred from this that he has sought for vast crashes of sound. Variety of tonal coloring rather than vastness is the evident object of his multiplication of instrumental resources.

The prevailing mood of the symphony is one of lamentation; and even the first two movements, constructed according to a scheme which earlier generations of composers evolved for the purpose of effecting contrasts and oppositions, affords some, but not marked, relief from this mood. There is a slow introduction that establishes this plangent mood at the very beginning at great length. It is the prelude of an allegro that sustains and carries on this mood, also at great length.

A chivalric theme introduces the suggestion of the past glories of Poland's history; there is a martial note here that stimulates the imagination and stirs the somewhat sluggish current of the musical thought.

The themes are none of them of strongly defined outline or of potent musical significance, and the use of them is rather in the way of repetition and reiteration than in that of a true musical and powerfully logical development. Mr. Paderewski has thought more, even in this first movement, of the mood, of the subject that he is illustrating, than of the erection of a musical fabric that stands and speaks for itself as a purely musical utterance. That the movement is effective, notwithstanding its great length and many reiterations, is undeniable. It has imagination and a moving power, but they are in its best moments and they are not firmly sustained.

The second movement, an andante, works, on the whole, less powerfully upon the imagination. There is less of definite outline, less that is tangible to lay hold of upon a first hearing. It has a somewhat rhapsodical character, as of an improvisation. There are pages in it of lyric beauty, and the second theme, still degiac in character, is one of the most beautiful that the work contains. The last movement is laid out on broad lines to interpret a programme of varied significance: political unrest, or longing for independence; despondency of older and cooler heads, the summons to war, the battle, the gloom of defeat, a despairing funeral dirge, a lamentation for an oppressed fatherland, a final flickering of hope for a Poland yet to rise from its desolation.

There is much descriptive detail; much of it is excessive and does not fix the listener's interest. The opening sections of unrest suggest foreboding. The battle is no more effective than musical battles have been in the past—Kotzwara's "Battle of Prague," Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," the battle of Strauss's hero, all conventional and unconvincing. The lamentation that follows, with its hints of themes from the first movement, the funeral dirge, are finely conceived, and rise to a pitch of high and moving eloquence. Here the composer has uttered his noblest thoughts in the noblest way. In this third movement Mr. Paderewski has made use of the Polish National hymn—a hymn not well known and not easily to be identified by the uninstructed listener, especially in the way he has treated it.

In his orchestration there is much to admire in its singularly transparent and delicate beauty of color, though it is not free from monotony. There are effects of real originality, and there is never harshness or blatancy. There are other effects that seem experimental, not all of them successful. Mr. Paderewski has used the great apparatus that he calls for in his score, on the whole, with rare skill, and with the true feeling of the orchestral master, who conceives his ideas orchestrally and makes their instrumental color their true utterance.

The symphony leaves the impression of a profound sincerity and of high aspiration. It was beautifully played, with enthusiasm and an unfailing touch on the part of Mr. Fiedler and his men. Mr. Paderewski was called out to bow his acknowledgments after each movement, and at the end he made Mr. Fiedler and the members of the orchestra share in the plaudits.

After the symphony he played Saint-Saëns C minor concerto, No. 4, with much brilliancy and power, and delighted the audience with his performance.

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

MR PADEREWSKI AGAIN IN DUAL STELLAR ROLE

Appears as Composer and as Concerto Pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Paderewski was the star for the second time this week at a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. His new symphony was heard again and he himself played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. The hall was filled to the doors.

After each of the symphony's three movements the applause was so hearty that Mr. Paderewski had to appear on the stage and bow his thanks. At the end of the symphony he shook hands with Mr. Fiedler, who conducted the orchestra, and then asked the players to rise.

As at the performance of the symphony on Thursday, the first movement of the new work seemed to arouse the most interest, but the whole was listened to carefully.

Mr. Paderewski played the familiar "Emperor" concerto with fine artistic results, the orchestra furnishing an accompaniment admirable in spirit and finish.

At the close of the concert there was a clamor for supplementary pieces that ceased only after the pianist had played four times. Of these numbers the most effective was Debussy's "Reflets dans l'Eau," a little piece that under Mr. Paderewski's touch becomes a marvel of musical color. He played also a romance by Mendelssohn, a rhapsody by Liszt and a mazurka by Chopin.

[187]

EVENING WORLD,

New York City.

FEB 19 1909

Paderewski's Symphonic Musicianship,

Three Movements Take One Hour and Ten Minutes to Play—His Command of Orchestration Unexcelled.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

PADEREWSKI'S symphony, for which the musical world has been looking a year or two, was played for the first time in New York last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When the announcement was made that the premier pianist was writing it, he declared that he wanted Boston's famous band of musicians to introduce it to the public. His wish has been gratified. In Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, Feb. 12, the composition got its initial performance by the Hub players under Max Fiedler. New York's turn came last night.

The symphony, which is in B minor, has three movements, and, on the authority of the composer himself, is a patriotic tribute to his native country—Poland—inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. It took one hour and ten minutes to play last night, and when the contemplated fourth movement is added it will surely consume an hour and a half. This seems an unconscionable length of time for a symphony when a complete modern music-drama can be presented in one hour and thirty-five minutes. Beethoven's immortal ninth, with its choral ending, doesn't begin to approach it in length.

As an example of musical architecture, Paderewski's symphony is superb. Neither Richard Strauss nor Elgar has better knowledge of orchestral possibilities. The composer has added three sarrusophones, of modern invention, and a tonitruone of his own design, to give the feeling of far-distant thunder to the conventional instruments used by the band. There is no trick of the trade (using the expression as a compliment) of which he has not availed himself. Every bar seems to have been polished and refined to the perfection of execution. With what result?

In the opinion of the writer, with frank admission of his own inability to grasp at a single hearing the complete significance of a work of such length and magnitude, in the construction of which this profound musician has spent so many years, it is uninspired. Neither the Polish racial themes of the first and second movements, nor the use of the national anthem in the third, arouses a keen appreciation of the wrongs under which the Poles have suffered or an ecstatic desire to right them as, for instance, Tschaikowsky's sixth does for the Russians.

There were some fine moments that none could miss, and, likely, many beautiful passages that the writer overlooked, but the general effect was not exhilarating.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is usually the principal factor at its own concerts, but yesterday afternoon, as on last Thursday evening, its Carnegie Hall programme was dominated by Mr. Paderewski. The Polish pianist's new symphony was repeated, and then came the E flat pianoforte concerto of Beethoven, with the guest of the day as soloist. This completed the printed list of what was to be expected, but the audience, which filled every inch of available space in the vast building, was in no mood to depart without hearing Mr. Paderewski in music for pianoforte alone, and so there followed the scenes familiar enough at his recitals, but not often witnessed at Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The pianist was generous, and he added a group of extra pieces, including a gorgeously performed Liszt rhapsody.

In these additional numbers the auditors revelled in what perhaps represents the strongest single appeal of Mr. Paderewski to his public, namely, his exquisite tone color. The "Emperor" pianoforte concerto had been played with clarity and masculinity of style, and with a straightforwardness that placed the music on the lofty plane where it belongs. Beauty of a high and noble kind was here, and it was appreciated, but the intimate side of the pianoforte was what the hearers missed in it, and this the extra pieces supplied. There was sharp accentuation in the Beethoven music, as Mr. Paderewski played it, particularly in the final allegro, but the scale of dynamic values was justly chosen.

The repetition of Mr. Paderewski's symphony emphasized the qualities already discussed in this newspaper. If anything further need be said, it must be a word of admiration for the many passages disclosing masterly treatment for the orchestra, especially the amazingly brilliant and overwhelmingly effective tutti just before the close. Here the strings are employed with consummate skill. The performance of this difficult score by Mr. Fiedler and the Boston orchestra was again of memorable sort. The conductor and his men were evidently in close sympathy with the work, and it was not only a pretty tribute, but a deserved one, when Mr. Paderewski, after he had been recalled several times to receive the audience's applause, insisted that the orchestral players rise to share

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ss New York City.

FEB 19 1909

A PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

A SYMPHONY in B minor by Mr. Paderewski, his first composition in symphonic form, which had its initial performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday in Boston, was played by the same orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Saint-Saëns's piano concerto in C minor, with Mr. Paderewski as pianist, completed the programme. Thus in one concert the distinguished Polish artist figured as composer and as pianist.

In Mr. Philip Hale's programme notes the following passage presents concisely important information regarding the new symphony:

The following sketch of this symphony is based on information furnished by the composer.

The symphony Op. 24 is in three movements; I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro fuoco; II. Andante con moto; III. Allegro vivace.

The themes of the first movement were sketched in the summer of 1904. The three movements which now compose the work were completed, and the parts were copied in December, 1908.

"The symphony is written as a patriotic tribute of the composer to his native country, and it was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form. It seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer endeavors to express the lyric nature of his race.

"In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem, and is peculiarly in memory of the revolution of 1863-64.

"In the opening of the movement is felt the spirit of social and political unrest which filled the country prior to the outbreak of the war—the unrest of the young hot-heads, the youth of the nation, who longed for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counselled patience and caution, urged the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national anthem, from which all buoyance and joyousness have been taken. The anthem is treated not unlike a dirge; it appears in a subdued, sad mood.

"The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders, and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint distant trumpet calls—the summons to war.

"Light-hearted, gay, and confident, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which, with their dark, heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous, and battling; yet, as the conflict progresses, it is gradually lost in the gloom of defeat, and finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair.

"Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are as shadowy and as unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher—lamentations for the fatherland ascending to heaven.

"A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns, and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written."

The symphony is complete as a work in its present shape, but Mr. Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement. It will be a scherzo.

The work is scored for three flutes, three oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), three clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, harp, organ, a set of three kettledrums, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone, and the usual strings.

The tonitruone is an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski himself invented. It gives the feeling of far-distant thunder in a way which cannot be accomplished with the bass drum.

It is obvious that this symphony must be a very serious work, and one is not surprised to learn that it is also very long. Though a fourth movement is still to be added, the symphony as it stands consumed last night an hour and ten minutes in the performance. The "heavenly length" of Schubert's C major symphony used to be dwelt on. Will future chroniclers dwell on the "heavenly length" of symphonies by Mahler or Paderewski? Perhaps in comparison with the music of the future these symphonies will seem short, stunted.

Mr. Paderewski is not an ultra-modern in his symphony. His harmonic scheme is not radical. His treatment of the orchestra is not revolutionary, and might be more sensuous without detriment to the grandeur of his ideal. At a single hearing the first movement of the symphony was most impressive. The slow introduction seemed dangerously long, but length in symphonic music is apparently something we must accept cheerfully. In the allegro there are pages that grip the attention, pages of chivalric splendor.

Perhaps the andante might have been played more sympathetically. A richly

Clipping Bureau in the World

Paderewski's Symphony Wins Favor on Way Here.

By W. L. Hubbard.

Paderewski's symphony has claimed the attention of the music world of the east during the last ten days. The long awaited work received its first public presentation in Boston one week ago last Friday afternoon and was repeated at the regular concert on Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra being the instrumental body engaged in the performance.

Last week the orchestra visited Philadelphia and there played the novelty, and later in the week presented it in New York. The composition probably will be heard later in Pittsburg under Mr. Paur's direction, and the Boston people will carry it also to Baltimore and one or two other eastern cities. The Minneapolis orchestra is to undertake a performance, and early in March our own orchestra will make the presentation of the symphony in Chicago.

In the east Paderewski has appeared always on the same program as soloist, the first half of the concert being devoted to the symphony and the second to a concerto. In Boston and Philadelphia he was heard in the Saint-Saëns C minor, and in New York at one of the concerts he used this work and at the second the Beethoven "Emperor."

The Saint-Saëns Concerto will figure on the program when the symphony is played here, and the program will be begun with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The arrangement of symphony for the first half and concerto for the second seems about the only feasible plan, for the symphony requires some seventy minutes for performance, and to place any selection after a concerto by Paderewski would mean to have its presentation delayed for a half hour or more until the admirers of the great pianist had satisfied their demands for encores. As the arrangement now stands the encorists can indulge themselves to hearts' content and yet interfere in nowise with the regular scheme of the orchestra nor with the law of the concerts which precludes the giving of more than one encore by the soloist.

While we are to have the chance to judge for ourselves of the qualities of the Paderewski Symphony, it is none the less interesting to learn now as to how it has impressed those who already have heard it. The Boston reviewers agree as to the high character, sincerity, dignity, and the technical excellence of the new composition, and while some of the critics point out certain imperfections, these seem to be chiefly the result of overelaboration due to the composer's intense enthusiasm for the theme of his work—imperfections which it would appear would be easy to remedy.

Philip Hale, whose position as annotator of the Boston Symphony orchestra's programs gives him opportunity to familiarize himself with new works more thoroughly than is possible to the average critic, writes interestingly of the symphony. He says in the Boston Herald:

"Mr. Paderewski made sketches for it in the summer of 1904, and he completed the three movements last December. It is his purpose to add a scherzo. He wrote one, but was not wholly satisfied with it.

"This symphony consists of a first movement, which, we are told, 'seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past'; an andante, which is an expression of the lyrical character of the composer's race; a finale, which is a symphonic poem with a theme that is based on the Polish revolution of 1863-'64. This finale might be played as a work complete in itself. The symphony might bear the title 'Poland.'

"Mr. Paderewski's love of Poland is known to all. To him patriotism is a religion. No one would question for a moment the sincerity of his passionate devotion. No one, speaking of it or thinking of it, would call to mind the weak poseur in the bitter novel of Cherbuliez. In his symphony the first movement, which is rigidly symphonic and without a table of contents, is the strongest of the three, and to any hearer of imagination who has been told that the music portrays the heroic past of the composer's country this movement is the most imaginative and the one charged with suggestion. In the finale, or the symphonic poem, the hearer is told expressly what he should expect to hear: The unrest of those longing for independence, older heads counseling patience, the summons to war, battle music, a dirge for the fallen, the anticipation of happier years to come, for Poland is not dead. Yet this movement as a whole does not rivet the attention, nor is it so impressive in descriptive detail as is the first movement for which the hearer has no guide book.

Sorrow, Chivalry, and Splendor.

"The symphony begins with a long introduction, a dangerously long introduction, for the sad and somber mood is maintained at so great length that the character of the main body of the movement seems not to be firmly established for some time. A second hearing of the symphony shows that this apparent lack of proportion is only apparent. It is as though a narrator mourning the loss of national liberty and lamenting with reiterated lamentations the past glories, harping on sorrow the more poignant by reason of the contrast, at last warms with the thought of the glorious years and tells as a rhapsodist a tale of chivalry and splendor. This tale is interrupted by the thought of present woes, but again the narrator finds comfort in the recollection of the proud past.

"The introduction, which is of a singularly original nature, establishes a mood which is not equaled in the finale. The themes of the first movement do not have perhaps a striking profile, but the motive that may be reasonably characterized as the theme of chivalry is finely exposed and admirably used in development. In his thematic treatment, as in his conception of form and general structure, Mr. Paderewski may be described as academic, but I do not use this word in its obnoxious sense. While his musical expression is modern, it is not ultra-modern. As far as he is concerned, there has been no harmonic advance since Wagner.

"Observe, too, how scrupulous Mr. Paderewski is in the matter of development. There are pages where his anxiety to develop in every way a theme, to exhaust its possibilities, leads him to repetitions that have little or no significance. Fragments of themes are used until they annoy or weary. In one or two instances a fine effect is thus frittered away. But this first movement as a whole impresses by its solid structure, the nobility of the general design, the high purpose that animates and vitalizes. The ornamentation is solid rather than designedly brilliant. The instrumentation is not always fortunate. There is a passage at the beginning of the main body of the movement for double basses and 'cello that does not come out, and this is true of a few other passages later in the work, as in a curious use of muted violins, where what should be a faint but dismal cry is almost inaudible.

"The finale is descriptive in its nature. It begins with a restlessness that is full of bodement; music of agitation and revolt. This section is more successfully imagined than that which portrays the actual conflict. The battle music is conventional, but after the heroes have fallen and their cause is lost the composer rises to a tragic height in mourning their lot. Here he is simple and eloquent. The funeral march that follows has not the same intensity. The close is in the manner of an apotheosis with the reappearance of the chivalric motive. The interest of the finale is not always maintained. The movement is laid out on a great scale, and the detail is at times verbose and uninteresting. These disturbing passages could be easily cut out. There would then be an impression of more logical continuity and the many fine passages would stand out in bolder relief.

"It may be added for the sake of the record that in the finale Mr. Paderewski uses, or rather hints at, a national song, the burden of which is 'Poland is not dead.' He employs in his orchestra three sarrusophones and an instrument of his own invention, the 'tonitruone,' which is modeled after the thunder machine of the theater."

[188]

From ..... Daily Eagle

Address ..... Brooklyn

Date ..... FEB 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Daniel Gregory Mason Gives the Preliminary Lecture at Academy Music Hall.

At Music Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia University gave the usual preliminary lecture recital on the programme to be played at the Boston Symphony concert. That to be presented this evening at the Opera House of the Academy—Paderewski's new Symphony in B minor, Op. 24, and Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73, which Paderewski is to play—was discussed in detail. It had been announced that Mr. Mason would go to Boston to hear the new symphony, but instead he had the advantage of an interview with the composer, who outlined the themes for him on a very precious bit of paper, and gave a clear idea of the whole. Essentials to a symphony, as observed by members of the classic and of the modern school, were first set forth to show that, measured by them, the new symphony falls naturally into the classic form. In addition to this, the lecturer quoted Mr. Paderewski, who said, in effect, never abandon the sonata form in a symphony, for it is thus written, not to suit the human will, but in obedience to a law. Quotations in favor of classical form were also made from the lecturer's former conversation with the composer, recently published in Scribner's Magazine. The widely published description of the symphony was followed, and to meet some of the criticisms made by Boston writers after its performance there last week, which said that it is "too somber and austere," Mr. Mason asked, "Why may not music be just as interesting if it is 'somber and austere'?"—reading from Brandes' account of Poland, which conveys a vivid idea of the conditions that make for depression, and which would be keenly felt by so ardent a nationalist as Paderewski. As is well known, the symphony was written as a patriotic tribute of the composer to his native country, and was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the Revolution of 1863-64. The first movement is classical in form, celebrating Poland's heroic past. The second expresses the lyric nature of the race, and the third has a defined programme, is in effect a symphonic poem showing the social and political unrest which preceded the revolution, the conservative counsel of the elders and the impetuosity of the young men, the battle, the defeat, and the return of hope. Throughout the third movement free use is made of the Polish national hymn, "Jeszcze Polska," beginning, "Nie zginela"—"Poland is not yet lost"—words by Wibicki, written in 1797, and music by Sowinski. Mr. Mason said that he thought to-night would be a most interesting occasion for the music lover, because the symphony would show the reaction of a great, intellectual, dominating personality in treatment of a unique subject. After interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto and the playing of its major portion—which was enthusiastically applauded—Mr. Mason once more played the Polish hymn, that it might become impressed upon the musical consciousness of his audience.

TIMES,

New York City.

ss .....

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY

The Boston Orchestra Repeats It—He Plays a Concerto by Beethoven.

At the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday Mr. Paderewski's new symphony was repeated, and he was again the soloist. He played Beethoven's E flat concerto, and there was nothing on the programme except the symphony and the concerto. The audience was a very large one, apparently as numerous as the hall would hold.

The symphony appeared to make a more favorable impression at this performance than it did last Thursday night. Upon many who heard it for the second time it unquestionably did; nor is this to be wondered at. Any new music that really has anything valuable in it will be better understood, better liked, on a repeated hearing. There was not a note in this symphony that sounded more lucid, more eloquent, that gave a more convincing reason for its being, on a rehearing. There were passages in the work to which a greater familiarity lent a greater expressiveness, a more cogent logic. It may have been, too, that the performance was a better and a smoother one from the greater mastery of the players and the conductor over its difficulties.

There still remained the conviction that the work is longer than its ideas and their effective presentation call for; and that is too long; that there is an overelaboration in certain passages, an anxiety to extract all that can possibly be extracted from the themes of the work and their various sections and members, that leads to tedious repletion. With all the beauty of the orchestration, now veiled, now transparent, now brilliant and glowing, to so great an extent setting forth the composer's ideas in the essence of their orchestral conception, there are certain passages that fail of their effect. They are not many.

The work is on the whole an extraordinary product of musicianship, of strong and compelling feeling, of profound conviction. It does not seem, now, to be the product of a strong or an irresistible musical inspiration. It is full of beauty, of poetical conception, of strong workmanship, of ingenious mastery. It does not seem to have been touched with the divine fire.

The same enthusiasm was shown that was shown the other evening, but still more copiously. Mr. Paderewski was called out after each movement. At the end he not only conveyed his appreciation of the public's approval, but gave his thanks to the conductor and the players of the orchestra, whom he made sharers of the applause.

Then he played Beethoven's Concerto in his noblest and most eloquent style with the fullest reverence for the master's music and 'a complete exposition of its beauty.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

om .....

ldress ..... New York City.

ate ..... FEB 2[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE second of last week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which was given Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was notable, like the preceding concert, for the appearance of Mr. Paderewski in the dual capacity of composer and pianist. His symphony in B minor, which was played for the first time in this city by the Boston Orchestra last Thursday evening, was the first number on the programme, and Beethoven's concerto in E-flat for piano and orchestra, was the only other number on the printed list. The audience, which completely filled the hall, listened with close attention to the symphony, and applauded warmly after each of the three movements. Mr. Paderewski came out several times to bow his acknowledgments, and at the conclusion of the work shook hands with Max Fiedler, the conductor, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master, and made the members of the orchestra rise to share in the applause.

The symphony was played under Mr. Fiedler's direction with abounding vigor, and full justice was done apparently to its imposing climaxes. The impression made by the work last Thursday was not changed in any important respect by the second performance. It is very long even for these days of long symphonic compositions, and is, perhaps, excessively elaborated. There is in it an individual note, distinct from, yet in keeping with its Polish national flavor, and there are pages of splendor, as well as tender and mournful lyricism in the score. It is safe to say, however, that the audience, however much it may have been pleased with the symphony, rejoiced when Mr. Paderewski took his seat at the piano.

Probably the greater number of those present were more eager to hear his playing than his new composition. They had their reward in full measure, for Mr. Paderewski was in a gracious mood, and after his splendidly virile performance of the "Emperor" Concerto, gave an informal piano recital of considerable length. Practically the whole audience remained to hear the supplemental numbers, among which were Mendelssohn's "Hunting Song," and Liszt's 12th Hungarian rhapsody.

i SUN,

ess ..... New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paderewski's Symphony in B Minor Repeated and Warmly Received.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was chiefly occupied with a repetition of Mr. Paderewski's symphony in B minor, first heard here on Thursday evening. It may be said, according to a formula made respectable only by long usage, that a second hearing of this work does not materially alter the impressions gained at the first. The craftsmanship of the composer is naturally followed with less difficulty and the hearer acquires a larger admiration for the mastery of the technics of composition shown in the work.

While the themes are not worked out after the manner of the older symphonists, they are varied after the modern dramatic method with a view to direct expression. Mr. Paderewski has in this shown not only intellectual grasp and musicianly skill, but also poetic feeling. On the whole this symphony must be set down as a serious and deeply felt composition, developed with uncommon ability. But without doubt if it had been more condensed it would have gained in power and poignancy of expression. After the symphony Mr. Paderewski played Beethoven's E flat piano concerto with breadth of view and dignity of style. The audience was very enthusiastic over the symphony.

om WORLD,

dress ..... New York City.

t

MR. PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

Large Audience Hears Him with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Paderewski's new symphony, heard for the first time in New York on Thursday evening, was repeated yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the directorship of Max Fiedler.

It was enthusiastically received by a large audience, which at the close insisted on the composer's appearance on the stage. Mr. Paderewski, in turn, insisted on making the entire orchestra stand to receive acknowledgment with him. He also shook hands cordially with Prof. Willy Hess, concert master, and Mr. Fiedler.

Following the symphony Mr. Paderewski played the great Beethoven piano concerto in E flat major, known as the "Grand Emperor." The audience was more than enthusiastic.

YORK CITY
FEB 1 9 1909

NEW WRINKLES BY PADEREWSKI

His Symphony as Performed by the Boston Orchestra Employs Some Novel Instruments.

PLAYED IN CARNEGIE HALL

The Work Has Movements of Dignity and Beauty, Although Inordinately Long—Will Add a Sherzo.

If it were announced in New York that the most prominent, able and successful of American actors had written a five-act tragedy, the news would be received with interest tempered with dismay. A modern five-act tragedy is usually a portentous, pretentious and anachronistic thing.

The announcement that Mr. Paderewski, the most prominent, able and successful of pianists before the American public, had written a symphony, and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would "create" it, was not greeted with dismay as much as with curiosity.

That curiosity is now satisfied. We heard Mr. Paderewski's symphony last night at Carnegie Hall played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that incomparable organization of musicians led by Mr. Max Fiedler.

The last movement of Paderewski's symphony is supposed to occupy itself with the Polish Revolution of 1864. All Poles are patriots and M. Paderewski is no exception to the rule. As to the poetic meaning of the first two movements, no clue is vouchsafed. The explanation of the third movement, given in the library of polite literature with which Mr. Philip Hale furnishes the Boston Symphony programmes, contains a number of ideas which neither Paderewski nor any one else could translate into music.

And at the same time the last movement, while the most indefinite, is the most explained. There is indeed some logic about this.

M. Paderewski is a man of very remarkable capabilities. He is no more the sensational and well-remunerated pianist. He is a scholar and a musician in the final senses of the words. He is a leader and a thinker. There are marked traces of his powerful and agreeable intellect throughout the work. He shows himself in sympathy with modern music. He rests secure on so basic and firm a rock as the score of "Die Meistersinger," yet he beckons sympathetically to the ultra-moderns. He has musical ideas and writes at times from his heart.

But he has often that same weakness for "effects" as "effects" which is characteristic of the modern school of composition. Hence he uses instruments such as sarrusophones, and also a fearsome thing called a tonitruophone, without which so great a symphonic intellect as Beethoven was able satisfactorily to struggle through life. At times, again, M. Paderewski goes out of his way to use new harmonies—not, as one is tempted to believe, because they help to translate his thoughts into music, but because they are new.

The symphony had all the same moments of great dignity and beauty, and as a whole was on a far higher level of conception and achievement than modern music of a similar kind. It was inordinately long. The last movement, lacking in the coherence and unity of the first two, seemed to wear itself out through its insatiable desire to prolong its existence.

Though the symphony lasted an hour and a quarter, M. Paderewski cheerfully and optimistically proclaims that he is about to add a scherzo.

M. Paderewski, who took a call after each movement of the symphony, concluded the concert by a brilliant rendering of the Saint Saen C Minor Concerto. The orchestra playing throughout the evening merits the adjective superb.

For the benefit of the uninitiated, it may be said that a sarrusophone is an instrument invented by one Sarrus, the leader of a French military band. He is long since dead, by the way. The aim of its inventor was to construct a brass instrument with a conical bore, played with a double reed and controlled by keys, to improve on the oboe and bassoon. He succeeded tolerably.

The atonitruophone (say it slowly to get the true effect) is an invention of M. Paderewski's own and is designed to imitate the rumble of distant thunder. It was effective.

The next symphony written by a modern composer will be scored for a couple of goliordophones, divided cymbals and a corneto di latrato for the imitation of the barking of distant dogs.

EVENING POST,
New York City.
FEB 19-1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Paderewski and His Symphony.

There are hundreds of pianists who fancy that, if they were as great and as popular as Paderewski is, their cup of happiness would be full to overflowing. But it wouldn't. If they played as well as Paderewski plays, they would be composers, too, for only a composer could possibly play as he does; and then their troubles would begin. The two greatest of Paderewski's predecessors, Lizst and Rubinstein, were both pianists and composers, and both were unhappy, not because they were pianists, but because they were composers. Their fame as players was so overwhelming that the public deemed it impossible that they should be great composers, too, and hinc illæ lacrymæ.

Liszt finally adopted the motto, "I can wait," but Rubinstein fumed to the end; both hated the piano, and felt insulted if asked to play. They were perfectly right in believing that they were even greater as creators than as interpreters; but the world was slow in realizing the truth.

Paderewski began to write music when he was only seven years old, and it was always his aim to become a great composer, if possible. He succeeded in this years ago. His "Manru" is the most fascinating opera since "Carmen," and its disappearance from the Metropolitan repertory is a profound mystery and piece of folly, for it was given near the close of one season four times, to crowded houses, the last time on an afternoon when Paderewski created opposition to his own opera by giving a concert in Carnegie Hall. He has written songs, among which are gems of the first water. He has written enchanting short piano pieces, dyed in Polish colors, and last season he played here a masterly set of variations and a sonata rich in musical material, profound in content. His superb pianoforte concerto will become very popular—when he is dead; and his Fantasie Polonaise will rank among the greatest of modern tone poems. But at present the world has no use for these things, for Paderewski is altogether too popular as a pianist to make the envious professionals eager to augment his fame by playing his music.

Evidently believing, like Liszt and Rubinstein, that the next generation will be more just to him than his own, Paderewski goes on composing valiantly. For the last four years he has devoted much of his time to a symphony. Having great faith in the Boston Orchestra, he made up his mind long ago that Boston should be the first city in the world to hear it, and in Boston accordingly it was produced on February 12, and repeated the following evening. Philadelphia heard it on Monday, Washington on Tuesday, Baltimore on Wednesday. Last night it was played in Carnegie Hall, where it will be repeated to-morrow afternoon, and this evening the Brooklynites will have a chance to hear it at the Academy of Music.

Having thus been played publicly five times before it reached New York, it is needless to say that it went admirably last night, the Boston musicians fairly excelling themselves. Paderewski was repeatedly called out after each movement, and at the close he made the executants share his triumph by shaking hands with Mr. Fiedler and bidding the players to rise.

The symphony is in three movements only, a fourth (scherzo) having been sketched but temporarily abandoned. The work is intended as a patriotic tribute to Poland, having been inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64. The first movement, in the composer's own words, "seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past." It has a bold, manly character, and is stirring in parts. In the second, an attempt is made to express the lyric nature of the Polish race. This seems to us the weakest portion of the work; one misses in it the original melody, racy of the soil, which makes some of his songs and piano pieces so fascinating.

For the third movement a definite programme was adopted; it is, in effect, a symphonic poem, commemorating the unsuccessful Polish revolution. There are drops of Paderewski's heart blood in this music; he is intensely patriotic, and this symphonic poem is the apotheosis of patriotism. The national anthem occurs in it, but all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken out of it, so that it seems more like a dirge. The music illustrates the altercation between the hot-headed youth and the conservative, peaceful elders. Then the battle is fought, and the anthem is vigorous for a time, to be lost again in utter gloom. A funeral dirge bewails the heroes that have fallen. The music brings bitter memories of defeat—lamentations for the fatherland. But in the end hope returns, and the final mood is one of brightness.

Paderewski's exceptional intellectuality is revealed in the sketch he has made of the programme for this third movement, which is an admirable specimen of the higher kind of programme music—the kind which aims at depicting moods rather than windmills, bleating sheep, and squealing babies in the bathtub. The themes are less individual and interesting than those in the Polish Fantasy and the piano concerto; but they are manipulated with consummate art and orchestrated with a masterhand, special effects being due to the use of a thunder-instrument, invented by the composer, and of three bass sarrusophones, which, with their dark and heavy coloring, express the overwhelming strength of the oppressing force.

The symphony lasted an hour and five minutes. It is needless to say that its chances of being acclimated in concert halls would be greatly improved if it were made shorter, in accordance with Mozart's maxim: "Short and good is better." The only other piece on the programme was the fourth Saint-Saëns concerto. Paderewski played it with so much esprit that the audience, though knowing that encores are not allowed at these concerts, refused to budge till he had added a Mendelssohn Song Without Words, Stojowski's "Chant d'Amour," and a Chopin étude.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 22 1909

There was not a vacant seat in Carnegie hall on Saturday afternoon, where for the second time Paderewski's symphony was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which played it with even greater finish than upon the first occasion. There does not seem to be a reason to add or to alter what has already been written, although a second hearing accentuated some of the beauties in which the work abounds. The last movement would easily stand alone as a tone poem. Paderewski played the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, and surpassed everything that even he has done with it before. It was a noble message, and one which might have been taken from the concert room with reverence and devotion but for the fact that the spirit was broken momentarily by four encores insistently demanded.

EVENING POST,
New York City.
FEB 22 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted to Paderewski and Beethoven. The Polish composer's new symphony was played again, and applauded by an overflowing audience with a cordiality which must have been most agreeable to him. After his playing of Beethoven's E flat concerto there was another enthusiastic demonstration which was not appeased until after the incomparable pianist had granted four encores. The next opportunity to hear him will be at his Chopin centennial concert in Brooklyn on March 1.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
New York City.

After the second performance of his symphony by the Boston Orchestra Saturday afternoon Mr. Paderewski started on his short tour which is to come to an end in the middle of April. Last week he played six times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, once each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn and twice in New York, and at each of the six concerts his new symphony was played. It is a question whether any composer ever launched a new work on the world under such favorable conditions as Mr. Paderewski has this symphony, for with the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is a labor of love to do the best with it. The next performance of the symphony will be by the Chicago Orchestra in Chicago.

ELLA MAY SMITH.

PROBABLY the most significant event in the musical life of America in the new year, was the production of Paderewski's new symphony in Boston, Saturday evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor. Mr. Paderewski said he had had this great orchestra in mind from the first note written in the composition. Not only did Paderewski laud the Boston orchestra, but he praised the music-lovers of Boston. Said he, "I wanted not only your orchestra," but that other requisite, an intelligent and appreciative audience, and I knew from past experience that I was sure to find it in Boston. Nowhere in Europe do you find superior audiences." Again he said, "I have long been of the opinion that the Boston Symphony orchestra was superior to all others. Philip Hale, music critic of the Boston Herald, writes about Mr. Paderewski's new symphony in the issue of February 14, as follows.

"The three movements with the pauses included, consumed an hour and nearly ten minutes in performance. It is easy to say that the symphony is long, too long. It begins with a long introduction, a dangerously long introduction, for the sad and sombre mood is maintained at so great length that the character of the main body of the movement seems not to be firmly established for some time. The tale is interrupted by the thought of present woes, but again the narrator finds comfort in the recollection of the proud past.

"The introduction, which is of a singularly original nature, establishes a mood which is not equalled in the finale. The themes of the first movement do not have, perhaps, a striking profile, but the motive that may be reasonably characterized as the theme of chivalry is finely exposed and admirably used in development. In his thematic treatment as in his conception of form and general structure, Mr. Paderewski may be described as academic, but I do not use this word in its obnoxious sense. While his musical expression is modern, it is not ultra-modern. As far as he is concerned, there has been no harmonic advance since Wagner.

"Observe, too, how scrupulous Mr. Paderewski is in the matter of development. There are pages where his anxiety to develop in every way a theme, to exhaust its possibilities, leads him to repetitions that have little or no significance. Fragments of themes are used until they annoy or weary. In one or two instances a fine effect is thus frittered away. But this first movement as a whole impresses by its solid structure, the nobility of the general design, the high purpose that animates and vitalizes. The ornamentation is solid rather than designedly brilliant. The instrumentation is not always fortunate. There is a passage at the beginning of the main body of the movement for double passes and 'cello that does not come out, and this is true of a few other passages later in the work, as in a curious use of muted violins, where what should be a faint but dismal cry is almost inaudible.

"This movement was played with great spirit and marked effect, but the second movement suffered somewhat from a lack of poetic sentiment in the interpretation. The performance was not sufficiently elastic. The melodic thought was not sung with the requisite freedom. The music itself has lyric charm. It should be played with the spontaneity of an improvisation. The music is romantic. It should be interpreted as Mr. Paderewski himself plays Chopin.

"The finale is descriptive in its nature."

Hans Richard the Swiss pianist who

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOY VIOLINIST IS COMING

Mischa Elman Expected to Appear at Early Date.

Mischa Elman, the boy violinist, who has created a sensation in the east this season, probably will be seen here at a date not far distant. Plans are being made to bring the young player here, but it is not known under what auspices he will appear.

One of Elman's successes of the year was at Boston, where he appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra, gaining praise by his playing of a Tschaikowsky concerto.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

PADEREWSKI, and the first performance in Brooklyn of his new and patriotic symphony, made the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last week Friday evening, more of a gala occasion than any preceding concert of the current series. The great Polish painist is said to entertain peculiarly cordial sentiments toward Brooklyn and the reception accorded, not only him but his symphony, testified emphatically that these sentiments are mutual. This seems, however, like putting the cart before the horse, unless one can credit him with affections so disinterested as to be uninfluenced by the attitude toward him of those upon whom they are bestowed. That would indeed betoken him even greater as a man than as a musician and a very phenomenon among artists. It was a Paderewski evening; for his symphony played by the orchestra and Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5 in E-flat major, played by himself with the orchestra, constituted the program. The audience, which taxed the seating capacity of the opera house to the limit, gave the pianist a spontaneous ovation; but more strikingly significant of its personal regard was the tribute of applause that it paid to the composer, for external testimony as well as the character of the composition itself, made it apparent that the demonstration which ensued upon the conclusion of each movement was inspired more by the author than by enthusiasm for his work, which, in spite of its merits as a lofty and serious composition containing many moving and effective passages, is uncommonly long and rather monotonous. With no license to trespass upon the preserve of the critics, I nevertheless dare to say that I enjoyed the first movement; was rather bored by the second and only occasionally startled into taking notice during the third and for the present, last movement, a fourth being in contemplation. The composer was called before the footlights after each movement; acknowledged the applause with characteristic grace and with equally characteristic courtesy insisted upon recognition for Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra which was as cordially given as it was deserved. When Paderewski appeared for the concerto number the audience rose as one man or perhaps I should say one woman and one man. At all events the oneness of the thing must have been too apparent to be convincing to the recipient of the honor even assuming he failed to overhear the voice of Professor Hooper giving the quiet (?) tip. The artificialty of this demonstration was, however, atoned for by the genuineness of the applause and insistent encores at the close of an incomparable interpretation of an ineffably beautiful work. Paderewski responded by playing a short composition of his own.

• • •

